THE

PREFACE

HE Author of these

Our young Gustavus did not in the least deceive the Expestations of his Friends; but by the rapid Progress which he made in Learning, he made it appear, that he was soon qualified to he sent to the University of Upsal; where, with the greatest Assiduity and Success, he applied himself to all the Sciences that could adorn a Gentleman. History and Languages, both antient and modern. were his peculiar Delight, the last of which he made his chief Study. To theje be joined the Study of Heraldry and Genealogy, as believing the Knowledge of them absolutely necessary. He was also of Opinion, and very justly too, that the Law of Nature and Nations was another principal Accomplishment; and therefore was particularly sollicitous to render bimself a Master of both: In all which elegant Studies be made so quick and early a Progress, that in his twentyfecond Year, be gave the Publick the most convincing Proofs of bis great Capacity, and bis Improvements in Literature, by a Latin Harangue on the Birth-Day of Charles XII. then but Heir apparent; which did him great Honour, and was thought worthy of being printed.

In the Year 1693, he likewise maintained, with Abundance of Applause, the Rational Theses on the Orders of Knighthood, according to the Manner of the North; a little Work, scarce, and much in Request among the Learned, because 'tis there only that a Description of the antient Military Orders of Swe-. den are to be found; it affords, beside, a grand Collection of Examples, to which is added the Plate, engraved by the famous Antiquary Elie Brenner.

Gustavus Adlerfeld, having now finished his academick Studies at Home, began to think of extending his Knowledge by Travel; for which End he fet out from Stockholm, August 1. 1696. and, after baving seen the Court of Denmark at Copenhagen, and that of Gottorp, then restding at Kiel, be ret paired to Hamburg, from thence to the Thining Court of Berlin, which be visited en passant, and proceeded on to Hall in Saxony, to study under the celebrated Thomasius, where having resided above a Twelve month, he set out for the Hague, towards the End of the Year 1697.

The Treaty of Ryswick was then negotiating between the Allies and France, under the Mediation of Sweden: And our Author waiting upon Mr. de Lilleroth, the Embassador of that Crown, met with a most gracious Reception, and was afterwards employed by him, with Success, in many secret and delicate Negotiations, as appears by the Memoirs left by Mr. Ad-'lerfeld, now in the Hands of his Son.

Our Author, having now vifited tire principal Cities in the Seven Provinces, and observed every thing that could excite the Curiosity of a Traveller, set out for Paris, where he arrived June 28. 1698. and continued till the 18th of October, from which Time be passed thre? Orleans, Blois, and Tours, in bis Way to Angers, there to go through his Exercises; and from whence he did not return to Paris till the 15th of February, 1699.

Being now desirous to make a Visit to England, be left Paris a second Time, July 3, to embark at Havre, and arrived at London the 20th, where having staid little more than a Month, he returned, by the Way of Ostend, to Paris the first of September following; where he resided till July the 12th, 1700, and then took leave of that Carital, in order to repair to Aix la Chapelle.

Here having resolved on returning to his own Country, , he took the Rout of Cologne, Hamburg, and Wismar, and arrived, at last, at Strahlsund, where be embarked on board the same Yacht with his late Serene Highness, then Duke-Regnant of Schleswin-Holstein, Brother-in-law of Charles XII. and Generalissimo of the Swedish Armies in Germany, and with whom he landed at Tzelleborg the 4th of October.

The 10th, the Duke being arrived at Carlshaven, when the King was on the Point of marching through that Place with his Army into Livonia, Mr. Adlerfeld bad leave to wait upon his Serene Highness, who introduced him himself to bis Majesty. The King bonoured bim with a most gracious Reception, declared him immediately to be his Gentleman, and ordered bim, at the fame Time, to follow the Court: But, as be had many Affairs to adjust, and the King's Departure was too precipitate, be obtained his Majesty's Permission to repair first .to Stockholm, where be arrived the 26th, after an Aufence of four Years and some Munichs.

Having now adjusted his Affairs, be prepared to follow the Army, but was prevented by Sickness, till the following Year 1701, a little after the Battle of Duna. In which Interval, as he was at all Times an Enemy to Sloth and Idleness, be thought be could not employ bimself better than in returning to his favourite Studies, of History and Genealogies. It was then, likewise, that be formed his Design of writing an exact. Fournal of the Campaigns of Charles XII. the first of which had been attended with such fortunate and illustrious Success. This Undertaking, though sufficiently laborious, did not, however, interfere with the Researches be had already begun into the History of the antient and eminent Families of Sweden; of which his Son has still preserved very ample Collections, drawn from the Originals themselves, and the most authentick Authorities.

Year

In Courland, our Author joined the Army of the King, who immediately received bim into bis good Graces; and afterwards, when he was apprized of bis Design to compile the Journal above mentioned, and which he had already begun, bis Majesty bad the Goodness not only to bonour the Plan of the Work with his Approbation, and encourage the Author to proceed with it, but likewise to order bis Council to furnish Mr. Adlerfeld with all the necessary Memoirs, State Papers, &c. and his commanding Officers to communicate to bim all their Relations of Combats, Marches, Sieges, and Attacks by Sca and Land, that the Series of his Undertaking might be preserved, and the whole rendered as perfett as possible.

In the Year 1704, the King, baving for a while suspended the rapid Progress of his Victories, and being inclined to indulge his Army with an Interval of Repose, gave Leave to his Ministers and Generals to invite their Ladies to Hielberg in Prussia; of which our Author likewise took Advantage, and, during his Residence at that City, married Mademoiselle de Steben, who came there to meet him, and to whom he was contrasted at Wismar in the Year 1700.

When the King left Saxony, in order to return into Poland, Mr. Adlerfeld never quitted his Majesty, whose Favour be had now the Honour to possess entirely; all which Time he continued his Journal on the same Pian he first began with; and with so rigid an Exatiness, that it appears from the Manuscript he even worked upon it the very Night before the fatal Battle of Pultowa, where he was killed with a Cannon hall by the Side of his Majesty's Litter.

Never Work run a greater Risque of being lost than this, it being preserved by little less than a Miracle, in the Manner following. In the Month of March, 1703, Prince Maximilian Emanuel de Wistemberg repaired to Charles XII. at Warsaw, in order to enter into his Service. He was accompanied by the Baron de Voit, Privy-Counsellor to the Margrave of Anspach, and, after the Departure of that Minister, the King conferred the Care of the Person and Affairs of this young Hero on our Author.

Mr. Adlerfeld was still in the Service of the Prince of Wirtemberg, when he was killed at the Battle of Pultowa. The Prince himself had the Missortune to be taken Prisoner that fatal Day; all his Baggage likewise fell into the Hands of the Enemy, together with a Part of Mr. Adlerfeld's; among which was this very Manuscript, from that Time believed to be lost; but happily, the Prince of Wirtemberg was jet at Liverly by Order of the Czar, and all his Baggage restored, to which was added what belonged to our Author. Upon the Death of that Prince * the Manuscript was sent to Stutgard, and, some Time after, put into the Custody of Mr. Charles Adlerfeld, who dying in 1722, it was given to our Author's only Son.

Nor could the Work fall into better Hands; Mr. Adlerfeld gladly undertaking to translate it into French from the Swedish Original; and it may be safely affirmed, he has acquitted himself with all possible Fidelity and Exastness. Without doubt he might have rendered it more entertaining to the Reader, if he had contented himself with selecting the most curious and alarming Passages, according to the Example of Mr. de Voltaire, in the History of his Hero: But then he had forfeited his Charaster of a Translator, and consequently omitted a great Number of instructive Narrations and interesting Particulars, which Abundance of Persons will always read with Pleasure.

As to the Style, the Editor has made but a very few Alterations, and those of very little Importance, as being perfuaded, that a Work of this Nature, which is purely instructive, and wholly in the Manner of a Journal, had no Need of the usual Ornaments bestowed on more florid Discourses.

* This Hero, worthy of a longer Life, died of a Burning Fever in the Flower of his Age at Dubno in Poland, Ann. 1709. upon his Return from Russia.

THE

GENUINE HISTORY

CHARLES XII. King of SWEDEN.

EW Princes Lives have abounded with more extraordinary Events, than that of CHARLES THE TWELFTH. Every thing is striking in the History of this Hero; whether we consider his Actions in private Life, or those which he performed at the Head of Armies.

We have here undertaken to give a Representation of the Campaigns of this Prince, and with that View have omitted no Circumstance of any Confequence. There are two Things which we imagine will recommend this Work, namely, that it was writ by the Order of his Majesty, and composed from the most authentick Relations of the Generals who served under him.

In order to give the World the most perfect Comprehension of whatever concerns this Prince, we think ourselves obliged to go back to his Birth, to say something of his Education, and of what passed during his Minority, together with the Manner in which he first ascended the Throne.

Charles XI. King of Sweden, married, in 1680, Ulric Eleonora, Daughter of Frederick III. King of Denmark. Of this Marriage, on the Seventeenth of Junc, 1682, our Hero, to whom they gave the Name of Charles, wasborn. He was immediately placed under the Care of the Counters of Bielke, Widow of the Treasurer of Sweden. When he was taken out of her Hands, the Count of Lindshield was made his Governor, to whom succeeded the Count of Gylenstele. Mr.

de Nordenbielm was fixed upon for his Preceptor. Baron Stuart, who was afrerwards made a Lieutenant-General, had the Charge affigned him of teaching him the Mathematicks, particularly what belonged to Fortification. All these endeavour'd to emulate each other in improving the Talents of their illustrious Disciple. As soon as his Age permitted him to follow his Father, the King took him every Year to those Reviews of his Troops, which he used to make in several Places about his Capital; and it was on these Occafions, that the very extraordinary Genius of this young Prince for War discover'd itself *.

In 1693 he lost the Queen his Mother, an incomparable Princess, whose Memory is to this Day dear to the whole Nation. M. De Nordenbielm died soon after, whose Place was filled up by Count De Polus, Counsellor of the Chancery.

The King dying the fifth of April, 1697, the Queen Dowager, Grandmother of the young King, and Widow to Charles Gustavus, was declared

Regent of the Kingdom during the Prince's Minority, which Disposition Charles XI. had made by his Will. The Regent had five Senators to form her Council, amongst whom the Regulation of Foreign Affairs was allotted to Count Benediti Oxenstierna, Chancellor; Count Gyllenstierna had the Charge of the Land Army; the Conduct of marine Affairs was given to Count De Wreed; the Administration of Justice to Count Gyllenstolpe; and Count Wallenstedt was made superintendant of the Finances.

The first Cares of the Regency were employed about the making of a Peace in Europe. At the Beginning of the Year all the contending Powers had offered to make the late King Mediator. After this Prince's Death, Denmark would have stoln this Honour from Sweden. It was with this View, that Christian V. sent Messieurs De Plessen and De Lente to the Hague in Quality of his Penipotentiaries. This Endeavour was inessectual. The late King had already deputed thither Count De Lillieroth, his Ambassador,

* M. Voltaire gives us

the following Account. Charles XII. foon learn'd High Dutch, which he spoke as persectly as his Mother-tongue. At seven Years old he could manage his Horse. Tho' he was in his Youth of a gentle Temper, he had an invincible Obstinacy. The only Means to bend him, was, to nettle him with Honour. He had an Aversion for Latin; but as soon as he was told, that the Kings of Poland and Denmark understood it, he learnt it immediately. fame Methods were taken to bring him to understand the French. As foon as he had attained some Knowledge in the Latin, he was fet to translate Quintus Curtius, a Book for which he had a greater Relish on Account of the Subject, than the Style. His Preceptor, on explaining this Author, asked him, What be thought of Alexander? I think, answered the Prince, that I should be glad to resemble bim. But, replied the Preceptor, be lived no longer than to the Age of thirty-two. Ab! faid the Prince, is not that sufficient, when one has conquer'd Kingdoms? When the King his Father heard of these Answers, he cried out, This Boy will not only exceed me, but the great Gustavus himself. One Day, as he was amufing himself in the King's Apartment with the Plan of a Town of Hungary, taken by the Turks from the Emperor, and another of Riga the Capital of Livonia, a Province conquered in the last Age by the Swedes, he observed written at the Bottom of the Plan of the Hungarian Town these Words, taken from the Book of Job; The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away, bleffed be the Name of the Lord. The Prince having read these Words, took a Pencil, and wrote at the Bottom of the Plan of Riga, Ged bath given it me, and the Devil shall not take it away from me, who knew so well how to conduct Affairs, that these Ministers only spent their Money, without having any Share in that important Negotiation.

To affift M. De Lillieroth, the Regency thought proper to affociate with him the Count De Bond, who was not able to fet out 'till the End of August. At his Arrival at Hamburgh, he learnt, that the Peace had been concluded at Ryswick between France, England, and Holland, the 26th of September, 1697. The Conclusion of this Peace was owing to the Industry of M. De Lillieroth.

The Peace between the Emperor, France, and Spain was not yet perfect-As this was to be laboured by the Count De Bond, at his Arrival at the Hague, he fet all his Engines at Work, in Conjunction with M. De Lillieroth, to bring this Affair to a Conclusion, The Peace was foon after made between these Powers, but not to the Satisfaction of the Mediators; who, far from figning it, protested against all that had passed, afferting, that the King their Mafter could not be guarantee of a Peace so little conformable to that of Westphalia, which should have been its Basis.

Whilst Sweden was so warmly employed concerning the Pacification of Europe, the King of Denmark was willing to take Advantage of the Minority of Charles XII. to oppress Frederick, Duke of Schleswich Holstein, who had enter'd into strict Engagements with the Crown of Sweden. As the Differences which had so long continued between those two Branches of the House of Oldenbourg, the Royalty of Denmark, and the Dutchy of Holftein, gave Rife to that War which we are going to treat of, it will not be foreign to our Purpose to give the Reader some small Idea thereof.

The eldest Branch, or the Family Royal, have always disputed with the Dukes of Holstein any Acts of Sovereignty in the Dutchy of Schleswich, which they imagined belonged to them, especially since the Peace of Roschild, 1658, where that Dutchy was fully adjudged to them. Quarrel nevertheless was renewed in fucceeding Times with more Animofity than ever; at last Matters were carried so far, that after the Battle of Febr bellin, the Court of Denmark caused Duke Christian Albertus to be put under Arrest at Rendsbourg, a Danish Fortress.

This happened in 1675; they then obliged the Duke, by an Act extorted from him, to renounce all the Rights which he had ever enjoy'd; they difarm'd his Troops, and put Danish Garrisons into all his Towns and Fortresses. This magnanimous Prince chose rather to abandon his Country, than to lead a disgustful Life at the Discretion of his Enemies: He retired to Hamburgh, where he remain'd till the Peace of Fountainbleau, 1679, by which he was replaced in full Possession of his Estates.

But this Tranquillity was of short Duration; for new Troubles arose in 1684. Sweden, England, Holland, and the Dukes of Lunenbourg interested themselves in Favour of the Duke. Negotiations were opened in 1687, and two Years after a Peace was concluded at Altena. People sitter'd them-themselves that this Peace would thenceforth have settled all Difficulties, and have put a final End to an unhappy Disunion, which had so long existed between the two illustrious Branches of the House of Oldenbourg.

The Duke of Holftein obtained by that Peace a perfect Liberty of levying Troops within a certain Number, and of building Places of Force; on Condition that he should raise none to the Prejudice of Denmark. The Consequences made it appear, that this Court, stung with the Necessity in which she saw herself reduced to give Way to the Times, hath always taken Advantage of this Clause, when the Situation of Affairs hath been savourable to her Designs, pretending, that the Duke took every Occasion to give her new Matters of Complaint.

But this grew much worse, when Frederick IV. Duke of Holftein succeeded his Father in 1694; the Affair then began to blaze forth again more than ever. The Powers, who had guaranteed the Execution of the Treaty of Altena, took the weaker Part, and prevented the King of Denmark from coming to Hostilities. They proposed to him the Method of Negotiation, to which this Prince consented with Reluctance. Pinnenberg, a small Town near Hamburgh, was fixed on for the Conference; to which Place the Ministers of Denmark and Holstein repaired.

These Conferences were held in 1696, and all that Year passed without their bringing any thing to a Conclusion. Charles XII. having succeeded his Father the next Year, furnished the Duke with some Troops, which he wanted, to finish certain Forts that he had caused to be built to cover his Estates against any Invasion.

Here was the Foundation of this War. King Christian V. unwilling to fuffer these Barriers, ordered some Troops to attack these Forts, which were just perfected. He soon made himself Master of them, and immediately rased them. All this passed during the Conferences at Pinnenberg. which were continued, tho' in a languishing Manner. The Duke was too weak to oppose his Enemy; he therefore resolved to dissemble his Resentment, until Sweden, finding herself disencumber'd of the Mediation. wherein she was engaged for the Peace. of Ryswick, was in a better Condition to support his Interests. As he was to marry the Sister of Charles XII. he flatter'd himself, that this Prince would not fail to act in his Favour.

During these Transactions the Regency symmoned the Diet at Stockbolm, as well to affift at the Funeral of the late King, which was to be performed on the Twenty-fourth of November, as to deliberate on the Affairs of the King. They proposed immediately to declare the King of Age, on which they were sufficiently divided in Opinion. First, the King was not of the Age prescribed by the Laws; fecondly, the late King had ordained a longer Regency by his Will; above all, great Obstacles arose on the Part of the Clergy, who were obstinate in denying their Consent.

Notwithstanding which, there was no Time to lose; the Situation of Affairs demanded a quick Resolution. They resolved accordingly to send Deputies to the Queen and the Counsellors of the Regency to communicate to them the Design they had of advancing the King's Age. After some Deliberation, the Counsellors of the Regency gave their Consent. The Matter being thus settled, the Estates addressed the young Monarch by their Deputies to take into his Hands the Reins of the Government, at a Time when the Storm which threatened at a Distance demanded that he himself should govern his Kingdom. This Proposition was agreeable to the King; he answer'd, That he was desirous to reign.

Affairs were in this Situation, when the Funeral Pomp of the late King was ordained. This was performed the Twenty-fourth of November, with the usual Ceremonies. We will not here amuse the Reader with a Detail of what passed at this Funeral, nor will we say any thing of the Medals which were struck on that Occasion. The End which we propose in this Work being only to make known the military Exploits of this Hero, we will fatisfy ourselves with observing, that two Days after the Funeral of the late King, the Queen Dowager with the Counsellors of the Regency refigned the Government to the young Prince. The King was crown'd at Stockholm with much Solemnity, but without any Magnificence. And an universal Joy diffused itself through the whole Kingdom, no Person appearing disinterested in this Affair.

The first Step with which the King began his Administration, was a Renewal of the Alliances contracted with those Powers, who were Friends or Allies with the Crown. He concluded three Treaties; the first with France, the second with England, and. the third with Holland. The Count de Bond, who was then at the Hague, was dispatched to London, to restore to his Britannick Majesty the Order of the Garter, which the late King Charles his Father had worn. The Treaty with the Dutch concerned the Tranquillity of the North, which was on the Point of being disturbed by the Affair of Holftein, in whose Behalf his Majesty appeared to interest himself in a very fingular Manner. Care was taken to insert a separate Article, with Design to guarantee anew the Treaty of Altena.

All these Precautions were not unnecessary; the Storm was forming on all Sides, and War seem'd inevitable. There were no more Hopes from the Negotiations at Pinnenberg, which were just broke off: They endeavoured to renew them, but all that Labour was in vain, it being now too late.

The Court of Denmark was resolved to pursue her Point, and appeared determined to push Matters to the last Extremity. She had no Reason to be pleased with the Marriage of Prederick Duke of Holftein-Gottorp with the Princess Royal Hedwige-Sopbia, eldest Sifter to the King of Sweden. The Ceremony of this Marriage was performed at Carlberg, a Royal House near Stockholm. Mr. Juel, the Danish Embassador, did all he could to obstruct it; he even offer'd a Princess of Denmark to the young Monarch in the Name of the King his Master. When he found all his Stratagems ineffectual, he took Leave of his Swedish who received him very Majesty, coldly.

The Duke of Holstein remained not long at Stockholm after his Marriage, but soon departed with the Princess his Spouse, after the King had made him General in chief of his Armies in Germany. The King, with the Queen Dowager and all the Court, accompany'd them to Carelscroon. The Duke passed the Sea under the Escort of many Men of War, commanded by the Count de Wachtmeister, Great Admiral, and landed safely in his own Dominions.

Count Guiscard arrived this Year at Stockbolm, where he was to reside in the Quality of Embassador from the most Christian King. He came in the Place of the Count d'Avaux, who was recalled into France. He knew immediately how to infinuate himfelf into the King's Favour, who never failed to make him one of all his Parties of Pleasure; he had the Secret of diverting the King by a thousand Sallies of Vivacity. This Favour was however of no long Duration; for having taken upon him to make Remonstrances to the King, whose real Character he was not fufficiently acquainted with, his Majesty was offended with him, and complained of him to the Court of France, who highly blamed the Conduct of the Embassador. He quitted Sweden some Years after. not being able to obtain his Audience of Leave.

In the mean while the King of Denmark did not cease to work underhand to oppress the Duke of Holstein. Jealous of the Alliance which the Duke had contracted with Sweden, and not doubting but that Charles XIL would take Part with his Brother-in-law, he conspired at once the Ruin of this young King, and sought all Opportunities to raise him Enemies. He addressed himself to Augustus King of Poland, who appeared disposed to enter into his Measures.

Augustus had brought his Saxon Troops into Poland; and as they were become chargeable to the Republick, which would bear them no longer, he was charmed with finding an Opportunity of employing them in the Conquest of Livonia. The unfortunate Patkul first inspired him with the Thought, which his Generals could not fail to approve.

To incite Augustus to this Enterprize, they represented to him the Youth of the King of Sweden, of which he might make an easy Advantage. They shewed him at the same Time, that a successful Issue of this War would much contribute to reduce the Polonese, and dissipate for ever the Factions which had been formed against him. All these Solicitations were well received by King Augustus, who was already allured by the Hopes of a Conquest which he thought so easy.

To thicken the Storm which was to break on Sweden, they cast their Eyes on the Czar, nor was any thing omitted to bring him into the League. This Prince hesitated at first, because he was then at War with the Turks: but presently having made Peace with the Porte, he resolved to join his Arms to those of the two allied Kings.

^{*} An Exposition of the unjust Proceedings of King Augustus; and Field-Marshal Flemming's Apology for the Invasion of Livonia by the Saxons, will be inserted at the Conclusion of this Work, under the Heads of Number I. and Number II.

This League was formed between the three Princes with all possible Secrecy.

The King of Sweden, ignorant of all these Preparations, sent an Embassy into Muscovy to communicate to the Czar his Accession to the Throne, and to renew the antient Treaties of Peace and Alliance. This Embassy was composed of Baron de Bergenbielm, Chancellor of the Court, of the Baron de Lindbielm, and Mr. de Gotbe, Brother of Count de Lillieroth. They did not arrive at Moscow till the Month of July, where they met with many Rubs on diverse Occasions.

The Czar was yet employed in the War against the Turks, from whom he had taken the City of Asoph. return'd not to Moscow till the Month of September. The Embassy from the King of Sweden gave him great Perplexity; for being already in a Manner engaged in the triple Alliance, he knew not how to bring himself off with Honour. He made the Embasfadors wait long' for their Audience. This he did as well to gain Time, as to see what Turn Affairs would take in Turkey. At last the Embassadors obtained an Audience, and presented the Letter from the King their Master. The Czar, who defired to fave Appearances, gave them a most gracious Reception; after which they were not a little surprized at the Arrival of Carlowitz, Major-General to the King of Poland, at Moscow. Carlowitz came Post, tho' he was indisposed; this gave the Swedish Embassadors room to believe, that he was charg'd with some Commission which required great Haste. Patkul came with him, but, to avoid Suspicion, did not appear in publick, but concealed himself in the House of the Danish Minister. He managed Affairs so well, that the Embassadors of Charles were not informed of his Arrival at Moscow till after their Departure.

During their Stay at Moscow, they had many Conferences with the Ministers of that Court, without knowing what was then in Agitation to the Difadvantage of their Master. brought back with them a Letter from the Czar, by which that Prince promised King Charles, that he would inviolably observe the Treaties between the two Crowns, and that he would shortly fend a solemn Embassy to Sweden. However, he refused to take the Oaths common on the like Occasion. All the Instances which the Embassadors used on this Subject were useless: The Czar alledged for Reason, that he had already taken this Oath at his coming to the Empire, before the Death of Charles XI. and that it was very unnecessary to have Recourse to this idle Formality. This Refusal gave the Embaffadors reason to believe, that the Czar had a Design to break with the King their Master. They resolved to return into Sweden, without being able to get any certain Information on that Head, tho' the Storm was on the Point of bursting forth.

The Proceedings of the King of Poland were not less secret than those of the Czar. To remove all Suspicion from Charles XII. of what was hatching against him, he sent the Waiwode Galeski, a Senator, into Sweden, to assure that Prince of an inviolable Friendship. The Embassador, the better to conceal his Play, pretended moreover, that he was charged on the Part of his Master, 1st, To confirm the Peace of Oliva; 2dly, To desire the King to become Mediator between his Polift Majesty and the Elector of Brandenbourg, to determine the Differences which subsisted between these two Princes on the Subject of the Town of Elbing; 3dly, To demand a Reimbursement to the Town of Thorn, of the Money which she had tormerly advanced to Sweden. These Propositions were well received by the Court of Sweden, which made no Difficulty of ratifying all these Articles, and of uniting herfelf to the King of Poland by a new Alliance, from which that Crown might draw great Advantages. As the Instructions of King Augustus's Ministers were not fufficiently ample, that Court offer'd to fend that Treaty ready drawn to Baron Maurice Welling, Lieutenant-General, and Embassador of Sweden at the Court of Warfaw, who had Orders to fet the last Hand to it.

This Nobleman, of well-known Ability and most delicate Understanding, had been fent to congratulate Augustus immediately on his Accession to the Throne. This Prince received him in the most gracious Manner, at the same Time affecting to distinguish him from all other Ministers. Baron Flemming, who hath fince made fuch a Figure in the World, and who feared the Penetration of Mr. Welling, bound himself to him in a strict Friendship; and to carry on the Deceit with the greater finesse, they affected on both Sides to keep the Affair very fecret, and to carry on the Negoriations only by Night: At last, when every thing was regulated and adjusted, the King of Poland signed the Treaty with Sweden; and Mr. Welling, ravish'd at the imagin'd Success of his Negotiation, immediately difpatched it to the King his Master at Stockbolm. As to Mr. Galeski, he set out for Denmark, with a View of fettling the Articles and Conditions on the Triple Alliance.

The Preparations for War were carried on in the Midst of all these Ne-The Armament, which gotiations. the King of Donmark was fitting out by Sea, at last began to alarm the Duke of Holftein; who, seeing himself threaten'd on all Sides, and having no more to hope from the Method of Negotiation, fet himself to work to put his Affairs in a Condition of relisting Force. The Fortifications of the Town of Tonningue, situated on the Eyder, three Leagues from the Ocean. were carried on with the utmost Diligence. As the Garrison of this Place was not strong enough to defend it, they drew about a thousand Swedish Troops out of Wilmar, who enter'd fafely into the Town without the Danes being able to hinder them.

No one could blame the Duke of Holstein for putting himself in a Posture of Defence, in a Time when his Dominions were in immediate Danger of an Invasion. The King of Denmark however complained highly of this Prince's Conduct. He fent the Count of Reventlau to the Court of Vienna to complain against the Duke. The Count passed through Dresden, under Pretence of paying his Compliments to Augustus on the Part of the King his Malter, where he remained some Days, and employed that Time in putting the last Hand to the secret Articles of the Triple Alliance; which Treaty was at length concluded. In the Night the Conferences were carried on with Flemming, and in the Day they endeavoured to amuse Baron Welling, who was so much the Dupe of these two Ministers, that he had not the least Suspicion of what pass'd. Things were in this Situation when the King of Denmark order'd his Troops to advance, threatening to attack the Duke, if he did not difarm himself. The Mediators in vain tried a last Effort to allay the Storm. the Measures were already taken on the Part of the Allies, who had refolved to decide this Quarrel with the Sword.

Frederick IV. who succeeded his Father Christian V. push'd on the Affair very brifkly, and entered on more vigorous Measures than had hitherto been taken. He sent in August a Squadron of twelve Ships, under the Command of Admiral Stocken, who were to cover the Passage of sour Regiments of Foot into Pomerania. Stocken made a Feint of attacking the Swedish Fleet commanded by Admiral Ankarstierna, which however he did not attempt; but having feen the Convoy pass and repass, he set Sail for Copenbagen. The King of Sweden, on the other Side, seeing his Brotherin-law in Danger of being crush'd, was not forgetful of bringing the Guarantees of the Treaty of Altena into his Interest to which Purpose he employed the Count de Lillieroth as his Embassador to the States General, and Baron de Frisendorff as his Envoy to the three Branches of the House of Lunenbourg. The Negotiations of these two Ministers succeeded very happily.

As for the Duke of Holftein, he fet out with his Dutchess for Sweden, after having published a Manifesto explaining the Reasons of his Conduct. The Arrival of this Prince at Stockbolm caus'd an exceeding great Joy. He remain'd there the rest of the Year. during which the King gave him all Sorts of Diversions and magnificent Entertainments, which were managed by Baron Tessin, who had fent for a very good Company of Comedians from France for that Purpole. Person, who had seen this young Monarch so violent in the Pursuit of such Pleasures, would have believed him capable of fo fudden a Change of his Sentiments?

We were now informed of the Refolution of the Guarantees of the Treaty of Altena. They declared expresly to the King of Denmark, who haughtily rejected all Propositions of an Accommodation, that if he ordered his Troops to enter into the Dutchy of Holftein, they would look on this Step as a manifest Infringement of the Peace of Altena, and consequently would treat him as a common Enemy. These Menaces produced no Effect; his Danilo Majesty, far from having any Regard to these Representations, recall'd his Ministers from Hamburgh, and caused some Troops to enter into the ducal Territories. This was an open Signal of the War, and all Hopes of avoiding it were henceforth loft.

The Court of Sweden began the Year 1700 with very superb Entertainments and Diversions. No one would have imagined in the Midst of all these Pleasures, that any Thought was had of those Preparations of War which were making in the Neighbourhood. We did not however neglect to hold ourfelves ready against all Events, nor to take necessary Meafures in order to affift the Duke. what drew most the Attention of the King of Sweden, was the Step taken by Augustus King of Poland. This Prince had so well dissembled his true Sentiments, that the Court of Swede! thought the had nothing to fear from him. But, on the contrary, Mr. de Welling had been scarce sooner assured of the Resolution which he had taken to make a more strict Alliance with the King his Master, than we were informed of Flemming's Expedition, whereof Patkul had formed the Pro-His Design was to surprize Riga the Capital of Livonia. In order to this Enterprize, he had marched from Poland in Samogitia (having put some Saxon Troops into Winter Quarters in the Neighbourhood) towards Janiski, a little Town in the Confines of Courland. The Count of Dalberg, Velt-Marshal and Governor of Livonia, fail'd not to get an early Information. On the first News which he received, he writ to the Court to advice them of what had passed; and to prevent all Surprize, he reinforced the Garrison of Riga, mounted the Ramparts with Cannon, and armed the Frontiers with advanced Guards. In the mean Time Flemming, to justify the Conduct of King Augustus, sent Letters of Protection from Janiski to all the Subjects of Livonia, in which he supposed that the Swedes had atcempted to surprize the Polish Troops in Lithuania, which the King his Master was under a Necessity of preventing, and of entering Livonia with an armed Force. After this Declaration he marched to Riga. As the Duna was frozen over, and the Works on the Binks of the River not yet in a complete Posture of Desence, he stattered himself to be able to take the Town at the first Onset; and the better to conceal his march, he surprised an advanced Guard of 30 Men, some of which nevertheless found Means to escape, and give Notice of the Approach of the Enemy. At this News Count Dalberg immediately set Fire to the Suburbs, and to spread the Alarm throughout, ordered a double Discharge of all the Cannon from the Ramparts.

The Enemy appeared before the Town the 11th of February, with about 4000 Men. Flemming, much furprized to find the Place in a Condition to make a vigorous Resistance, and being unable to advance or retreat without Loss of his Honour, resolved to attack Fort Cobrun, opposite to Riga, in order to be Master of the Duna, he commanded 2000 Men to attack it, who carried it Sword in Hand, and made Captain Bildstein the Governor Prisoner, with fifty Men. After Flemming had taken this Fort, he gave it the Name of Oranienbaum, instead of Cobrun, by which it had formerly been known. He then writ to the King of Poland to inform him of this first Conquest.

While this was doing, Augustus had forbid Baron Welling the Court, and given Orders at the same Time to fresh Troops to march and join the Body under Flemming, having obtained from the Elector of Brandenburg Permission for these Troops to pass through his Territories.

The King of Sweden was diverting himself with hunting Bears at Kongsobr, fourteen fourteen Leagues from Stockbolm, when be heard the News of the Irruption of the Saxon Troops into Livenia. was not at all moved at this, but faid smiling to Count Guiscard the French Ambassador, We shall soon oblige them to return back the same Way they came. This Prince did not leave off his Hunting, which he performed in a very uncommon Manner, expoling himself every Moment to the Danger of his Life. Instead of pursuing the Bears and killing them with a Fusee, as was the ordinary Manner, he endeavoured to take them alive. Every one followed his Example, and armed themfelves with forked Sticks, by the Affistance of which they pushed the Bears on all Sides, till those Animals were so spent, that they were to be taken. and bound. The King feared not to attack one of a prodigious Size with only a Stick in his Hand: He found himself exposed to the most imminent. Danger; the Bear had already torn off his * Peruke, and was going to trample. on him, when he found Means to escape from his Clutches, and convey' himself out of Danger; he did not however abandon his Purpose, but with the Help of the Hunters, who accompanied him, he overcame the Bear, and himself assisted at binding They took fourteen alive in this Manner, which were all transported to Kongsobr, all fast bound upon Sledges to the Sound of hunting Horns. The King diverted himself with this dangerous Exercise during the Month of February, being the Depth of Winter.

This Party of Pleasure did not hinder his Majesty from providing every Thing which was necessary for Livonia. Baron Otto Welling, General of Horse and Governor of Narva, received Orders to cause all the Troops which were in Livonia and Finland to march. They presently formed a Body of 10,000 Men, to act in Opposition to the Saxons. They made likewise other Preparations in Sweden, with the View of supporting a long War, which they foresaw would become extremely bloody.

The King of Denmark having received Advice of Flemming's Irruption. and knowing that the Czar was preparing to follow his Example, began to talk in a higher Tone. He rejected' all the Propositions of Accommodation made him by the Mediators. and pretended to give Laws to the -Doke; into whose Estates he ordered Chartes Rudolph Duke of Wurtenburg-Newstadt his General in Chief, to enter at the Head of 16,000 Men, and after having spread abroad a Manifesto, to justify his Proceedings, he made himself Master of all the flat Country, sejzing all the Revenues of his Highness, and exacting great Contributions of the Dutchies of Schleswich and Holstéin.

On the first Motions of the King of Denmark, the Mediators made new Remonstrances at the Court of Copen-bayen, with a View of hindering the Progress of a War, which was becoming general. All their Instances producing no Effect, they renewed their Alliance and the Guarantee of the Treaty of Attena, promising to give the Duke all the Succours which his Affairs should require. On the other Side, the King of Poland, who saw the Affair of Holftein very happily begun, caused a large Manifesto to be spread abroad, to justify his Enterprize on Livenia. He alledged I know not how many pretended Infringements of the Peace of Oliva, committed on the Part of Sweden. He said, he could not dispense with the Oath which he had taken at his Accession to the Throne, to regain Livonia for the Republick, to which it had formerly belonged. He pretended at last, that he was bound to affift the King of Denmark against the Duke of Holstein, whom Sweden determined to support against all Reason and Justice.

It was not difficult for the Court of Sweden to refute such weak Reasons, nor did she fail to answer them, and to demonstrate in an evident Manner, that Interest, Envy, and the Right of Conveniency had had a greater Share in this Violence, than all the other Motives which were alledged without any Foundation.

That we might be able to oppose the Enemy, all the Dispositions which were thought necessary were continued to be carried on on the Duna. Paikel had taken all Measures to gain the Nobility, and bring them over to a Revolt. All that he did to this Purpose was without Success. The Nobility themselves presented a Writing to the King on this Occasion, by which they assured his Majesty of an inviolable Fidelity.

Flemming undertook to make new Conquests: He formed a Design of attacking Fort Dunamund, which is fituated on the Mouth of the Duna. and furrounded on one fide by the Ball deraa, which renders the Access very difficult. He contented himself as first with cannonading it brifkly, and throwing some Bombs into it, to intimidate the Garrison. This first Artempt produced not the expected Effect. As Colonel Budberg, who commanded in that Fortress, did not appear disposed to surrender it soon, Flemming judged, that he had nothing to do but to give an Assault. Every Thing appeared favourable to the Execution of this Design; the Bulderaa was frozen over, and there was a Courtin intirely destroyed and very weakly covered with Pallisades, for they were on the Point of building Cazerns. Major General Carlowitz (the fame as had been fo much employed in the Negotiations) commanded: the Attack on the Night of the 12th of March, having under his Command a Body of 2000 Men: He was repulsed, after a brisk and bloody Fight. which lasted some Hours.

This Attack cost the Enemy dear, whose Loss was very considerable: General Carlowitz himself lost his Life therein. The Garrison, tho not numerous, made a very vigorous Relift-The Women distinguished themselves in fighting on this Occafion, one of whom was wounded in her Shoulder. As the Fire on both Sides ceased all at once, it was believed at Riga that the Enemy had carried. the Fort. Old General Dalberg, who continued on the Ramparts of the Town during the Attack, caused a Signal to be given by the Discharge of two Cannons, to inform the Governor of the Success of the Enterprize, which Budberg answered by a Return of the same Number, and thereby spread an universal Joy through that City.

Budberg

This Joy was of no long Duration. In Effect, Flemming having two Days afterwards shewn Colonel Budberg, that the Darkness of the Night occasioned their missing the weaker Part of that Place, (a Mistake which they would not commit for the future) this Commandant, who wanted both Men and Provisions, saw himself under a Necessity of capitulating. They allowed him four Field-Pieces, and he marched out with all the Honours of War, taking his Rout to Revel. Lieutenant-General Flemming gave the Name of August-burg to the Fort which he bad conquered.

In Holftein, the Danes, who were Masters of the Country, endeavoured to seize on all the Towns and Fortresfes. Major-General Carmaillon took the Town of Slefwick; the Town of Husum, and the Fort of Holmer, with that likewise of Husum, which was not yet quite finished, surrendered themselves without Delay; and Frederickstadt was carried Sword in Hand. The Fort of Ramsteds had the same Fate; so that there remained only the Fortress of Tonningen, which was soon invested with an Army of 8,000 Men. under the Command of the Command of the Duke of Wurtenberg. Castle of Gottorp surrendered at the fame Time, by Composition, to Colonel Baligni.

Baron Bannier threw himself into Tonningen with 4,000 Men, and defended it with great Valour and Conduct. The Duke of Wurtenberg summoned it in vain to surrender, to save the Blood which would be spilt.

The Baron rejected this Proposition with Scorn, and made at the same Time all the necessary Dispositions to sustain a vigorous Siege. The Enemy threw more than 5,000 Bombs into the Place in eight Days, and still continued to bombard it; till a Resolution was taken of besieging it in Form. The Trenches were opened, and they attacked the Counterscarp with much Vigour, which the Garrison desended very gallantly, and repulsed the Danes, who, without being dismayed, renewed the Attack the second Time, and carried it.

Affairs were in this Situation, when the Guarantees of the Treaty of Altena began to fet about executing their Promises. England and Holland equipt out Fleets, which were to enter the Sound. 12,000 Men held themselves ready to march at his Majesty's first Orders. Two Camps were formed on the Side of Norway, in order to enter it in case of Necessity: The one was commanded by Major-General Fagerskield, the other by Monsieur Sebaar, who was likewise a Major-General and Governor of the Province of Jempterland. They drew together likewise another Body near Gothenhurg under General Rebbinder, which was ordered to join the others in case of Need.

In the Midst of all these Preparations, the King of Sweden went with the Duke of Holsein from Stockbolm to Carlscroon, to press the Equipment of the Fleet. He lest the Management of Assairs to the Senators, and formed a Council of Desence, which was to have the Care of the Militia during his Absence. He took with him only two Senators, Count Piper and Count Polus; the latter was intrusted with so-reign Affairs, those of the Kingdom being committed to the Care of the fermer.

The King of Sweden, after a Stay of some Days at Carlscroon, proceeded to Malmoe, where was the Rendezvous of the Body of 12,000 Men. Malmoe the King went to Gothenburg, accompanied by the Duke of Holftein, who embarked there to join the Army of his Allies, which were ready to enter into his Estates, in order to drive out the Enemy. Baron Gyllenstern, a Swedish General, was already arrived with several Regiments of the Country of Bremen. General Lieven, who was then at Wilmar, had also taken Care to fend some Troops; these Troops joined those of Lunenburg near Tollenspicker, some Leagues from Hamburgh, where they were all to join. The E'ector of Hanover, who commanded in chief, was there in Person with the old Duke of Zell.

Before they passed the Elb, they fent the King of Denmark new Propolitions of Peace, which were all rejected. He flattered himself that he should carry Tonningen in a few Days. arrived in the Camp before it, and was often present at the Approaches, in order to encourage the Soldiers; all which, far from intimidating the Befleged, animated them the more, and drove them to make a vigorous Resistance: But nothing raised their Courage more than the News which they received at this Time of the Birth of the hereditary Prince Charles Frederick, of whom the Dutchess of Holstein was now delivered at Stockbolm the 30th of. April, 1700. The Besseged celebrated the Birth day with a general Discharge of the Cannon from the Ramparts.

Everything appeared disposed to produce fome Action of Importance. The King of Denmark having refused to hearken to those Propositions that had been made him of Peace, the Army of the Allies passed the Elb in order to raise the Siege of Tonningen, and deliver the Duke of Holstein from an Enemy, who was so obstinately bent to oppress him. The Army advanced towards Rheinbeck, a Ducal Castle, where the Enemy had posted 1500 Danish Dragoons, who undertook to dispute this Pass, but were soon repulsed by two Swedish Battalions under Lieutenant Colonel Beyer, and some Horse of Zell commanded by Monsieur de Beis-David. The Army advanced from Rheinbeck towards Vansbeck and Altena. All the Royal Country of Holstein was laid under Contribution. General Dopp, at the Head of the Troops of the States-General, join'd the Army of the Allies near Pinnenberg; after which Conjunction the Army was 14,000 strong. The Duke of Wurtenberg then judged it proper to raise the Siege, which had lasted fix Weeks, and marched directly to the Allies.

As a bloody Battle, which might draw on very mischievous Consequences, seemed just ready to be fought, the Allies were defirous to renew the Negotiations. The Elector of Hanover wished nothing so much as a speedy End of this War. The Elector of Brandenburg, who was of the same Sentiments, offered to enter into the Affair in the Quality of a Mediator. This Prince neglected no Means to persuade the Allies to return home; and to give more Weight to his Propositions, he caused an Army to advance wance to the Frontiers. As to the Duke of Holftein, he was inflamed with the Defire of coming to Blows with the Enemy, and at last obtained a Promise from the Allies, that they would determine the Quarrel, at what Price soever it might cost.

As the Presence of the Army of the Allies might contribute to bring the Enemy to Reason, they advanced towards Oldeslobe to follow the Danes. At the same Time Major General Dompré was detached with 700 Horse on the Side of Segeberg, to levy Contributions. These meeting with a Body of 300 Danish Horse under the Command of Major-general Lebatt, attacked them, overthrew them, and took 71 Prisoners. The Army of the Allies encamped at Segeberg, in the Sight of that of Denmark; yet, tho' there was only a little Rivulet between them, they nevertheless remained quiet enough, and contented themselves with disputing the Forage and the Ground, till the Peace was at length concluded at Travendah, as we shall soon see.

To force the King of Denmark into more pacifick Measures, the King of Sweden at his Return from Gothenberg to Carlscroon, had so prest the Equipment of the Fleet, that it was ready to fail about the Month of June. Majesty immediately embarked the two Regiments of Ulpland and Calmar, and then on the next Day the Fleet failed out of the Port, after having first celebrated divine Service on board the Ships. This Fleet consisted of 38 Men of War, without reckoning the Frigates, five Fire-ships, and a Bombketch. They failed the 16th, not being able before, on Account of contrary Winds.

The King was on board this Fleet, with Count Guiscard, Count Piper, and Lieutenant-General Rhenschild: There were likewise a great many Men of Quality and Officers of the first Rank. It was generally expected, that the King would attack the Danish Fleet, which would have effectually happened, if the Wind had favoured.

After the Swedish Fleet, by Means of traverse Sailing, was arrived in the Latitude of Ystedt, the King went on Shore, and took the Road of Malmoe. He now heard of the Arrival of the English and Dutch Fleets in the Sound; these consisted of 30 Ships, commanded by the Admirals Rook and Almond. who waited only the Orders of his Majesty to act. This Prince presently fent the Count de Wreed, his Chamberlain, to compliment them, and defire them to advance towards Helfingburg. The Danish Fleet, which then. anchor'd under the Cannon of Cronenberg, thought itself not secure; scarce were those of England and Holland feen, when the Fleet retired to the Passage of Rendela, between the Islands To hinder of Amack and Salibolinen. the Conjunction of the two Fleets of. their Enemies, the Danes took away all the Marks used by the Pilots to. pass in Safety that dangerous Coast. Here they ranged themselves in Order of Battle to wait for the Swedes, having first planted several Batteries of of Cannon on the Islands on both Sides.

The King, not knowing what Stepto take, fent for Admiral Taube, and Rear-Admiral Sparre to Malmoe to ask their Opinions, and to know of themin what Manner the Fleet might pass, to go and join those of the Allies: He expressed to them at the same Time a very eager Desire to attack the Danes; but these being so advantageously posted, it was thought a Matter of too much Risk; and happily another Passage was discovered, named Flint-renan, hitherto little used.

Count Wachtmeister, Great Admiral, thought this Passage too dangerous for the Ships to attempt; however, the contrary Advice having prevailed, the Fleet hazarded the Passage, which they very happily executed the 4th of July.

The Fleet consisted of forty Sail, without reckoning some large Vessels which returned to Carlscroon. The King immediately sent Messieurs Taube and Sparre to the Admirals of the Allies, who had approached the Island of Ween, between Helsingburg and Landscron, to inform them of what had happened.

These Gentlemen returned with the News, that the King of Denmark had requested a Suspension of Arms for six Days, to which the King would not consent; and as he wished for the Conjunction of the two Fleets, it was resolved to attack that of Denmark, if this durst oppose inself to them.

At this Time four Saxon Regiments took the Road of Holfein to join the Danes: Count d'Ablefeld, whom the King of Denmark had made Governor of the Dutchy of Schleswick, went to meet them, to conduct them to his Master's Army. As they committed some Waste in the Dutchy of Zell, through which they passed, that Duke marched some Troops against them under the Command of Lieutenant-General Goor, who obliged them to return back. Nor were they better received in the Territories of Brunswick, where the Militia of the Country purfued them so briskly, that they dispersed themselves, and were obliged to abandon their Baggage, and their Major-General Neitsch and many other Officers, who were made Prisoners.

The Conjunction of the Swedist Fleet with that of England and Holland was happily accomplished on the 7th of July; that of Sweden took the Right; they remained together two Days at Anchor, and failed on the 10th, to go and look after the Danes. These also weighed Anchor at the Approach of the Fleet of the Allies, and were retired to the Road of Copenhagen. The Danish Admiral then demanded by an Officer of the English, if be came thither as a Friend, or whether they were to regard bim as an Enemy? All the Answer which he received from Admiral Rook was, That he should know very shortly; and at the same Time threw four Bombs into the Danish Fleet, which would not expose itself any farther, and took immediate Meafures to shut itself up within its Ports.

This Motion having taken from the Allies all Hopes of drawing them to a Battle, they refolved to bombard the Enemy. This Refolution was executed the fame Evening, the Danes returning the Compliment from fixteen Mortars, with very little Damage on either Side.

This Manner of making War did not suit with the King's Taste; his Majesty being desirous of conveying a Letter to Mr. Leyonclo, the Swedish Ambassador at Copenbagen, found a Pretence to send a Captain thither with it. This Captain was attended with a Sea-Officer disguised in a Sailor's Dress, and was charged to obferve the Disposition of the Enemy, by which Means his Majesty was informed, that he tormented himself to no Purpose, and that it was impossible to attack the Enemy with any Advantage: This News changed the King's Resolution, he then thought of making a Descent into Seland; and to hinder the King of Denmark from repairing thither, they shot up his Passage with many Vessels which were then in the Baltick.

Whilst Charles XII. was busy in the Execution of this Project, and the taking necessary Measures to push the War with Vigour, King Augustus at length obtained of the Republick of Poland, that she would desize the Expence of the War in Liveria, to carry on which he had drawn together $25,000 Men on the Frontiers of that Province; the Conquest of which appeared to him infallible, a great Number of Poles and Listuanians had already betaken themselves thither with all their Equipages.

We have feen above, that General Otto Welling had received Orders to oppose Flemming with all the Troops which he could gather together: He acquitted himself very handsomly of this Commission, and repulsed likewise some Saxon Troops which would have passed the Duna; but was obliged in the End to yield to Numbers, and could not hinder the Enemy from executing the Design which he had formed.

On the 2 oth of July, Augustus advanced with all his Army and a great Train of Artillery to attempt the Passage, with which View he fixed on a Place near Riga, called Probosting boff. Here was some hilly Ground, commodious for planting his Cannon; Mr. Welling hastened hither, but could not hinder a great Part of the Enemy's Foot from intrenching themselves in a Manner impossible to be forced.

King Augustus, who had in great Haste made a Bridge of Boats, passed the River with the rest of his Army, and made a Feint of attacking Mr. Welling, who, after amusing the Enemy with some Skirmishes, made a very fine Retreat, and posted himself under the Cannon of Riga, into which Town he pushed all his Foot, and retired with his Horse farther into the Country, to cover it against the Saxon Parties.

Augustus thought not proper to purfue Mr. Welling; he invested Riga, which he contented himself with blocking up, not having a sufficient Force to attack it in Form; for the Garrison was very numerous, and commanded by old Count Dalberg, a very able Engineer, and one of the most experienced Generals of his Age. Augustus threw some Bombs into it with little Effect, and put all the Country round under Contribution.

Colonel Braus was detached with 600 Saxon Horse to invest Kokenbusen on the Dana, two leagues above Riga. The Enemy took these Measures to shut up the Town on all Sides, and consequently to prevent its receiving any Provisions or Troops for its Defence.

This first Progress of the King of Poland rendered the King of Denmark yet less tractable than he was before. This Prince was so far from hearkening to any Mention of Peace, that he haughtily rejected the Proposition of the Allies, of a short Suspension of

They observed the following Order. in their Passage. Seventy one Shallops, in which were embarked 254 Grenadiers, took the Van; between every Shallop there was one filled with Chevaux de Frise. They were followed by 34 Boats laden with Shovels and Fascines. Next followed 44 small Vessels, in which were 500 Men to support the Van guard. These were again followed by many other Ships, containing the Corps of Battle. The King was on the Right, with Count-Wachtmeister, Great-Admiral; Baron Knut Posse, Major-General; Baron Stuart, Count Charles Wrangle, Chamberlain Hord, and several Persons of Distinction.

the Left: He had with him the Prince Palatine of Stegeborg, Baron Arwid Horn, Captain-Lieutenant of Drabans, and Major-General and Colonel Otto Wrangle, Lieutenant of Drabans. Ten Men of War full of Foot covered the Attack, which was to be made in the following Manner.

A Battalion of Guards, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Palmquist, was on the Extent of the right Wing, with Orders to attack a Wind-mill which stood on a rising Ground. The second Battalion of Guards, commanded by Major Hamers, formed the Extent of the left Wing, and were to attack the Intrenchment of the Enemy in Flank. The third Battalion of Guards, under the Command of Capt, Ebrenftein, were to hold themselves near the first on the right Wing, to support the Attack of the Mill, and then to make themselves Masters of a House which stood on another Piece of rising Ground. A Battalion of the Regiment of Faltsbourg, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Buchwaldt, joined the second Battalion on the left Wing. In this, Manner the Van-Guard, and the four Battalions immediately disembarked, while the rest of the Troops held themselves on Board the Men of War.

As soon as the King had made this Disposition, the Signal was given by the Discharge of eight Cannon, and by hoisting a red Flag on the Mainmast Head of the Great Admiral's Ship. It was now six in the Evening. The Men of War immediately saluted the Danes with a Broad side, who were ranged in order of Battle behind their Intrenchments on the Shore. The Danes return'd a very weak Fire from some Field-pieces. As the Wa-

The King threw himself first into the Water up to his Arm-pits, with his Sword in his Hand. The King, who had never before heard the Discharge of small Arms charg'd with Ball, asked Major Stuart, What that Whistling was which he beard in his Ears? It is the Noise of the Musket Balls, which they fire at you, answer'd the Major. Very well, says the King, this shall he my Musick bence forward. At the same Instant the Major received a Shot in his Shoulder, and a Lieutenant sell dead on the other Side of the King.

All the Troops followed the King's Example. The Danes then came out of their Intrenchments, and approached the Banks of the Sea, whence they charged the Swedes very vigorously; but these having insensibly gained Ground, after a short Fight obliged the Danes to retire, which they did with Precipitation, abandoning their Intrenchments and Cannon, of which the Swedes took instant Possession.

The King had also caused the Regiment of Upland, commanded by Baron Lower, and that of Calmar, under the Command of Colonel Diurklo, to disembark during the Action. After it was over, all the Troops began to intrench themselves, which Work they carried on 'till the Arrival of the Horse. As to the Danes, they retreated under the Cannon of Copenbagen, and abandoned the flat Country, which was now exposed to the Incursions of the English and Dutch Sailors, who committed great Destruction there.

The Swedes lost very few Men in this Action. Baron Singer was wounded in the Thigh, and obliged to repass the Sea. The next Day the King order'd the Horse, with the rest of the Foot which were in Scania, to march: He likewise brought up the Artillery, designing to lay Siege to Copenhagen. All the Country was put under Contribution.

The Swedish Camp was foon provided with every Thing necessary for the Troops; the Inhabitants of Seeland brought in Provisions from all Parts, which they fold to the Soldiers. Those of Helsingobr having desired the same Liberty, the King granted it them on Condition that they would pay certain Contributions. This Prince at the same Time spread his Letters all through Seeland, by which he promised his Protection to the Inhabitants. To hinder any Disorder, he made his Troops observe an exact Discipline. His Camp was under so exact a Regulation, that the Pealants chose rather to sell their Provisions to the Swedes their Enemies, than to the Daues, who did not pay them so well. The Citizens of Copenhagen were obliged more than once to come to the King of Sweden's Camp to buy Provisions, of which, for the foregoing Reason, there was great Scarcity in their own Markets. No one had any Reason to complain of the Conduct of this Prince; His Enemies were themselves in the Number of his Admirers, and praised his Clemency and Justice. The Day after the Publication of those Letters, by which his Majesty took these People under his Protection, others appeared on the Part of the King of Denmark, forbidding his Subjects on the Pain of Death from any Commerce with the Swedes. These Menaces made little D little Impression on the People's Minds, seeing that the Swedes were every where Masters, and could force them to deliver whatever they wanted.

The Swedish Troops, as well Horse as Foot, had then pas'd the Sea, and form'd a Body of about 12000 Men. While they were gathering together, Admiral Rook arrived at the Beginning of August at the King's Camp, to congratulate him on the Success of his Enterprize. All the Ministers of the foreign Powers, who had followed his Majesty in this Expedition, emulated each other in testitying to this Prince the Pleasure they had in his good Fortune.

The News of this Expedition of the King of Sweden entirely changed the Face of Affairs in Holstein. The Danish Ministers became more tractable, and defired themselves, by Order of the King their Master, to enter into Negotiation with those of the Duke at Travendabl in Holftein. Tnev instantly defired, on the Behalf of his Danish Majesty, that above all Things there might be a Suspension of Arms in Seeland. The Mediators immediately dispatched a Courier to the King of Sweden to advile him of this, affuring him, that his Danish Majesty had engaged to give the Duke of Hostein all suitable Satisfaction.

This News was not agreeable to the King; he fear'd, that these Propositions were only made to him with a Design of gaining Time: So, that he might obtain more advantageous Conditions, he marched at the Head of his Army from Humblebeck to Runstad, about a League and Half from Copenhagen, fully resolved to lay Siege to that Town, as soon as his Artillery was arrived. In the mean Time the Peace was concluded at Travendahl, in a very advantageous Manner to the Dake of Holflein. Twelve Conferences had been held for this Purpose, in which the Treaty of Altena was confirmed in all its Points: They assured to this Prince the Sovereignty of his Estates, the Liberty to build Fortresses, and to keep on Foot a certain Number of Troops.

Charles, who knew nothing of the Conclusion of this Peace, was then employed in making the necessary Preparations for the Siege of Copenboyen. The Fleets already blockt up the Town towards the Sea, and he was upon the Point of approaching it nearer, when the News arrived of the Peace concluded at Holstein. This News was brought him on the 11th of August by a Danish Captain, who arrived in his Majesty's Camp with a Swedish Ensign, and several Prisoners of War, who had been taken by the Danes.

The Count of Reventlau, a Danish Major-General, arrived likewise the Day following: He was charged on the Behalf of the King his Master, to desire his Swedish Majesty to cause a Ceffation of Hostilities, not to advance farther into the Country, and to reestablish the antient Friendship and good Understanding, which had reigned between the two Courts, the Duke of Holstein having had all the Satisfaction he required. The fame was farther confirmed the same Day by Messieurs de Blohm and Dahldorff, who came to his Sweaish Majesty on the Part of the Duke of Holftein. The King received Count Reventlau very graciously, giving him the Place of all his Generals, and the Honour to eat at his Table.

The Peace being thus happily concluded, the Troops of the mediatorial Powers returned into their own Country. Admiral Rook, before his Departure with his Fleet and that of the Dutch, had often the Honour to falute his Majesty at his Camp at Runstadt. A great Number of English and Dutch Officers obtained likewife the fame Favour. His Swedish Majesty caused all his Army to make the Evolutions in their Presence, which drew a great Crowd from Copenhagen to the Swedilb Camp. The Defire, which all had of feeing the King, brought this great Number of People together.

The Eighteenth of August his Swediff Majesty drew near to Copenhagen, accompanied by all his Generals, and rode round it, in order to make his Observation on the Out-works. Day following, all the Regiments of Horse as well a Foot were put in Motion to be transported into Scania. Before their Departure, the Inhabitant of Seeland and Copenhagen furnished them with necessary Provisions and a great Number of Boats. King, impatient to find himself in Livonia, passed the Sound at Helsingburg, well pleased to have so happily put an End to a War so much to his Glory, and which replaced his Brother-in-law in the full Enjoyment of all his Rights and Prerogatives.

Whilst the Negotiations of Peace were carrying on, the Czar prepared to attack Ingria, a Frontier Province of Sweden. His Design was to act in concert with King Augustus, in Consequence of the secret Alliance which he had concluded with that Prince.

The Car's Conduct with Regard to Sweden had long given Reason to believe, that he meditated something to the Disadvantage of that Court, in fpite of all those Assurances to the contrary, which Matweof, his Ambaffador at the Hague, continually gave to the Swedish Minister; whilst that Prince made the fame Protestations to the Resident of his Swedish Majesty at Moscorv.

The better to deceive the Court of Sweden, and dissipate, if possible, all her Suspicions, the Czar sent an Ambassador to Charles XII. named Knees Andrew-Jacobowiz Chilkow, who arrived in Seeland the 29th, and transmitted to the King a Letter from the Czar, by which he affured his Swedish Majesty of an inviolable Friendship. This Envy, who had travelled in Italy, harangued the King in Italian, and affured him, that the Czar his Master would take the first Opportunity of of fending a folemn Embaffy, to give him fresh Proofs of his Friendship.

The King gave this Embassador a very gracious Reception; and as he faid, that he had Orders from the Czar to attend the Court every where, he accompanied the King to Christianstadt, where this Prince was come to press the Transportation into Livonia. But Affairs foon began to change their Complexion. As foon as the Czar's Troops were ready, he caused them to defile towards the Frontiers of Ingria. By Degrees, as these Troops approached thither, the Czar's Ministers in foreign Courts began to change their Language: They alledged, above all, I know not what Affront, fuppoied or true, done partly to the Person of the Czar himself, and partly to his Ambassadors at Riga; on which Subject a Writing was publish'd and dispers'd every where. The King of England and the States General gave themselves much Trouble to calm the Temper of the Czar: They promised him, that the Swedish Court would be very ready to give him all Kind of Satisfaction, as foon as the should precifely know in what she had offended. All these Representations were fruitless: The Czar laid Siege to Narva with a Army of 80,000 Men; and without making any other Declaration of War, he put all to Fire and Sword.

This Irruption awakened the Hopes of King Augustus, who was much alarmed at the Peace of Travendahl, and the Clause therein inserted, by which the King of Denmark was engaged not to assist either directly or indirectly the Enemies of the King of Sweden.

As Augustus could not besiege Riga, he contented himself with sending Parties into the Neighbourhood of that Town, to carry off all the Cattle and Forage that they could find. The News of the Czar's Irruption determined him to quit the Neighbourhood of Riga, and to content himself with the Conquests which he had already made on the other Side of the River, and endeavour to maintain them, till having drawn together greater Force he was in a Condition to act with more Vigour. To open a Communication between this River and Livonia. he caused some Troops to appear at feven in the Morning before Kokenbusen, a little Fort on this Side of the Dana, where there was a Garrison, consisting of a Major and 200 Men. Augustus repaired hither the Day sollowing with the Army, and gave Orders to Veldt-Marshal Steinau to summon the Commandant to surrender; which this Commandant resusing to do, he resolved to open the Siege in Form.

The Trenches were opened the same Night, and after some Days Continuance of the Siege, the Commandant, seeing the Enemy at the very Brink of the Mote, and ready to attack the Rampart, found himself obliged to capitulate. The Garrison marched out with all their Baggage, and repaired to Riga. The Commandant was instantly put under Arrest, for not having done his utmosk in the Desence of the Fort.

The King of Sweden, who was repaired from Christianstadt to Carlshaven, where was the Rendezvous of the greater Part of the Troops designed for Livonia, had yet heard nothing of these first Hostilities of the Czar. Here this Prince's Embassador had his Audience of Leave from the King, who received him in a very gracious Manner.

The Transports were ready to sail, when his Swedish Majesty received the News of the Siege of Narva, and of the first Hostilities exercised by the Muscovites, who put all to Fire and Sword. He was extremely surprized at hearing it; for, notwithstanding all the Reports which had been spread abroad of the March of the Russam Troops, he could not persuade himself, that the Czar had taken a Resolution to declare War against him; nor was he entirely convinced, till after he had an Account of this last Step of his Czarish Majesty.

Charles was touched to the Quick at the Extremity to which the Town of Narva was reduced. The Ruffians having presently summoned the Governor to surrender, threatened to push the Siege with all possible Vigour. On the Resusal of Baron Horn, who commanded in the Place, the Trenches were opened.

In this Condition stood the Siege of Narva, when his Majesty embark'd at Carlsbaven, accompanied by the Duke of Holstein, who was arrived from his own Estates three Days before. Counts Piper and Polus, and a great Number of Officers and Persons of Distinction, embarked also with his Majesty. The Duke accompanied the King some Leagues at Sea, and thence repaired to Stockbolm, to see the Dutchess his Spouse, who had been delivered of a Prince in April this Year. As Troubles were likewise to be apprehended from the Quarter of Pomerania, the Duke repaired thither to command the Troops, and at the same Time to put the Town of Stetin in a Condition of Defence.

The King arrived happily at Pernau with Part of the Transports; his Arrival revived the Courage of the Livonians, and inspired them with the greatest Hopes. The University of Pernau fignalized it elf on this Occafion by many Pieces both in Profe and Verse, which they took Care to make publick. The King stopt there near a Week, during which Stay the other Vessels arrived with the Troops; he made them difembark, and fuffer'd them to repose there some Days to refresh themselves after the Fatigues of the Sea. The first News that the King heard at his Arrival was, that the Czar had made many Attacks upon the Town of Narva without any Success. He afterwards understood, that the Country was entirely laid Waste ten Leagues round; and that this Prince designed to burn the Swedish Magazine at Wesenberg, and thence intended to march towards Revel.

It was to ward off this Blow, that the King went to Ryen, where Welling had posted himself after his leaving Riga. His Majesty, having reviewed the Body of Troops under that General, ordered him to march towards the Enemy, to cover Wesenberg, and to provide Quarters of Refreshment for the Army, which was inceffantly to follow. At the same Time the Colonels Schlippenbach and Skytt were detached towards the Town of Dorph, to observe the Motions of the Russians and Saxons; the first being encamped opposite to the Lake Peipus, and the Saxons on the Side of Kockenbusen. Schlippenbach surprized at Isnear Rapin on the Piepus, twelve Russian Vessels, which had come thither from the Neighbourhood of Narva.

The King, in his Return from Ryen to Pernau, stopt there again some Days, whence he afterwards marched to Revel, where he was received under a Discharge of the Cannon from the Ramparts. The Day of his Arrival, the provincial Colours of Plescon, which Colonel Schlippenbach had taken at the Battle of I/men, were presented This Enfign is extremely to him. large, on which are Figures very largely painted. When the Russians of this Province formerly went to War, they used to carry it with them, and to accompany it with much Re-Digitized by GOOGIE fpt & Tpest and Devotion; their Superstition making them believe, that if ever they lost it, they should be very unfortunate.

The King, at his Departure from Pernau, had detached some Regiments to join at Wesenberg General Welling, who was already arrived without having met any Body of the Enemy's Troops in his March; but a Lieutenant detached from his Vanguard, was encountered near Purts by a Party of 200 Men, whom, tho' he had with him no more than 20 Men, he nevertheless defeated and put to Flight.

General Welling having learnt at his Arrival at Wesenberg that 3000 Circassians were lodged some Leagues off in the Villages, sent a Major, named Patkul, with 300 Horse to furprize them; and Major Tisenhausen had Orders to support him with an equal Number. They arrived the fame Evening, and having come up with the Enemy, who had not put themselves in a Posture of Defence. atack'd them, and fet Fire to their Villages. The greater Part of them perished in the Flames; most of the others were killed, fome few only had the good Fortune to fave themselves under Favour of the Night and the Smoke, which concealed them from the Swedish Pursuit. The Fugitives repaired afterwards to General Scheremethoff, who kept himself at Pybajoki with a confiderable Body of Horse.

At this News the Muscovite General, putting himself at the Head of twenty one Squadrons, went to deliver the rest of these Troops. He found the Swedes yet busy in killing those whom the Fire had spared. He attacked them on all Sides, and posseffed himself of the Pass of Purts, to cut off their Retreat.

The Swedes seeing themselves hem'd in, undertook to break through the Enemy Sword in Hand; which succeeded; they overthrew a great Number, and thoroughly disengaged themselves. General Scheremethoff's Son was dangerously wounded in this Action. On the Side of the Swedes, Major Patkul and a Captain named Adercass were made Prisoners by the starting of their Horses, and were delivered some Time afterwards at the Battle of Nava.

Charles, who wished nothing more than to come to Blows with the Enemy, stay'd not long at Revel. The Count de Guiscard, the French Ambassador, was arrived from Stockholm to make the Campaign; he endeavoured to persuade the King to wait for the rest of his Army, that he might be more on an equal Foot with the Enemy: But nothing could cool the Courage of this Prince; and the formidable Forces of the Czar, together with the strong Fortifications of his Camp, instead of holding him back, only animated him the more.

His Resolution was taken, and nothing was capable of distuading him. Confiding therefore entirely in the Justice of his Cause, he departed from Revel with the few Troops that he had, and went to join Mr. Welling at Wesenberg. The Horse-guards, or Body-Regiment, which was arrived at Revel, departed immediately after the King. This Prince, notwithstanding his few Forces, detach'd Welling with a Body of 1050 Men on the Side of Dorpt, in order to support Colonel Skytt and cover the Frontiers.

All the Baggage, with every Thing which could retard their March, was left at Wesenberg, which is fifteen good Leagues from Narva, and the Soldiers were forbid to take any thing with them, which was not absolutely necessary for their Subsistence. The Army then marched through Purts to Pyhajoki; croffing a Country deserted, wasted, and where the Enemy had throughout left Marks of their Cruelty; the 17th of Novemb. after a laborious March, and at a Time when Provisions began to grow scarce, they! arrived at last at Pybajoki, a very difficult Pass, and which a small Number might dispute against a whole Army. General Scheremethoff was here posted with 600 Horse, fully resolved to make the Swedes pay very dear for their gaining it,

Major General Meidel, who commanded the Van-guard of 400 Horse, met at about a League distant a Troop of Russian Foragers; he had with him the Quarter-masters of the Army, who were to mark out a Camp.

As the Russians had a strong Escort, Mr. Meidel desired the King's Leave to attack them; on which this Prince advancing with his Army, hastened thither with a great Number of Officers, and charged the Foragers in an Instant, some of whom he took Prisoners, and the rest he put to Flight, pursuing them at their Heels with his sew People to that dangerous Pass where Scheremethoff was posted, in the Midst of a great Fire, as well of the small Arms as the Ordnance.

The King, being impatient to carry this important Post, brought up some of his Foot, at the same Time taking the Advantage of the Darkness of the Night to plant some Field-Pieces. The Russians were attacked with so much Vigour, that Scheremethoff, instead of making Head against us, sled with all his Horse full Speed, and was himself the Messenger to the Czar of the Enemy's Approach.

Mr. Palmquist, Lieutenant-Colonel. was order'd with a Battalion of Guards to take Possession of that important Defile, of which we had made ourselves Masters, and which was so much the more dangerous to attack and eafy to defend, for that between two steep Hills there is in the Middle a Torrent. with a steep and marshy Bank, in which Place, the Valley, being extremely narrow, may be defended by a few Men against a whole Army; add to this, that the Plain higher up on the Swedes Side was entirely open, and exposed to the Fire of the Cannon on the opposite Bank, where a great Number of Bushes cover'd the Enemv.

After we had carried this Post, the King judg'd it proper to be diligent. and take an Advantage of the Fright of the Enemy, without giving them Time to recover themselves; the rather, as our Provisions began to fail us, and we could not hope to find any more in a deferted and ruin'd Country. The Army then continued its March thro' Silleenegi, and arriv'd the 20th of November at Lagena, a League and a Half from Narva. We had! but 5000 Foot and 3000 Horse, the greater Part of which were Sick, and in no Condition of fighting. Indeed, considering the Condition of these Troops

Troops, no one would have believed that the King would so soon have attacked the Enemy, the Soldiers and Horses being so satigued: But as it was to be fear'd that the Enemy would soon put themselves in a Posture of Desence, the King thought proper to prevent them, and attack them without waiting for other Succours.

As foon as Charles had taken these Measures, he quitted Lagena, and came in fight of the Enemy at eleven in the Morning. The Czar had advantageously fortified his Camp, which extended from the Mill of Portei on the River which runs through Narva quite to Joela on the other Side of the Town, on the fame River, which makes a League in Length. trenchment was provided with a Bulwark, armed with a Chevaux de Frise, with deep Ditches, flank'd on the Outside with some Works, and on the Infide with several Batteries placed in the most advantageous Manner, and with a strong Line of Countervallation.

Notwithstanding the continual Fire of the Enemy, the King drew up his Army in order of Battle, conveying himseif to different Places to examine the most favourable Ground for the Attack. The Foot were then employed in getting together the necessary Fascines. After his Majesty had reconnoitred the weak Part of the Enemy's Intrenchments, he resolved on two general Attacks.

General Welling commanded the right Wing, which was to enter on the Side of Rathforff. The Attack was conducted by Major-General Poss, in the following Manner: Lieutenant Rhenschild, at the Head of fifty Grenadiers of the Guards, began the Attack. He was followed by the Battalion of Grenadiers of the Regiment of Gnards, commanded by Count Sperling, supported by three Battalions of Guards; that in the Middle under Mr. Palmquist, that on the Right commanded by Major Nummers, and that on the Lest by Captain Ebrensten. Next marched the Captains of the Guards, Charles Poss on the Right, and Capt. Sparr on the Lest.

These were supported by Colonel Knorring at the Head of a Battalion of Helfingers on the Right, and on the. Lest by Captain Cazimir Wrangel at the Head of a Battalion of Welmanland. Colonel Tisenbausen followed with a Battalion of Finland on the Right, Major Wulff in the Middle with a Battalion of Helfmgers, and Captain Kurck with a Battalion of Wesmanland on the Left. All the Horse on the right Wing, commanded by Lieutenant General Wachmeister, were ordered to support the Foot, and afterwards to enter the Enemy's Lines Sword in Hand.

The left Wing, which was ordered to attack on the Side of Wepschyle, was commanded by Lieutenant-General Rhenschild. We formed two Attacks; the first of which, consisting of two Columns, was led to the Right by Major-General Meidel. The first Column on the Right was under the Command of Lieutenant. Colonel Roos. who commanded a Battalian of Weim-He was followed by Captain Fock with another Bittalion of the fame Regiment, by Major Von Feilitz with a Battalion of Wesmanland, and by Captain Safs, who closed this Column with a Battalion of Finland. The fecond fecond Column to the Left had Lieutenant-Colonel Gryndel at their Head with three Battalions of Finland; the First commanded by Colonel Melin, the Second by Lieutenant-Colonel Lode, the Third by Major Berg.

These two Columns on the Right were ordered to attack the Intrenchment of the Enemy on that Side where they had raised a Battery, which commanded the Country and the Lines of the Intrenchment, in order to make themselves Masters thereof. The second Attack to the Lest was commanded by Count Stenbock, a Colonel, supported by a Battalion of Finland commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Hastebr. They were provided with a great Number of Fascines, to mount the Intrenchments.

This King was himself on this Wing with his Drabans, where he had flattered himself to be able to encounter the Czar; but this Prince departed that Morning for * Moscow, having left the Command of his Army to the Duke de Croy. Charles had with him Lieutenant-General Rhenschild, Count Arwid Horn, Major-General and Captain-Lieutenant of Drabans, and all the Horse of the left Wing, whereof Major-General Ribbing commanded the Corps de Reserve.

Mr. Sioblad, Grand Master of the Artillery, had placed his Battery on the Left Wing, which consisted of twenty one Field-Pieces; and Major Appelmann had another on the Right of fixteen Pieces.

As foon as the King had made thefe Dispositions, the Signal of Attack was given, which was the Discharge of two Fusees, and these Words, With the Assistance of God, which resounded through the whole Army. The Foot were instantly in Motion, and march'd directly to the Intrenchment. It was now two o'Clock in the Afternoon; and the Weather, which had continued hitherto ferene, was all of a fudden over-cast with a thick Cloud. which discharged itself in a Storm of Hail and Snow full in the Face of the Enemy, and caused them not to perceive the Approach of the Swedes till they were under their Cannon, and almost on the Brink of their Ditch.

The Attack of the Intrenchment was made with so much Bravery, and followed every where with so happy a Success, that the Foot made a Lodgment in less than a Quarter of a Hour, and prepared a Way for the Horse to enter. The Muscovites were now put to Flight, and dispersed themselves, notwithstanding all the Duke de Croy could do to rally them. Our Lest Wing chased the Right of the Enemy along the Intrenchment toward the River, whither they ran to gain the Bridge which they had built.

One Part of these frightened Troops attempted to get out of their Intrenchments, to save themselves the better; which the King perceiving, he attacked them at the Head of his Drabans and Dragoons of the Left Wing, and forced them back in Haste. In the mean Time our Infantry advanced briskly, and made a dreadful Slaughter of all they met. Several of those who were pursued to the River, had the Happiness to save themselves; but the Bridge being at length broken down under them, a great many perished in the Water.

[•] According to Mr. Voltaire, the Czar was not gone for Moscow, but towards Plescow, to hasten the March of 40,000 Men which were advancing from that Quarter; with which other Accounts seem likewise to agree.

The others being hemmed in between the Swedes and the River. refolved to defend themselves like Men in Despair. They had yet at their Head a great Part of their Generals: but the Duke de Croy, General Allart. and feveral others, had already furrender'd themselves to the King. They found some Houses and Barracks, behind which they took Shelter, and barricadoed themselves with their Waggons and every Thing they could meet with. There they defended themselves with more Bravery than was expected; and notwithstanding the terrible and continual Fire of the Swedes, we could not force them.

The Battle became the more fierce and bloody, by reason of the Darkness which now came on. The King, who was now with some Horse on the Outlide of the Intrenchment, ran to a Place where he heard a Noise, followed only by his Chamberlain, whose Name was Axel Hordb. As he passed by a Morass he sunk in, whence some Valets, who were near, having drawn him out, he left his Sword and one Boot behind, which were afterwards This Accident did not hinder him, with one Boot only, from putting himself at the Head of his Foot, whom he yet found engaged with the Enemy, the Fire continuing on both Sides with great Violence.

the Left. They had already put the Enemy to Flight, and the greater Part of the Foot came afterwards to join the Left Wing at their Attack.

The Night coming on put a Stop to the Battle, and the King made use of that Time to prepare for a new Attack. He drew out his Army between the Town and the Intrenchments, in fuch a Manner that it could not be surprized. He gave Orders at the fame Time to Mr. Sioblad, Grand Master of the Artillery, Major-General Meidel, and Count Stenbock, to go with some Troops and attack a Hill where the Enemy had their principal Buttery, which commanded all the Intrenchments, by being Masters of which, the Swedes might henceforth hinder the Communication between the two Wings of the Enemy,

The Muscovites seeing that at last they should be forced to surrender. their Right Wing being shut up on the River of Narva, sent the same Evening to the King to submit to his Mercy. Charles having consented to their Request, the Kneez Jacob Feodorowits Dolgoruki, Commissary-General of War, the General Affemon Michalowits Golowin, and the Prince of Melita, Grand Master of the Artillery, came to furrender to his Majesty, and lay their Arms at his Feet. They declared they submitted themselves with all their Men Prisoners, and instantly delivered up that Post which they had fo long defended, which was presently ordered to be kept by two Battalions of Guards.

The King, contented with the Submission of these Troops, permitted them to retire with their Arms, which they did the next Day at sour in the Morning, Morning, over the Bridge that they had repaired. The Conqueror however reserved all their Colours and Standards, and retained all their Officers of Distinction as Prisoners of War.

As foon as General Weide, who commanded the broken Remains of the Enemy's Left Wing, had learnt the Fate of the Right, which he was cut off from joining, he fent at break of Day his Aide-de-Camp with a Drum and a Letter directed to the General who commanded in chief, to submit himself at Discretion. The King, having opened the Letter, answer'd, that he granted the Troops Leave of returning into their own Country, but without their Arms.

Charles received all these Muscovite Regiments, who threw their Colours and Standards at his Feet. They afterwards siled off, as well Officers as Soldiers with their Heads bare, and a Stick in their Hands, along the Intrenchment and the Camp towards the River, and passed over the same Bridge which we just now mentioned: There was so great a Number of them, that the March continued till the next Morning.

Such was the Success of this great Day, which will be always samous in History, in which a young Hero entirely deseated an intrenched Army of 80,000 Men.

The Swedes found a great Quantity of Riches in the Enemy's Camp; but nothing was comparable to the fine Train of Artillery which fell into the Hands of the Conqueror: It confifted of 145 Pieces of Brass Cannon, all new cast, and of different Bores; 28 new Mortars, of different Sizes; with a Quantity of warlike Stores, fix Pair of Kettle-Drums, 151 Colours, 20 Standards, without reckoning those taken in the Action, and those which were afterwards found in the Field of Battle; a prodigious Quantity of Firearms, the Czar's military Chest with 262,000 Crowns, all their Tents, and vast Provisions of Victuals and Forage.

The Musicovites lost at least 18,000 Men, including those who were drowned in the Narva; of the Swedes there were not above 2000, either killed or wounded.

Among the Prisoners of War were the Duke de Croy, their Commander in chief; Dolgoruki, Commissary-General of War; Golowin and Adam Weid, Generals of Foot; the Knez Iwan Jurgenits Trubetskoi, Governor of Novogrod and General; Artschelowits, Prince of Melita in Georgia, and Grand Master of the Artillery; Allart, Lieutenant General and chief Engineer; Baron Lang, Major-General and Envoy of Poland; Iwan Iwanowits Buturlin, Major-General; Blumberg, Colonel of the Czar's Guards Von Kragen, Colonel of Artillery; the Colonels Fort, Von Deelen, Jacob Gordon, Schnecherg, Gulitz, Pindegrand, Wiethoff, Jordan, and Iwanitski; not to mention a great Number of Lieutenant-Colonels, Majors, and Captains.

We must not here forget what the Duke de Croy said to Mr. Guiscard speaking of this Battle: He assured him, that when he saw the Swedish Army, after it had come out of the Wood of Lagena, drawn up in Order of Battle and approaching him, that he thought it was only their Vanguard, not being able to believe that the King of Sweden would have dared to attack an Army so well intrenched, and so infinitely superior to his own. This Duke, to whom the Czar had left the supreme Command of his Troops, died a Year afterwards at Revel in his Way to Moscow.

The King signalized himself in a very extraordinary Manner on this samous Day, exposing himself in all Places where the Fire was the briskest: He received however no Wound, but in the Evening a Ball was found in his black Cravat, which had lodged there without doing him the least Mischief.

As foon as every Thing was quiet, the King encampt his Troops along the Intrenchment, and fent the Sick and Wounded into Narva, into which Town he made his victorious Entry, followed by a great Number of Officers, and by his Drabans, amidst the repeated Acclamations of the Inhabitants, who were transported with Joy at feeing themselves delivered by their own Master, after having suffered the Inconveniencles of a Siege which had lasted near ten Weeks. Colonel Horn, who had defended this Place, was very well received by his Majesty, who made him a Major-General.

The King's first Care, after his victorious Entry into Narva, was to return solemn Thanks to God for the Victory which he had won. The 26th was appointed for this Ceremony. To Deum was sung, with the Discharge of the Cannon of the Town, of the Castle of Ivanogrod, of the Camp and the Intrenchments; and all the Troops, which were under Arms, gave a double Salvo from their small Arms.

As 'twas much to be fear'd that the Army would want Provisions, the King thought that Inconvenience was to be timely prevented. On an Account therefore which he received, that the Enemy had abandoned a Magazine of Corn at Jama, a Castle situated some Leagues from Narva, he went thither himself in Person, and order'd the whole to be convey'd to Narva, together with two Brass Mortars which the Muscovites had lest behind them in the Castle. However, as these Provisions were not yet sufficient, the King was under some Uneasiness on this Account.

In Reality, the Country was entirely destroy'd, and his Majesty would not resolve on sending Parties into the neighbouring Provinces of the Enemy, tearing left the Inhabitants should withdraw themselves from the Frontiers with all their Cattle and Provifions; they therefore took other Meafures. The King thought proper to give his Protection to those Provinces which depended on the Muscovites bordering on Ingria, allowing them the fame Liberty of Commerce which they had before. This Method produced for some Time the desired Effect; the necessary Provisions were brought to the Camp, for which the Money was not only paid, but advanced before-hand.

In the mean while the Czar, somewhat recovered from his Consternation, occasioned by the Loss of the Battle of Narva, drew together the dispersed Remains of his Army, which he quarter'd at Plescow, at Pitschur, at Iburski, and on the Frontiers of Livonia, where he detached them several Ways to burn and pillage the Country.

ed the River of Aa, near Dorpt, to observe the Motions of the Enemy, 2000 Muscovites were posted at Neubausen, an old Castle near Rapin, where they intrenched themselves, in order to lay the Neighbourhood under Contribution.

Lieutenant-Colonel Romanowitz was detached on that Side with 400 Men, both Foot and Horse, to dislodge As he had no Cannon, he endeavoured to draw them into the open-Field, and there give them Battle. With this View he dismounted his Dragoons, and advancing with his Foot up to the Pallisades, he made a Discharge on the Enemy, by which some of them fell. He afterwards feigned a Retreat, and that with such Precipitation, that the Muscovites looking on it as a Flight, came out of their Intrenchments to charge the Swedes; on which they faced about, and received the Enemy so vigorously. that they immediately overthrew them. The Muscovites, being put to Flight, attempted to regain the Castle, but were pursued so briskly, that great Numbers of them were killed. Some of those, who were able to save themselves, took the Road of Pitschur, and the rest shut themselves up in Neubausen.

The Swedes by this Means gave Liberty to a great Number of Peafants, whom the Muscovites were carrying into Slavery. As the Enemy might receive Succours from Pitschur, Romanowitz retired during the Night into the next Village, whence he sent out little Parties to make Discoveries: These reported, that the Enemy had abandoned Neubausen, leaving more than 200 dead behind them; and that the Muscovites had done the same Thing at Rapin.

In the mean while Provisions grew every Day more scarce at Narva. which the Troops felt the more by Reason of their Fatigue in their late hard Campaign. The King, seeing it impossible to take up his Winter-Quarters in that Town, refolved to enter into Livonia, where he might be able to make Head against all his Enemies. Before his Departure, he fent Major-General Meidel with the Finland Troops towards Valknarva, where the Enemy seemed to have a Defign of approaching, with Orders to hinder them from committing any Destruction.

The King quitted Narva the 13th of December, with his Army, to put them into Winter-Quarters near Dorps, on the Frontiers of Livonia. The Regiment of Horse-guards was gone before, and had already posted themselves at Koikel, on the Lake Peipus, to cover the Frontiers.

As Baron Spens, Colonel of that Regiment and a Major-General, was then absent, the Lieutenant-Colonel marched a Detachment to Neubausen, where he lest Captain Muller with 100 Horse to defend that Post. Muller was presently attacked by some thousand Muscovites, who gave him a furious Assault, which he sustained three Hours together with great Valour, obliging the Enemy at length to retire with the Loss of 300 Men.

The 19th of December, 1700. the King arrived at Lais, an old Castle six Leagues from Dorpt, which he chose for his head Quarters: His Troops were quartered in the Neighbourhood and on the Frontiers; Baron Spens at Sagnitz, Colonel Schlippen-bach in the Neighbourhood of Marienburg, and Colonel Albedybl at Ronnenburgh. The King cast his Eyes on Volmar as a proper Place for his Magazine.

Charles, who was always indefatigable, failed not to visit all his Troops with the utmost Exactness, and to provide for their Safety, by covering and securing them against the frequent Excursions of the Muscovites and Saxons.

As to Ingria and Finland, Major-General Cronbiort was ordered to repair thither with a Body of 6000 Men, and post himself on the Frontiers. Towards the End of December, Count Guiscard, Ambassador from France, arrived at Lais, and had immediately a very gracious Audience of his Majesty, whom he congratulated in the Name of the King his Master, upon the Victory which he had gained at Narva.

The Troops now fuffer'd much in their Winter-Quarters, by a Distemper which was almost general, occafioned by the laborious Marches and continual Enterprizes in the late Seafon, and through those miserable Huts in which they were obliged to lodge their Soldiers for want of Houses. The King, who was extremely touched with their Sufferings, went about continually amongst them to inform himfelf of their Condition: He prevailed fo much by his Presence and the infinite Care which he took, that the Distemper abated by little and little, and did not do so much Mischief as it seemed This Prince's Court was not exempt from it; and amongst many Persons that were attacked by it, Count Wreed, the King's Chamberlain, died on the 10th of January, universally lamented on Account of his Merit and fine Qualities.

Towards the End of this Year. Count Stenbock, Major-General, was ordered to make Reprisals on the Rusfians, who had fet fire to many Places on the Lake Peipus. With this View he passed the Frontiers with 1000 Men, Horse and Foot, near Andowa, to surprize that little Town; but the Rigour of the Season, a thick Mist, together with the strong Garrison of Strelitzes, which were there, added to his Want of Cannon, made him change his Resolution. After having gained many Advantages over those Parties of the Enemy which he could come up with, and after having fet Fire to several Places, he repassed the Frontiers in the Beginning of January, 1701.

On the other hand Colonel Schlippenbach, who had been ordered to coast along the River of Aa, and to observe the Motions of the Saxons at Kokenbusen, being informed that they had appeared about Marienburg, took a Resolution to make himself Master of that Place, and to drive them farther off. It was to be feared, that they would have fortisted themselves here, on Account of the Situation of the Place, which was very advantageous to them, and very proper to incommode all the adjacent Parts.

Schlippenbach acquainted the King with his Design of possessing himself of this Post; and he advanced immediately, that he might be in Readiness to execute his Majesty's Orders. Two Days afterwards a large Body of Coslacks having appeared before the Place, Major Zoge was detached with 350 Men to pursue them. He killed 30 of them, and made some Prisoners. The King, who very much approved Mr. Schlippenbach's Design, sent him a Reinforcement of 200 Foot Soldiers. drawn out of the Garrison of Dorpt, with some Pieces of Cannon. Colonel made so good Use of them, that in a few Days, having raised the Rampart, he put this Place, which was environed with a Morals, into fo good a Condition of Defence, that he not only hindered the Excursions of the Enemy, but made some very successful ones himself, having established his Quarters here for the rest of the Winter.

In the mean Time the King, who was not pleased at the frequent Irruptions of the Rushans, went to reconneitre the Lake Peipus; and as the Body-Guards were yet in their Quarters of Refreshment, Baron Spens, now Lieutenant General, was ordered to march towards Sagnitz, to enter into Winter-Quarters. There remained now at Neubausen but one Lieutenant with 30 Horse, who three Days afterwards were attacked by 400 Muscovites, whom they bravely repulsed.

As to Colonel Schlippenhach, having received Advice that the Saxons had laid up a Magazine at Seffwegen, and had forced the Inhabitants of the Country to bring in their Corn, to be afterwards conveyed to Kokenhusen, he detached Lieutenant Colonel Brands thither, who with 400 Horse made himself Master of the Magazine, and conducted to Marienburg near a thousand Ton of Corn.

The King seeing the Saxons defert

every Day in great Numbers, thought proper, after distributing Money amongst them, to send them all to Revel. This Prince, who was always in Action, to amuse the rest of his Time, discovered some Taste for Hunting; to entertain which, Count Stenbock, on his Return from his last Expedition, made a great Hunting-Match for his Majesty on St. Charles's Day, which was followed by a fine Entertainment and other Diversions.

Publick Rejoycings were every where celebrated through Sweden and the conquered Provinces, on Account of the Victory of Narva, but above all at Stockholm, where they made the most magnificent Entertainments and Illuminations. Te Deum was sung, accompanied with a Discharge of the Cannon, and the whole City was illuminated in the Evening, to which Baron Tessin, afterwards made Marshal of the Court, and one of the greatest Architects of his Age, contributed by a thousand beautiful Devices.

Whilst they were busy in celebrating this Victory, the King, who was always attentive to every Opportunity, refolv'd to surprize Pitschur, a Place situated on the Frontiers of Livonia, and which afforded the Enemy a Retreat after every Excursion; for which Purpose Lieutenant-General Spens was dispatched with the Regiment of Horse-Guards, and was joined in his March on the Frontiers by Colonel Schlippenback and his Dragoons, with some Foot from the Garrison of Marienburg, and a great Number of Peasants proper to ravage the Enemy's Country. Spens being arrived before this Town at Break of Day, on the 13th of February, attacked the Russians who who were posted here, so briskly, that our Men kill'd more than 500 before they came up to the Barrier. We pursued them into the Town, where a great Number of Russians, who had barricaded themselves within the Houses, whence they discharged on us with great Violence and Despair, were burnt by the Livonian Peasants, who set Fire to the sour Corners of the Town, and also a Quantity of Hides and dress'd Leather, and a large Magazine of Hemp; the Loss arising from this Conslagration amounting in all to near a Million.

Some of those who fled faved themfelves in a Convent surrounded by a strong Wall mounted with Cannon, and fituated on an Hill which commands the Town; of which the Enemy taking Advantage, made a hot Fire on the Swedes, who were scattered in the several Parts of the Town, and thereby obliged the General, who had no Ordnance, to retire, after having caused the Peasants to bring off. all the Booty which they could fave from the Flames. We had 30 Men killed in this Rencounter, and about 60 wounded. Mr. Spens returned directly to Sagnitz, and Schlippenbach to Marienburg, whence, on the 20th of February, he sent out a Party of 200 Men. Horse and Foot, who penetrated between Pitschur and the Polish Livonia as far as Iburski, having with them a Captain named Axel Green, an Engineer, to reconnoitre the Ground and the Situations of Places.

These Troops deseated several Russian Parties in their Way, and brought off a Quantity of Provisions, and a Number of Prisoners. The Town of Iburshi, which lyes in a Triangle with Plescow and Pitschur, is situated on an high Mountain, and defended by some Works. The Czar, after the Rout at Narva, had placed good Garrisons in these three Towns; viz. 6000 of his best Troops at Plescow, sour Regiments of Circassians at Iburshi, and 4000 Men at Pitschur, to cover the Frontiers, and make frequent Excursions into Livonia.

That Prince, after his hasty Return to Moscow, proceeded from thence to Birsen in Lithuania the 21st of February, to have there an Interview with the King of Poland. Here these two Princes, after three Weeks Conference, renewed their Alliance, and the Czar promised to supply 20,000 Men, and large Sums of Money, to push on the War with Vigour against the common Enemy. After this Interview the Czar repaired to Dunamund, passed through Mittau, and returned by Birsen to Moscow; and the King of Poland took the Road of Warsovia.

Colonel Schlippenbach, encouraged by the successful Excursions of his Men, fent out a new Party, who, after having made great Destruction, brought back a large Quantity of Provisions and many Prisoners. General Spens on his Side detached a Captain with an hundred Horse, followed by a great Number of Peafants, who passing over the Peipus, which was frozen, advanced within four Leagues of Plescow. This Expedition was not fruitless; for having met a Body of Strelitzes, they entirely defeated them, and returned laden with Booty and Prisoners, after having burnt all the Places they found in their Road.

About

About this Time a Phænomenon appeared at Noon-day at Lais; this was two Suns, each furrounded with different Arches, and feeming to form a double X. The ignorant and fuper-fitious immediately cried up this Appearance as a Miracle; and there were fome, who even attempted to make use of it as an Opportunity of making their Court to the King, who only laughed at and treated them as Dreamers, having too good Sense, and too good an Understanding to form any superstitious Judgment on the Occafion.

Adolphus John Stegeborg, Prince Palatine, and the King's nearest Relation, who after his Descent in Seeland had returned to Stockholm, died at Lais, whither he had repair'd after the Battle of Narva, to make a Campaign against the Saxons. He was attacked with a Purple Fever, which, after a few Days Illness, carried him off the 25th of March.

He was of the Family of the Princes of Deux-ponts, and Uncle, according to the Custom of Britany, to the King, his Father having been the younger Brother of Charles Gustavus, King of Sweden. He had one Brother and many Sisters: In Sweden they were commonly called Princes of Stegeborg, from an Appendage situated in Ostragothia, given to them by Charles Gustavus, together with some other Revenues which they drew from Bremen and other Places.

The King was at Lais, when he received a Petition from the Swedish Ladies, to defire a Year's Prolongation of the Permission to wear foreign Stuffs, which this Prince had lately forbidden through all his Dominions, in order to promote the filken Manufactory some Years since established at Stockholm. This Petition was in Verse, and well written; and though the King was not naturally fond of Women, he had however so much Complaisance for them, that notwithstanding the Usefulness of the Ordinance, he granted their Request in the most gracious Manner, which Favour produced a second Piece of Poetry sull of Thanks and Acknowledgments.

In the mean while Colonel Schlippenbach, having understood that the Russians were drawn together on the Side of Pisschur, detached a Party of 60 Troopers and 20 Dragoons to observe their Motions. These met near Newbausen a Party of some hundred Cossacks, detached from the Garrison of Iburski, to make Excursions into Livonia. The Cossacks were entirely deseated, pursued three Leagues, and 40 of them with a Circassan Officer taken Prisoner.

General Spens, mon his Side, fent out Major Creutz with several hundred Men of his Regiment. The Major advanced close to Plescow, defeated several Russian Parties on the Road, and brought back a considerable Number of Prisoners.

About this Time Colonel Schlippen-bach detached from Marienbeurg Lieutenant - Colonel Brandt, with 130 Horse and a great many Officers, who served as Voluntiers; these scouring round Pitschur and Iburski, without any Interruption from the Garrisons, set Fire to several thousands of Houses, which they reduced to Ashes, and spread an universal Terror and Alarm. These Excursions were afterwards continued with sometimes greater and formefometimes less Parties, in order to curb the Enemy, and keep him in continual Fear.

During all the Month of April, the King took the Pains to visit the Quarters and review the Troops, which had been weakened by Distempers, of which however they began now to re-He fent at the fame Time Courier upon Courier, to hasten the Embarkation of 12,000 Men from Sweden, in order to act with more Vigour against the Saxons, who worked without ceafing on the Fortifications of Kokenbusen, and had for that Purpose conveyed thither a Reinforcement of 300 Horse and 600 Foot, with fome Cannon, and had likewise heaped up a great Quantity of Corn at Erla, some Leagues off, which they designed for the Desence of Kokenbusen. Colonel Albedybl, who was then quartered at Ronnenburg, being advised of this, detached Captain Traufetter with 120 Horse, to which was joined a small Detachment from the Garrison of Marienbourg, with Orders to bring away all the Corn which they should find at Erla. Captain heard at his Approach, that the Enemy were ready to depart with all their Provisions, and that the Escorte, in great Certainty of Success, had marched before, without fearing the least Accident to their Convoy. Trautfetter attacked them immediately, took 37 Waggons loaded with Provisions, and brought them back fafely to Ronnenbourg, without the Enemy's taking the Pains to pursue him. This Plunder was conveyed to the Magazine which was preparing at Volmar, whither Colonel Albedybl went a few Days afterwards with all his Detachment to cover and defend it, leaving at Ronnenburg only Captain Rorentz, a famous Partisan, with a small Detachment for the Desence of that Post.

As foon as the Transports, which were preparing in Sweden, were in a Condition to put to Sea, several Regiments of Horse, Foot, and Dragoons, embarked at Stockholm and other Ports of the Kingdom, and arrived by the Middle of May safe at Revel. The King was highly delighted at their Arrival, seeing himself now able to open the Campaign with a considerable Force. He sent them immediate Orders, after a few Days Rest, to come and join him, intending a very early March toward the Enemy.

The Transports returned to Sweden with the Generals and other Russian Officers taken at Narva, who were all conducted to Stockbolm, except the Duke de Croy, who by very earnest Instances obtained Leave to stay at Revel, where he died the Year sollowing.

On the 22d of May the Artillery first began to quit their Winter-Quarters; all the Regiments were immediately thereon put in Motion. Towards the End of the Month the King encamped with the Army half a League from Dorpt. As it might be easily foreseen that this Country, as soon as we had quitted it, would be certainly insested by the Russians, several Detachments of Horse and Foot, with a strong Militia, which had been raised in the Winter, were ordered to guard the Frontiers, and to act against the

the Russians. The Command of these Troops was given to Colonel Schlip-

penbach.

Admiral Nummers received Orders to equip a small Squadron on the Lake Peipus, to cruize there, and hinder the Descents of the Enemy. Major-General Cronbiort, at the Head of 6000 Men, covered Ingria; and Narva had a strong Garrison against any Attack which the Rushans should make on that Place.

The Saxons having received an Account of the King of Sweden's Preparations, neglected nothing on their Side to put themselves in a Posture of Defence. Colonel Boss, Governor of Kokenbusen, after having raised the Ramparts, and added several new Works with Batteries, built a Bridge over the Duna, to open a free Communication; and the Saxons formed a Camp of several Regiments under the Cannon of the Fort.

A Report was industriously spread, that this Camp confisted of 10,000 regular Troops; but it was certainly not so strong, the Regiments being weak, and for the most Part consisting of Lithuanians and Cossacks dress'd in the German Fashion. They were ordered by continual Excursions to carry off all the Provision and Forage; which they did a great Way up in the Country, finding the Pealants of those Parts fufficiently inclined to furnish them with whatever they demanded.

What had been forefeen of the Ruffians came to pass; for no sooner had the King quitted his Winter Quarters, than they appeared in great Numbers on the Frontiers near Kirumpa and Koikel. Colonel Patkul; who commanded there, had the Advantage of them in several little Skirmishes.

The Saxons on the other Side, enraged at the frequent Excursions of Captain Lorentz, an able and successful Partifan, resolved to attack him in his Post of Ronnenburg. He had with him in that miserable Town no more than 60 Dragoons and 50 Foot, with 40 Voluntiers, who followed him every where. He was attacked with all possible Vigour, but defended himself so well, that the Saxons, after three furious subsequent Assaults, retired, leaving a Captain, a Corporal, and 12 Men Prisoners, and carrying with them 12 Waggons full of their Dead and Wounded.

The King, after the Arrival of his new Regiments, having all the Forces which he had designed against the Saxons teady to march, decamped from Dorpt on his Birth Day, at the Head of a fine well cloathed Army, inflamed with Eagerness to come to Blows with the Enemy. He marched the first Day but three Leagues to Terrafer, and on the next Day arrived at Ringen, an old Castle, where he halted one Day.

On the 20th he continued his March to Ramakybla, or Platers-Krug. the 2 if the advanced to Walk, a small Town. The same Day the Saxons, after having passed through Venden with 400 Horse, attacked at Neumublen, near Riga, two Captains of Horse, whole Names were Fittingbof and Kleebek, who commanded a Detichment of 80 Troopers; these they entirely defeated, having killed 50, and made the rest Prisoners, together with their two Captains, of whom Flitting bof was mortally wounded.

F 2 The

The 22d the King received Advice, that the Saxons had appeared near Volmar; on which General Spans had Orders to detach four Companies of the Horse-Guards to attack them: He tollowed himself with the Rest of the Regiment, and passed the River Aa; but the Saxons were gone before his Arrival. On the 23d the Army decamped from Walk, and went to Strenitz. The 24th they arrived at Volmar, where they halted two Days.

The 27th they marched to Lindenbof, a Gentleman's Seat, and arrived the next Day at Arrachs, or Old Venden. They passed thro' the Town of Venden, where a Saxon Party of some hundred Horse had carried off a Quantity of Victuals. The 29th the Army arrived at Nielau, where they rested one Day. On the second of July they continued their March to Lindberg, and the Day following came into the Neighbourhood of Rodenpois and Sissegallen, where they staid some Days.

To give the Enemy some Diversion, the King detached from the Camp Lieutenant-Colonel Meyerfelds towards Kokenbusen. Col. Helmers was ordered at the same Time to leave Riga, with 600 Men and 12 Field-Pieces. and to take the same Rout. General Steinau, thinking he had no longer Room to doubt the Attack of Kokenbusen, hastened with all Diligence to fettle every Thing; and ordered feveral Regiments, which lay encamped opposite to Riga, to follow him, he returned however presently, on Advice that the King was with the Army at Riga.

Col. Helmers took in his Rout 21 Boats loaded with Provisions, which he fent to the King at Riga. His Majesty passed the 7th thro' Neumublen, with all his Army, which marched that Day two Leagues and an half, and encamped under the Cannon of the Town. The 8th Lieut. Col. Meyerfeldt returned from his Expedition, having taken near Kokenbusen an advanced Guard of 22 Men, with a Lieutenant.

The Saxons had no sooner Notice of the King's March, than they quitted their Camp at Kokenbusen, and hastily repassed the Duna; which, as soon as they had done, they set diligently about making Intrenchments along this rapid River, to dispute the Swedes Passage.

As General Steinau could not directly know where this Passage might be attempted, he was obliged to be on his Guard in all Parts, and to divide his Forces, which continued however very numerous, without reckoning the strong Garrisons of Dunamund, Cobrun, and Kokenbusen. The old Veldt-Marshal Count Dablberg, who faw the Works of the Saxons advancing daily, placed fome Prames over the Duna mounted with a great Number of Cannons, which they fired incelfantly on their Redoubts and Breastworks, as well on the Isle of Dablbolm. as on the other Side of the River. Whatever Mischief the Saxons received from hence, it did not hinder them from continuing their Works, which it was their Interest to finish with the utmost Expedition.

The Swedish Army was foon in a Condition to pass the River. This was owing to the indefatigable Care of Count Dablberg, an old experienced General, with whom the King had many Conferences on this Subject at Riga, whither he often came from Hodenpois. They worked very hard at Riga on their floating Bridge, on which the Horse were to pass over, but 'twas not finished 'till after the Battle; and as for the Foot, they had got together all the Vessels and Ferry-Boats which they could find. The King went often himself to reconnoitre the Banks, and then gave his Orders to Baron Stuart, to make the necessary Dispositions for an Attack.

The 8th, at nine in the Evening, all the Infantry filed off with profound Silence towards the River to the Place of Embarkation, called Fassenbolm; and under Favour of the Night, they embarked as many as they had Vessels to carry over, without giving the least Suspicion to the Enemy. As to the Horse, for want of Boats, no more than the Drabans, 100 of the Horse, and as many of the Dragoon-Guards could be got over.

The Foot which embarked consisted of four Battalions of Guards, two Battalions of the Regiment of Upland, commanded by Baron Lowen, two of Dabl-Carlia under Count Stenbock, a Battalion of Helfinghers under Col. Knorring, two Battalions of the Regiment of Westmanland under Baron Axel Sparr, and one of Westerboton under Mr. Fersen; the rest of the Foot remained behind for Want of Transports.

The Generals, appointed for this Attack, were General Welling, with the Lieutenant Generals Spens and Horn for the Horse; and for the Foot, Baron Lieuwen, Lieutenant-General, and the Major-Generals Stenbock, Poss and Stuart.

This Disposition was afterwards totally changed at the Attack, which was carried on in a Manner entirely different from the first Plan which the King had formed: all these Generals being placed indifferently at the Head of their Regiments in the same Order as they came to Land. It was at first proposed, that the Horse should pass over with the Artillery, and attack the Redoubts directly, before they advanced towards the Enemy; but this was found impracticable.

On the 9th, at four in the Morning, all the Troops, notwithstanding the bad Weather, which had continued several Days, began their March within a short Quarter of a League of the Town, to pass over the River.

The King, attended by an Aid de-Camp General, by his Equerry Keuter-Crantz, and his Page Klinkenstrom, put himself into a little Boat by the Side of the Granadiers of his Guards, who were to begin the Attack. They had got into the Middle of the River, when the Enemy perceiving our Boats, began to fire from their two Redoubts.

This Discharge was without Effect, our two Prames, which covered the Transports, returning them full Broadfides, and the Cannon of the Town and Citadel discharging on their Works without Cessation. The General * was now beat through the whole Army of the Enemy, who drew up in Order of Battle in two Lines, between the two Redoubts, having their Horse on their Wings, and the Foot in the Centre.

[&]quot; A particular Beat of the Drum fo call'd, by which the whole Camp are fummoned to Arms,

They were commanded by Veldt-Marshal Steinau, Prince Ferdinand of Courland, and Lieutenant-General Patkul, the two latter commanding each one of the Wings. The Army confisted of four Regiments of Horse, all Cuirassiers, and sourteen Battalions, with the Dragoons of Milebaw. In their Reserve were twenty-four Battalions of Russians, but these ran away on the first Repulse of the Saxons.

The King caused his Troops inflantly to disembark opposite to where the Enemy were drawn up, himself leaping on the Land one of the first, with his Sword drawn. The Foot hastened at the same Time on all Sides from their Boats, and drew up in a single Line as fast as they could get to Land.

The King placed himself with Mr. Liewen at the Head of his Granadiers, and marched forthwith with all his Line directly to the Enemy. The Drabans under Major General Horn, and 50 of the Horse-guards under Mr. Spens, were drawn out to cover the Right Wing.

At this Instant the Saxon, attacked our Foot with altonishing Vigour, but were repulled by a Volley from our Musqueteers, which being discharged when they were almost close, obliged then to retire. On the other Side, some of the Enemies, Squadrons attacked the Drabans and the 50 Horse on the Right Wing, who sustained their Fire, and then repulsed them Sword in Hand, driving them back on their second Line. The Enomy were not dismayed at this ill Success, but returned a second Time to the Charge with all their Foot ranged in one Line; they were however obliged again to give Ground, which the Swedes gained by little and little, elpecially after they had carried one of their Redoubts.

As our Right Wing was too much exposed, the Enemy, who were a third Time returned to the Charge. attacked it in the Flank with their Horse, and obliged the Battalion of Granadier Guards to give back with fome Precipitation; but rallying immediately, they fulfained the Efforts of the Enemy with an admirable Firmness, till our Drabans, attacking them in the Rear, obliged them to an hasty Retreat. The Samons made a new Attempt on the Right Wing with great Bravery; but General Stuart, who was ordered to cover them with a Battalion of Fersen and the rest of the Horse, rendered their Attack fruitless. Our Foot were now entirely passed, and almost as strong as the Enemy.

The Saxons seeing themselves reduced to an Impossibility of resisting any longer, gave Ground by little and little, remaining however unbroke; about leven in the Morning, after an obstinate and bloody Fight of three Hours, they retreated with Precipitation two different Ways. The greater Part of the Foot took the Road to Cobrum, and the rest with most of the Horse drew towards Dunamund, our Horse being too weak to pursue them. The King, who had fought on Foot during the whole Action at the Head of his Infantry, pursued with his Lest Wing those who fled towards Cobrun, till General Rheinschild came up with his Regiment of Dragoon Guards, but too late to overtake the Enemy, who were now got at a good Distance.

When.

When the King came to Cobrun, he found the Enemy had abandoned that Place, the Garrison being retreated to Kokenbusen along the Duna. General Spens was detached with some Horse to cut off their Retreat: In the mean Time our Troops entered the Fort, and made themselves Masters of the great Magazine which the Enemy had gathered together at Marin-Mulh. All the Army being now assembled, encamped near Cobrun, whither Major-General Morner came about Noon with his Regiment, which had just passed the River.

The small Redoubts, which the Enemy had raised on the Banks of the River, had surrendered at the Begin, ning of the Battle; but there remained one at Lutzausholm on an Island of the Duna, and another little Fort near Kramers bof on the Side of Dunamund. This latter Post, possessed by 40 Saxons and 50 Russians, was carried by General Chorner, who obliged these Troops to surrender at Discretion, tho' he had with him no more than ten Horse-men.

As to Laszaufbolm beyong Cobrun; 400 Rustians were intrenched there up to the Teeth, whom Colonel Helmers and Lieutenant Colonel Wrangle were ordered to attack with a Body of 500 Men. The Colonel embarked his Command, and arriving a little after Midnight, began the Attack immediately; the Eight was very sharp on both Sides, the Enemy making a desperate Desence; norwithstanding which, our Troops emer'd by Break of Day, and put all they met to the Sword. The King coming up in the Heat of the Slaughter, saved the Lives of 20 Russans, which were the only ones spared. Here Colonel Helmers, Major Lilliestirna, with many other brave Officers, lost their Lives.

The Business was at an End. when the King, who was yet busy in examining the Works which the Enemies had abandoned, saw the Magazine of Powder, which was at Cobrun, blown all at once into the Air: For the Enemy, on their Retreat, had planted a lighted Match, which taking Effect, overthrew an entire Bastion. and killed a Centinel. The Horses of our Cavalry, which were encamped with the rest of the Army under the Cannon of the Fort, taking Fright at the terrible Noise of the Powder, broke their Pickets, and fled cross the Fields the next Wood. The King repaired thither instantly, and sent out Parties every Way, who had the good Fortune to bring them all back. Thus ended this glorious Action. in which the King with an Army, at first very inferior, passed a very large rapid River, defeated a formidable Enemy, advantageously posted on the River's Bank, and render'd himself Master in 24 Hours of five little Forts and Batteries, of two Breast-works. the Enemy's Camp, thirty-fix Pieces of their Cannon, three Standards, one Pair of Colours, and the greatest Part of their Baggage.

We had in this Action very few killed or wounded. Amongst the Perfons of Note who were killed, the chief were Mr. Palmquist, Lieutenant-Colonel of the Guards, Captain Blaman, a Engineer, Major Sparfwenfeld, Major Von Wolffen, and Lieutenant Lindbielm; and, amongst the Wounded, Major-General Horn and Captain Stiernhok. On the Enemy's Side, Veldt Marshal Steinau was dangerously, wounded in the Arm, as was Lieutenant-General Patkul, who conveyed himself instantly to Mittau. Count Ronnof, and Colonel Zeidler, with many other Officers were killed. Colonel Eppinger was wounded, and carried Prisoner to Riga, with more than five hundred of the Enemy, chiefly Russians.

The 11th, Major General Morner was order'd to go with 1500 Horse and Dragoons to Mittau, to secure the great Magazine that the Saxons had established there. He found on the Road, on one Arm of the River Bulderan, which runs before the Town of Mittau, some scatter'd Troops of the Enemy's Army, who undertook to dispute the Passage with him. He attacked them, and put them to Flight. At his Approach to the Town the Burgomaster and the rest of the Magistrates came out, to demand of him the King of Sweden's Protection. Mr. Morner, after having granted their Demand, enter'd into the Town, and fummoned the Governor of the Castle. who surrender'd at Discretion. foon as he was Master thereof, he made a double Discharge of the Cannon from the Ramparts. 1050 Saxon Dragoons, who came from Amenburg, to throw themselves into Missan, having heard the Report of the Guns, returned hastily, seeing that the Swedes had been before hand with them.

The same Day the King detached Colonel Klings-Porr towards Dunamund, to hinder the Enemy from throwing Succour and Provisions into that Town. He sound at Slock, where there was a Magazine, a great Party of Rushaus, whom he attacked and entirely defeated, taking at the fame Time 48 Pieces of Iron Cannon, and a great deal of Ammunition of War and Provision.

Colonel was dangerously wounded in this Action, and died a little afterwards. However, Orders were given to the Detachment to advance nearer Dunamund under the Command of Colonel Albedybl, to block up that Place on the Side of Courland, whilst some Ships anchor'd before it, so that no Person could either go in or out. There remained now to the Enemy no more than Kokenbusen, which the King resolved to take by open Force. But as Colonel Boos thought himself in no Condition of maintaining it, and as he found his Retreat not cut off, he abandoned the Fort, blew up the Castle, repassed the Duna, and then burnt the Bridge.

On the 13th of July, the King, at the Head of the Army, which was divided into three Columns, marched to Rekou, the next Day they advanced to Borkowis, and the 15th to Thomas-Hoff, where his Majesty was informed that the Enemy had abandoned Kokenbusen, where they left but 12 Pieces of Cannon, 4 Mortars, and 2 Fauconets. His Majesty sent some Troops thither, and presently turned with the Army towards Courland, detaching diverse Parties to reconnoitre the Motions of the Enemy, who were retired with all Haste towards Birsen in Lithuania.

The 16th the Army arrived at Linden, where they halted the 17th; the next Day they came to Neuguth, where the Duke of Holfein-Gottorp arrived, accompanied by Mr. Dabldorff, to make a Campaign with the King his Brother-

Brother-in-law. This Prince had settled every Thing which might be necessary for the Defence of Pomerania, as Generalissimo of the Estates of his Swediß Maiesty in Germany.

The 20th the Army renewed their March, and proceeded to Kleenbarbe, where they halted two Days, and came on the 23d to Altenrade; here the King staid some Days, during which, having heard that King Augustus had left at Birsen 6 large Pieces of Brass Cannon, and 32 Brass Pontons, he detached thither Lieutenant-Colonel Roos with 200 Horse to demand them of the Governor, who excused himself under Pretence of first asking the Republick's Permission to deliver them.

Upon this the King ordered some Troops to advance immediately under the Command of Baron Poss, Major-General. The March of these Troops produced the Effect which the King expected. Mr. Chalcouski, Governor of the Polish Livonia, repaired in a Hurry to his Majesty's Camp with the Governor's Son, whom he lest there as an Hostage, promising instantly to deliver the Cannon, which were afterwards convey'd to Bausk, and thence to Riga, with some of the Pontons, the rest being lest with the Army, to be made use of upon Occasion.

In the mean while Colonel Albedyble fent two Officers to summon the Fort of Dunamund to surrender; but Colonel Canitz, who commanded there, having siercely answered, that he would defend it as long as he had Powder, Ball, and Provisions lest; the Colonel contented himself with blocking it up by Sea and Land, which he did till the Month of December the same Year, as we shall see a little afterwards.

The 26th of July the Army decamped from Altenraden, and came to Bausk, where 500 Men of the Vanguard had arrived the Day before, to repair the Fortifications of the Castle called Bauskenberg. Mr. Morner did the same at Mittau, where they worked very hard to put every thing in a good Condition, and to encreafe the Works of the Castle, which were very much shatter'd. He had already, by the King's Orders, fent circular Letters to the Estates of the Province to convene them together at Mittau, to fettle the Contributions for the Army's Sublistence, whither the Chancellor, the Grand Master, the Burgrave, and the Chiefs of the Country repaired, and immediately lamented the Misery of the Inhabitants, and their Incapacity to furnish any thing.

Besides these Reasons, they protested farther, that they had taken no Part in this War, which had been begun without their Consent, and even without their Knowledge.

As that Province acknowledged the King of Paland to be their Chief and Protector, all their Remonstrances were useless, and the Country, as well as the Towns of Mittau, Bausk, Goldingen, Libaw, and others, were all taxed at certain Sums of Moneys.

In the same Degree as the King penetrated into Courland, the slying Troops of the Enemy all took the Road of Lisbuania towards Kauno, where Veldt-Marshal Steinau drew them together to form a Camp. The Marshal did not think however to stay there long, and he actually set out soon after, making his Way in great Haste and with long Marches towards Prussia, on the Side of Marienbourg and Dantzick. This precipitate Retreat gave us easily to undertland, that the War would not be profecuted fo brifkly as it had been hitherto. We had the greater Reason to flatter ourselves with the Approach of a Peace, as the Republick seemed very much diffatisfied with the Undertaking the War, in which she declared herfelf to have had no Share, and as there was all Appearance that the Saxons would be soon unable to stand alone against the victorious Arms of so formidable a Power as Sweden.

Charles, displeased with the unjust Proceedings of the King of Poland, who had invaded his Estates contrary to the Right of Nations, was not contented with barely driving him out again, but demanded, as a farther Security of his Kingdom, a more folid and fenfible Satisfaction. Swedish Majesty was not ignorant, that King Augustus had shewn more than once, that as long as he fat on the Throne of Poland, no folid Alliance could be hoped for with him, and that he would be always ready to renew the War on the first favourable Occasion.

These Reasons at last produced in the King of Sweden a Resolution to dethrone Augustus, and to persuade the Republick to elect a Prince more inclined to maintain Peace with his Neighbours. With this View he sent two Letters from Bausk to Warsovia, the one to the Republick, the other to the Cardinal Primate, which contained a long Recital of the Injuries the King of Poland had done him, and the Damages which he had suffered. These Letters represented likewife, that King Augustus had not only broke his Oath, but that he had refolved to rob the Poles of their Liberty, and that it was the Interest of the most serene Republick to elect another King as foon as possible, who would not strike at her Liberties, and would maintain the Treaties of Peace with her Neighbours. Lastly, his Majesty assured the Republick and the Primate of the Kingdom of his Assistance and Protection in the Execution and Protection of so just a Defign.

The King, having stopt at Bausk till the 11th of August, departed with his Army, leaving there Colonel Nils Poss with his Regiment and some Dragoons, and proceeded to Klappmannsboff, or Schorsten. Hither came a Courier from Bausk with Advice, that the Deputies of Lithuania were arrived there, and demanded an Audience of his Majesty. The Army halted there a Day, and the King took that Opportunity to make a Tour to Mittau, being attended by the Duke of Holstein-Gottorp and his Train. Charles, after having examined the Works of the Castle and the Town, and given his Orders, returned the fame Day to the Camp to put himself at the Head of his Forces. The Army marched the same Day to Hoff Zom-Bergen, whither the Deputies of Lithuania repaired the same Day with a Train of 200 Persons.

The King considered some Time, whether he should give Audience to these Deputies, whilst the Army on the 14th continued their March, and encamped at Dobeln. Here the Chief of the Deputies, named Podbereski, had at last an Audience of the King. whom he complimented on the Victories he had gained, and befought him, in Conformity with the Peace of Oliva, that he would not touch the Frontiers of Lithuania, and that he would take Pity on Courland, which was entirely ruined by the Saxons, and the large Contributions they had raised. But as his Majesty was apprized, that this Deputation came only from one Party of the Nobility of Lithuania, assembled at Wilna, which had confederated under the Name of Republicans; and moreover, as the Envoy could not produce full Powers from the Republick, he gave them an Answer agreeable to the Situation of Affairs, and the Deputy departed without obtaining an Audience of Leave.

From Doblen, the Army marched the 17th to Birsten or Bersenboff. The Starost Potocki, Son of the Great General of the Crown, arrived here from Warsovia, with the Cardinal Primate's Answer to the King's Letters to his Eminence and the Republick. had immediate Audience of the King, who having opened his Letter, found it full of Politeness; but as to the Article which concerned the Deposition of King Augustus, the Cardinal testified in very respectful Terms, that the Poles could never consent to it. In the mean while his Eminence offered the King the good Offices of the Republick to secure his Majesty a sure and solid Peace, and all the Satisfaction imaginable.

These fine Promises engaged the King to stay at Courland, and not to pass the Frontiers. As soon as Mr. Potocki had received his Audience of Leave, the Army renewed their March the 21st, and arrived at Bliden, coasting along the Frontiers of Samogitia. The 22d of August they arrived at Frauenburg, where they halted one Day. The 24th they marched to Knockenkrug, where the Colonels Pulbusch and Leyonbuswud, with their Battalions, were sent to Mittau.

The 25th the Army arrived at Schrunden, an old Castle belonging to the Duke of Courland, where they passed the River Windaw on those Pontons which they had had from Birsen. Here the King stay'd till the 29th, when he decamped and came to Neubausen, where he rested two Days. The 31st the Army marched to Hasenpoth; the first of September to Rauen, and the 2d to Grubin, a small Town, Part of the Dowry of the Dutchess of Courland, where there was formerly a Castle, fortified by the Swedes during the War of Charles Gustavus, but now entirely demolished.

Whilst the King continued to penetrate into Courland, the Czar, who had applied himself with great Industry since the Defeat of Narva to the Re-establishment of his Army, had drawn together a strong Party near Plescow, in order to make three different Inroads into Livonia, on that Side where Colonel Schlippenback commanded; viz. with 3000 Men near Rapin, where Major Roos was posted with 200 Foot, 300 Dragoons, and 2 Field-Pieces; with 4000 at Casaritz, whither a Detachment had been sent under the Command of Mr. Berend Rebbinder, Captain of Horse; and with 6000 at Rauk, where Captain Nolk, at the Head of 50 Horse and 100 Foot, was lodged in a Church-yard.

As foon as Mr. Schlippenbach had received Advice from Cafaritz, which was but one League distant from his Camp, of the Enemy's Arrival, he hastened with some Horse to the Support of Rebbinder; but having learnt at his coming thither, that the Enemy had made an Irruption with greater Forces near Rauk, at three Leagues Distance from Casaritz, he detached thither Lieutenant-Colonel Liewen with 200 Foot, 300 Horse, and 2 Field-Pieces, to reinforce the Captain posted in the Church-yard. He attacked the Enemy at Cafaritz himfelf, and after having received 2 Field-Pieces more, obliged them to retire. But as it might be feared, that this Detachment of the Enemy would join that at Rauk, Lieutenant-Colonel Stakelberg, with some Horse and two Field-pieces, was ordered to join Mr. Liewen without Delay. He met them on the Road with his Foot, having fent his 300 Horse before to attack the Enemy, and affift Captain Nolk. It was not at first possible to come up with him, nor to stop the Enemy; but as soon as Messieurs Liewen and Stakelberg were arrived with the Foot and Cannon, they charged them so briskly, that, after some Resistance, they forced them to retreat through great Morasses, over which they had built a Bridge. In this Manner we opened a free Communication with the Captain, who had defended himfelf with great Bravery in the Churchyard.

Our Horse having pursued the Enemy even to the End of the Bridge on the Moras, could proceed no farther; all the Enemy's Dragoons, which had now dismounted, attacked them in the Flank, and endeavoured to put them in Disorder; but the Foot and Cannon being come up, these Dragoons were pushed so vigorously, that they at last gave Ground, and were driven sighting beyond the Frontiers; near 2000 of them were killed and wounded, and a great Number of Officers.

Matters went on so well at Rapin. whence Schlippenbach's Camp was 6 Leagues distant, as well on Account of the Difficulty of hastily succouring fo advanced a Post, as because the Enemy had brought hither the greatest Number of his Forces; add to these, that Major Roos had engaged too imprudently, and was presently furrounded by the Enemy, with whom however he continued fighting from the Morning to three in the Afternoon, at which Time he broke thro, after having left almost all his People flain on the Field of Battle, and joined Mr. Schlippenbach, who was coming to his Assistance with 30 Men only. Notwithstanding this Advantage which the Enemy had gained, they had no Stomach to wait the Arrival of Schlippenbach at Rapin; but after having plunder'd and carried away all that they could find, they hastily repassed the Frontiers.

This Action reflected great Honour on Mr. Schlippenbach, whom the King made a Major-General, and at the same Time sent him a Reinsorcement of some Regiments from Courland, which filed off towards Dorpt and Sagnitz, and at last obliged the Enemy entirely to abandon the Frontiers, and retreat to Plescow.

While all this passed, the King remained encamped with his Army at Grabin, and placed a Garrison in Lidew, which is but half a League's Distance, and where they began to build a Citadel for the Security of the Port, and a free Communication with Sweden. The Direction of this Fortress was entrusted with Major-General Stuort, who had formed the Plan of it. The Work was at first carried on with Diligence, tho' the Ground is very fandy; but they were at last obliged to give it over, on Account of the Hurricanes, which are very frequent on these Coasts, and which overthrew in a few Hours what they had been a whole Week in raising. As to Bankenburg, we put the Fortifications into so good a Condition, that this little Place served us always for the future as a safe Retreat, and kept a Curb on the Poles and Lithuanians in these Parts.

With regard to Mittan, we applied ourselves only to fortifying the Castle, where Mr. Morner repaired two Lodgments on the Side of the River, and made a Ravelin at one of the Ports, with a good Counterscarp all round the Castle.

The Counts of the illustrious Family of Sapieba came with pressing Instances to demand the King of Sweden's Protection against some of their Countrymen, by whom they were almost entirely oppressed. This House, which is one of the most powerful and most considerable in Lisbuania, and which for an Age had been invested with the chief Honours of the Country, had by its great Riches excited the Envy and Jealousy of the Rest of the Nobility, who feared to be one Day overpowered by it *; and in reality, the two Counts of Sapieba, whereof one was Grand General, and the other Great Treasurer of Lisbuauia, had given the Nobility some Reason for their Fears.

But however that was, Augustus took Part with the Enemies of this Family. who encreased considerably every Day: nor did he neglect any Means to encourage the Hatred which they bore it. He was little pleased with the Conduct of the Sapiebas, who had done all they could to thwart his Election, declaring themselves for the Prince of Conti. This Hatred grew to such an Height, that as the greatest Part of the Friends and Allies of the Sapiebas had either through Caprice or Fear abandoned them, their Enemies thought it a fit Time to strip them of their Estates. and deprive them of their Honours.

Oginski, putting himself at the Head of the Party which opposed Sapieba. had the Luck to defeat the Body of the Grand General's Army in different Rencounters, and carried his Vengeance so far, as inhumanly to massacre his Son, contrary to his Promise to do him no Harm. At length the Enemies of the Sapieba, who were ioined by Prince Wisniowiski, got so much the Advantage of them, that after having destroyed almost all their Lordships and Lands, they forced them to abandon the Country, and throw themselves into the King of Sweden's Arms, King Augustus having refused them that Protection which they had demanded of him.

His Majesty received the Sapieba

^{*} Lithuania was then divided into two Parties, the one of which was headed by the House of Sazisba, and the other by that of Ogin/ki.

very graciously; and Col. Hummer-bielm with 600 Horse and Dragoons was ordered instantly to pass the Frontier of Samogitia, and march towards Schauden, to cover the Lands of the Sapieba, situated in that Country, against the frequent Incursions of O-ginski and those of his Party. And this gave the King of Sweden an Occasion to enter Poland.

At the same Time Charles detached Lieut. Col. Meyerfelt with some Horse towards Polangen, to seize on the Revenues designed for the Support of King Augustus's Table. On another Side, Lieutenant-Colonel Peter Bannier, with some hundred Dragoons and Foot were ordered to repair to Seelburg, an old Castle situated on the Duna and the Frontiers of Courland, to cover them, and hinder the Incursions of Oginski into these Quarters, which were afterwards very frequent, as we shall soon see.

As the Season was far advanced, and the Weather grew too hard to keep the Field any longer, the King quitted Grubin, where he had remained almost the whole Month of September, and repaired to Worgen, a Castle appertaining to a Gentleman of Courland. Here his Majesty resolved to canton his Army, 'till he could put them into Winter-Quarters.

With this View they quartered the Troops at Gentlemens Houses, and in the Villages about Wurgen, and along the Frontiers of Samogitia. The Horse consisted of the Drabans, who always attended the King, of the Regiments of Horse and Dragoon Guards, of the two Regiments of Horse of Oftrogothia and Nyland. The Foot were four Battalions of Guards, two Battalions of Dabl Carlia, two of Upland, two of Westerbothn, two of Kruse, two of Westerbothn, two of Nerk and Wermland, and one Battalion of Hassfebr, with a suitable Train of Attillery.

The King, instead of lodging in the Castle of Wurgen, resolved to lie in his Tent, which he thatched over and surrounded with Boards at the Bottom; and to warm him in Case of Necessity, he was entertained Night and Day with some red-hot Bullets, which would have much incommoded any other Sort of Person than Charles the Twelfth.

Towards the End of September there. was a little Action at Sea, which deferves to be remembered. King Augustus had raised Sailors at Lubec, to cruize, with a Vessel which was there equipp'd, on the Swedish Merchants. As foon as this News came to Wismar, which is in the Neighbourhood, the Citizens fitted out a Vessel at their own Expence, on Board of which they fent 60 Grenadiers, and 30 Sailors, under the Command of one named Nariman, who after having pursued the Corsair Enemy some Time, he at last came up with her under the Island of Femern, attacked and took her, making 28 Prifoners, the rest escaped to Land. The Booty, which was very confiderable, without reckoning three Month's Wages for the Crew, was conducted to-Wilmar.

Though the Campaign was ended, the King who was always indefatigable and in Action, employed himself without Relaxation in visiting the different Quarters of his Army, which were sufficiently dispersed and distant one from the other, and chiefly situated along the Frontiers, which the Polithe Parties under Oginski began to infest. Charles, who commonly had very few Attendants, exposed himself much in these long and frequent Excursions, wherein he was in continual Danger, of which the following Instance ought not to be passed over in Silence.

His Majesty one Day took the Road of Polangen, attended only by some Officers, and after some Difcourse with Mr. Meyerfelt, giving Orders that he might not be made known, he fet out by himself on Horseback for a little Town named Repfin. He went directly to a Convent, where the Superior talked with him, and drank the King of Sweden's Health, without knowing to whom he addressed it. Charles pledged the holy Father; and after having been well treated by the Monks, proceeded to Polangen, and thence to Wurgen.

Baron Craneburg, Envoy from Holland, who had lately arrived at Libaw, had some Time afterwards an Audience of his Majesty, to whom he offered the Mediation of the Republick for the Re-establishment of Peace in the North. The Marquis of Bonac, who was to succeed Count Guiscard, arrived also some Days afterwards, and made the same Propositions. The Intention of these Ministers was doubtless to bring the King into their Masters Interests, the War between France and Holland being then on the Point of being declared. As his Majesty had already in Livonia taken a Resolution to send back the foreign Ministers to Stockbolm, where their Negotiations might be more commodiously carried on than in the Army, he declared to these Ministers, that he should be pleased with their repairing to his Capital. And his Majesty was ever afterwards inflexible on this Article, tho' several Ministers of different Powers had made the strongest Instances to obtain a Permission to follow him, and be near his Person. This he refused with great Constancy, that he might create no Odium or Jealoufy in them, nor give them any room to think he had the Interest of one more at Heart than of another. So the two Ministers took Leave of the King, and repaired to Riga, where they remained till the Spring, when they receiv'd Orders to go to Stockbolm.

Oginski and those of his Party continued in the mean Time to destroy the Lands of the Counts Sapieba; and, at the Instances of King Augustus, they appeared from Time to Time at our most advanced Quarters, without ever making head, or it being possible for them to force us. For though Oginski, had brought them to attack Ornstedt, Major to Hummerbielm's Detachment, the Poles fled, as foon as they faw their Commander and some others killed; that, as we could never dothem any great Mischief, so they did but little to us, as foon as we were once used to their Manner of Fighting.

All these Hostilities engaged the King to pass the Frontiers, thoroughly resolved to have no Mercy on a Country which thus continued to insult him. He resolved however to pass this Year at Courland, and orders were given to Mr. Stuart, Quarter-Master-General, to regulate the Quarters.

His Majesty quarter'd at Wurgen;. Mr. Sioblad, Grand Master of the Artillery. Artillery, was to have the Castle of Nurrins; General Welling the little Town of Neuberg, and Lieutenant-General Liewen that of Frauenburg assigned to them; Major-General Meidel was to lie at Stenden, and Mr. Stuart received Orders to stay at the Head Quarters.

According to this Plan, the Regiments were distributed into Garrisons in the Towns and along the Frontiers, which they were to cover; but this Project took not Place, and the Troops continu'd to be canton'd till they began their March to Lithuania.

The 3d of November, two Regiments of Foot, viz. those of Calmar and Skytt, consisting of two Battalions each, arrived safely from Sweden in the Road of Libaw, and were put into Garrison. A great Number of Recruits arrived at the same Time from Riga, which considerably reinforced the Ar-

The 17th, the Regiment of Horse of South-Scania arrived also at Libaw. 'under the Command of Major-General Alexander Stromberg. The Disembarkation of these Troops was not at all fuccessful. Two Days after they arrived, a Storm arose very suddenly, and drove 7 great Transport-ships on the Sands, which were beat to Pieces. They lost near 100 Horses, but not one Man, nor their Baggage. Regiment was immediately fent to Frauenburg, in good Winter-Quarters, in order to refresh the Men after the Fatigues of the Sea, and to be remounted.

On the 20th, fome Deputies of Samogitia, having had Audience of the King, intreated him not to let the Army pass into their Territories, nor to treat them as Enemies. To this they had a very favourable and gracious Answer: But as we heard a few Days afterwards, that one of Orinski's Parties had attacked, tho' with Loss. a Detachment of Colonel Meyerfeld at Polangen, the King, incenfed at feeing himself so often harassed by such pitiful Troops, resolved to chastise them once for all, and to put a Stop to the Continuance of their Hostilities. As Oginski had publickly declared himfelf the King of Sweden's Enemy, his Majesty determined to go himself in Quest of him, and punish his Insults. He was now in the neighbouring Parts, lording it in Lithuania, where he put all to Fire and Sword, and destroyed every thing belonging to the Savieba.

During these Transactions, the Duke of Holstein-Gottorp took Leave of the King, and his Highness took the Northern Road to Stockholm, where he passed all the Winter, and returned the next Summer to the Army.

The First of December at Night, the King put 400 of his Guards on Sledges, passed the Frontiers of Courland with them, and joined Colonel Hummerbielm, who was posted at Schauden with a Detachment of Horse and Dragoons. Taking with him this whole Detachment, he set out that Instant for Calivaria, whither Mr. Meyerfeld had by his Orders brought his Party from Polangen.

Night. Not judging it proper therefore to give his People any useless Fatigue, he waited there for the Rest of his Troops, left his Foot at Skudi, and marched the next Day with the Horse toward Tirksel. This Place belonged to Oginski, who departed a little before the King's Arrival; but the Partorafta, or Bailiff, was surpriz'd by Major Ornstedt, and killed by his Men.

The King, who was in continual Hopes of overtaking the flying Enemy, marched from Tirksel to Triski, a little Town 4 Leagues distant; but they were already retired: So that at last, giving over all Hopes of coming up with them, he passed the River which runs before that Town with his Horse, at a Ford, being able to find neither Bridge nor Boat. The Cavalry were quartered upon the Citizens, and were permitted to unsaddle their Horses and repose themselves. As to the King, he went to lodge at a Castle without the Town, leaving only a small picquet-Guard of a few Men at the Town's End. About 11 in the Evening, Oginski, who had been advertised by the Curate of the Town of the Security in which our Troops lay, returned with all his Force to the Number of 6000 Men, who, finding no Resistance, went with a great Cry to the Market-Place, where they fet Fire to several Houses. The Swedes, who expected not this Visit, and were most of them in their Beds, dreffed themselves with all Haste, saddled their Horses, and drew together as well as possible. Mr. Sak, Captain of the Horse-Guards, Count Laurence Flemming, and some others, were the first ready, and feared not to attack the Enemy, not-

This Handful of Swedes fought with extraordinary Bravery, and kept the Enemy fo well in Play, that they gave Time to the Horse and Dragoons to get together, and draw themselves into Order; who then attacked them on all Sides with fuch Constancy and Vigour, that they were presently overthrown and put to Flight. Our People, who were for the most Part in their Shirts, pursued them at their Heels a great Way out of the Town. The King, who had call'd for his Horse at the first Alarm, hastened to them, and having found the Enemy already put to flight, he drew together the Rest of his Horse, which were fcattered through the Town, rallied them in Haste, and marched forth himself to support the others, in Case. of Necessity. He came up with Mr. Thomas Funk, Captain of the Dragoon-Guards, who was yet engaged with a Party of the Enemy's Troops, that had at first made Head, but ran away at the King's Arrival. They were closely pursued; but notwithstanding all the Haste of our Troops, could not be overtaken. Mr. Claes Bond, Captain of the Horse-Guards, pursued them so fmartly, that he took Oginski's led Horse with a Pair of Kettle-Drums, and made the Groom, who led it, Prisoner.

Such was the Success of Oginski's Undertaking, who, if he had had more Courage and Conduct, might here have struck a decisive Stroke, and put an End to the War.

The King, feeing it was in vain to perfift in the Pursuit of those Fugitives, returned to the Town, and caused the Fire

Н

Fire to be extinguished, which was kindled in the Beginning of the Action to disorder our Troops. At the same Time his Majesty reinforced the Guard, and retired to his Repose. He remained the Rest of the Day in the Town, and gave Orders to have the wounded conducted into Courland, who were about 18 Men, amongst whom Mr. Sak was dangerously wounded in many Places.

The Curate of the Town, who was suspected to hold Intelligence with the Enemy, was presently put under Arrest, and Mr. Canifer was commanded with 20 Men to watch the Enemy's Motions. He return'd the same Day. and brought back some of the wounded, who had been left behind, without being able to learn what was become of Oginski, who was nevertheless not far off; and an old Woman informed the King in the Evening, that he was at Lubinski; on which a Resolution was taken to march thither. and the King advanced 4 Leagues the next Day.

Oginski was retired a little before their Arrival, having left feveral wounded Men behind him. The King continued his Rout, without stopping, to Uzwetta, where he found no Body. Here the Foot which had been left at Skudi, joined his Majesty on the Sledges; and he continued his March the same Night towards the Town of Kelm, where there was a · Castle belonging to one Grusinski of Oginski's Party. The King caused this Castle to be plundered, and then demolished. He stopp'd at Kelm that Day and the next, and the 10th he marched to Sittowiani, and the next Day to Grynkiski. He yet flattered himself with being able to come up with the Enemy; but as they had no other View than to escape from our Troops, they found means to fave themselves. The Fort of Dunamund was now furrender'd to the Swedes. We have already said, that Colonel Albedbyl, after the Battle of Duna, had block'd it up straitly by Sea and Land with the Help of some Frigats. which kept out all Succours both of Men and Provisions, Mr. Albedbyl had feveral Times fummoned Colonel Canitz to furrender; but this Governour was too brave to suffer the Besiegers to carry the Place, unless at the dearest Rate. Albedbyl found himself obliged to a Bombardment, which was begun towards the End of August; for which Purpose all the Mortars and heavy Cannon, which they thought they should want, were brought from Riga. The Enemy defended themselves with great Bravery; but notwithstanding all the fine Artillery which was in the Place, they did us but little Mischief, only one Captain being killed all the Time. Our Batteries having foon reduced their Mill and Magazine to Ashes, with some of their Cazerns and Houses, and the Garrison beginning to grow weak by their Distempers and want of Provision, the Governour found himself obliged to capitulate and furrender; for which Purpose he sent an Officer to Mr. Albedbyl, and it was agreed that they should march out with their Arms and Baggage, which they accordingly did the 12th of December, with all the Honours of War.

The Fort was delivered to the Swedes in a Condition infinitely better than it was when taken. We found here here thirty two 24 Pounders, twenty-one of 12, ten of 6, all of Brass, and 18 Mortars, 49720 Cannon-Balls, 9345 Granades and Bombs, 2385 Cartridges, 3000 Quintals of Powder, 800 Muskets, 4000 Ton of Corn, without reckoning other Ammunition, and an Arsenal well stored.

The King was not at first content with this Capitulation, because he had expected the Garrison to surrender at Discretion; but he approved of it asterwards, when he considered the Number of Men this Fort would have cost, had they determined to carry it by Storm. Here they placed a good Garrison, and changed the Name of Augustusburg, which Mr. Flamming had given it, into Noumand, its true Name, and by which it had been always formerly known.

In the mean Time the King, who continued in Samogitia, in Pursuit of Oginski, marched the 13th to Kyedam, where he stay'd a few Days to gain Intelligence of the Enemy. Here he was present at divine Service, which was perform'd in the Lutheran Church in this Town; from thence he marched into a little Village full of poor Gentlemen, to whom they commonly gave in Poland the Name of Slattitz. Here the King learnt that Oginski was at Kaune. To prevent his Knowledge of our March, his Majesty set a Guard on all the Places through which any one might pass to give him Advice. Towards Midnight he marched towards Kaune, and arrived thither about Break of Day. Unhappily, the River Niemen, which ran before the Town, was thaw'd, and as it could not be passed without much Difficulty, the Enemy had on that Occasion sufficient Time to retreat. For they could find in all Places thereabouts only one little Prame, on which the Troops could defile, each Man holding his Horse in his Hand, which swam by the Prame Side. By this the Reader may judge, what Time we were obliged to spend in passing this Water.

The King was one of the first who went over, and though the Enemy might have easily obstructed us, a Pannick had so seized them, that, except some few, who were suddled, and made Priloners, all the Rest ran away full speed towards Wilna. The King sufficiently convinced, that it was in vain to pursue an Enemy farther, who would have gone to the End of the World rather than have fought, resolved to leave all the Detachments at Kauno, where they were quarter'd upon the Citizens. His Majesty himself, to prevent his being known, performed the Office of Quarter-Mafter during the whole March, fending out at the fame Time several Parties on all Sides to raise Contributions on the adjacent Parts; and after having put all Things in Order, and presented a Sum of Money to the Lusheran Church of Kauno. he left the Command of these Troops to Colonel Hummerhielm 'till farther Orders.

Charles, notwithstanding all the Remonstrances which could be made him of the Danger which sew Persons must run in crossing a Country of more than 40 Leagues extent, where the Enemy made frequent Excursions, took the Road of Courland with a sew Attendants; in which Road tho Oginski did not dare to appear, his Parties however continually scoured H 2

the Country, as we shall see presently by the Relation which Baron Nils Posssent the King from Bauskenburg the 18th of January 1702.

The King met with no Accident during his Journey, and arrived safely at his Quarters at Wurgen. He was escorted Part of the Way by Major-General Arwed Horn, who came to meet him with a Detachment of Drabans. His safe Return gave an unspeakable Joy to the whole Army, who had been under dreadful Apprehensions during his Absence, having had no News of him during the Expedition, which lasted near a Month.

Whilst all this pass'd in Courland and Lithuania, the Russians, who were affembled in great Numbers on the Frontiers of Livonia, had made a new Irruption, which the Rigour of the Season had rendered easy and advantageous, of which Mr. Schlippenbach sent the King the following faithful and exact Relation, written in High Dutch.

SIR, I leujenant-Colonel Borckhusen, who was cantoned between Aja and Eratfer, with Orders to post himself in Case of Necessity in the latter Place, without waiting fresh Orders, or at least to assist both the one and the other, and to make an immediate Report to the Head Quarters, baving received Advice the 28th of December from Colonel Pahlen, who was posted at Aja, of the Enemy's Approach with considerable Forces, marched instantly with the Regiment of Horse of Carelia; upon which Orders were given through all the Quarters to get the Ammunition ready, and to bold themselves prepared to march at the first Signal.

Lieutenant Colonel Borckhusen returned immediately, and reported, that it was only a false Alarm, caused by the Peasants, who had taken some Russian Maroders for their whole Army, and who had given this Notice to Colonel Pahlen.

The next Evening at four there was a like A.arm of the Enemy's Arrival at Lieutenant-Colonel Platen's Quarters, who was posted at Varban with a Battalion of Militia. He took immediately some Horse of the Regiment of the Nobility of Esthonia, to go and reconneitre; and after be bad Leilure to judge of their Forces, which were considerable, be brought me an Account at nine in the Evening. He told me, that the Enemy bad near 2000 Sledges loaded with Chevaux de Frise, and 30 Pieces of Cannon and Mortars; so that we had all the Reason to believe they had some Design of Importance.

I presently gave Orders to Baron Reinholdt Liewen, who was a Lieutenant-Colonel, to go, during the Night, and . reconnoitre and divert the Enemy with 300 Horse of the Regiment of Esthonia, 'till I could bring up the Battalions of Skytt, Liewen, Gardie, and Stakelberg, which I had ordered to march up to me the same Night. Mr. Liewen falling in with the advanced Guard of the Enemy, on the 30th at Break of Day, which confifted of 10 or 12000 Men, attacked them with all possible Bravery, but was at last obliged to yield to Numbers, almost all bis Men being slain on the Field of Battle, with two Captains named Wrangle, and himself made Prisoner.

The

The Enemy, finding now no more Refistance, fell instantly on our most advanced Quarters, and first on that of Mr. Fritch, Captain of Horse. Captain did his utmost to stop the Enemy, but lost bis Life in the Action. greatest Part of his Men having the Happiness to come and join me. Having then drawn together the Battalions of Skytt, Liewen, and Stakelberg, with fix small Field Pieces, four of Brass, and two of Iron, which I took with me, I went to join the two Regiments of Horse of Ethonia and Abolehn, and then marched directly to the Enemy. I came up with the Van-Guard, which bad defeated Mr. Liewen, a League beyond Erasfer, near the Village of Camar; and baving encouraged all my Officers and Soldiers to do their Duty, who all unanimously testified their Zeal for your Majesty's Service, I put myself at the Head of the Horse, with the Colonels Wachtmeister and Ehnskiold, and the Army marched couragiously to the Enemy, whom they charged so fiercely, that they forced them to give Ground.

As I apprehended the Enemy, who was infinitely our Superior in Numbers, might fall on our Rear, and cut us off from the Foot, which we had left a little behind with the Cannon, I resolved to go and join them with the Horse, which was performed in good Order. Colonel Ehnskield, who was too much exposed, was taken Prisoner on this Occasion.

The Enemy baving presently followed us, were so well saluted on their Arrival by the Foot and the Cannon, that they were broke, and retreated in great Disorder towards the Body of their Army, which I did not see, but knew to be in full March to attack me. After they bad staid some Time to observe us at a Distance, I judged proper, to make the Parties a little more equal, to retreat to Erather, where I expected to meet the Regiment of Foot of Campenhausen, with the Dragoons of Stenbock and the Horse of Carelia.

The two last Regiments having joined me on the Road, I ordered them to cover the Rear Guard, which the Enemy harassed continually, and where the Combat became at last very bloody. Baron Gabriel Horn, a Major, stood a long Time firm with his Squadron almost surrounded with the Enemy. He was mortally wounded in this Astion, which obliged him to be carried out of the Field of Battle, after he was relieved by Major Liewen, with his Squadron.

As the Enemy continued to press us, scarce giving us Time to draw up, Lieutenant Colonel Liewen, who was in the Van Guard with the Cannon, turned them readily against the Enemy. Lieutenant Colonel Stakelberg, with his Battalion posted himself on a Cross-Way to stop the Enemy, 'till the Battalions of Liewen and Skytt had Time to pass and form a Line together. The Horse were ranged on the two Wings in the best Manner we could.

The Action became now very sharp, and the Fire continued on both Sides without ceasing with terrible Violence, especially after the Enemy had received their Artillery and Mortars, which incommoded us extremely. As I perceived their Forces to encrease every Minute, and that by attacking our two Wings they endeavoured to hem us in on both Sides; besides that of the twenty sive Cartridges, with which each of our Cannon was furnished, there remained but four; I set myself on retreating, with with Design, if necessary, to cut through the Enemy Sword in Hand.

To this Purpose I ordered the Foot to form the Van-guard with the Cannon, and the Horse to cover them, and to stop the Enemy by frequent Discharges. This Scheme had not the Success I had flatter'd myself with. The Horse no sooner perceived the Foot to retreat, than they ran away without its being possible to rally them. The Regiments of Carelia and Abolehn began to run first, then that of Esthonia, and lastly one Squadron of Stenbock's Dragoons. Battalion of this Regiment, with Count Lewenhawpt at their Head, continued with the others to second the Battalion of Stakelberg.

All these Horse running back on the Foot put them in Disordor, notwith-standing all my Efforts with the greater Number of Officers to rally those that were slving, there was now no Possibility of stapping them, by reason of the vast Number of the Enemy that pursued us; who seeing the Foot without Support, and abandoned, broke them on all Sides, and cut them almost all to Pieces. It is true, they at first attempted to defend thenselves with great Bravery, but were at length forced to yield to the prodigious Multitudes of the Enemy, and were totally defeated.

Of all the Foot-Officers who were prefent at the Action, there remained with me no more than Lieutenant-Colonel Liewen with four of his Officers, Lieutenant-Colonel Stakelberg with a Non-Commission-Officer, two Soldiers, and Major Meyer Krantz, who, after the Battalions were overthrown by our own Horse, had the Happiness to find Horses, and save themselves through the Enemy, under savour of the Smoke and the Darkness of the Night. The Captain-Lieutenant of Liewen's Battalion saved the Colours; all those belonging to Stakelberg's were ordered by him to be torn to Pieces before the Retreat; this was faithfully executed by all the Ensigns, as we learnt from a Soldier of Skytt's Battalion, who likewise assured us, that several Officers and Soldiers had happily preserved themselves in the Woods.

I continued always with the Horse-Officers, exhorting those that sted to rally; and Adjutant-General Freymann killed some who refused to obey, which Example, together with some others of a like Kind, obliged them at last to stand their Ground near Eratter, and to rally. Here I sound Count Gardie's Battalion, commaded by Major Stahl, who had with him the rest of the Cannon. I now resolved on a Retreat, with Mr. Stahl and Golonel Wachtmeister, who had commanded the Horse, which I performed in good Order.

The Enemy purfued as very brifkly towards Kehrart; and as I faw they bad fet Fire to the Church of Canepoëhe and the Village of Korart, I thought myself obliged to burn the little Magazine at Kehrart, fearing loft the Enemy should feize it. As Night wow drew on, I sent Lieutenant-Colonel Smkelberg towards Signiz with the Cannon and the Remains of his People, who were posted at Kovart, as likewise Count Gardie's Battalion and Stenbock's Dragoons. As for myjelf, I staid fine Time at Koikul with the rest of the Horse, and towards Break of Day took the same Road hither.

I was much surprised at bearing nothing from Colonel Campenhusen, to whom I had sent Orders to bring his Regiment to Eratser, and join the other Troops;

Troops ; but as these came not to bim till very late, by reason of the Messenger's losing his Way, he could not be there in Time. However, when be approached the Head-Quarters, and by the Noise of the Cannon and small Arms, found we were at Blows with the Enemy, he bastened to my Assistance; but be unbappily missed the Road, and bad only Time to defeat a straggling Russian Party, who bad taken up their Quarters in some Houses about Eratfer. Horn. bis Leutenant - Colonel, attacked this Party, and made most of them Prisoners. Mr. Campenhusen drawing afterwards to Dorpt, after be bad beard of our being routed, made a thousand Windings to join me, which he hath just performed.

The Enemy have kept themselves very quiet since the Battle, till Yesterday. As soon as the Parties which I have detached to reconnecte them shall be returned, I will order my Affairs according to their Report, and shall not fail to give your Majesty the speediest Information.

Sagniz, Jan, 1. SCHLIPPENBACH.

The Enemy did not at all improve the Advantage which they had gained. General Scheremetoff, who had at first intended to lay Siege to Dorpt, thought proper hastily to repass the Frontiers? whether they seared a second Battle, which Mr. Schlippenbach seemed to prepare for, by drawing his Troops together from all Parts, or whether the last Battle had cost them too many Men through the desperate Desence of our Foot, which rendered their Loss much more considerable than ours.

The King, at his Return from Wurgen, found that Mr. Stuart had made all the necessary Dispositions for the Winter Quarters, no Person doubting but that the Army were to enter into them; but his Majesty all of a sudden changed his Mind, and order'd several Regiments of Horse, Foot, and Dragoons, under the Command of Lieutenant-General Spens, to file off in several Columns through Samogitia, to be nearer the Detachment which was at Kauno.

The King at the fame Time wrote a Letter to the Cardinal Primate, declaring the Reasons which had induc'd him to pursue the Enemy, and attack him wherever he might be met with.

This firm Resolution, declared in so authentick a Manner, was very disagreeable to King Augustus, who having all Things to sear from so formidable and justly-provoked an Enemy, had already very earnestly applied himself to sollicit the Mediation of the States-General, as well as of several other Powers of Europe: But as he found every where an infinite Number of Obstacles, and saw the King of Sweden inslexible against him, he thought proper to employ one of the fair Sex's Endeavours to work on her Cousin.

The Countess of Koningsmark, a Swede by Birth, and a Lady of great Beauty, affished by all the Charms of a rich and cultivated Genius, was chose for this Business; on which Account she repaired to Libaw, confiding in her Charms, and believing she should should have as great an Ascendant over the Mind of the young Swedish Monarch, as she had gained over the King of Poland.

The Countes's laid hold of certain Pretentions of her Brother-in-Law Count Charles Lowenhaupt, who was then in the Saxon Service, to disguise the true Intentions of her Journey. She offered the most advantageous Conditions of Peace on the Part of King Augustus, at the same Time demanding a particular Audience of his Swedish Majesty. But whether these Propositions were not agreeable to the Interest of the Republick, whose Friendship the King was resolved inviolably to maintain, or whether this Prince suspected his Enemy to have some private Views in this Affair, he refused to see this beautiful Ambassadress, notwithstanding all the Complaisance which on other Occasions he shewed to the fair Sex; and tho' this Lady used all imaginable Stratagems to come at an Audience, even to the fending him some fine Copies of Verses on his Winter-Campaign, she could not obtain it. The Counters was therefore obliged to return without attaining what the had proposed.

The King now departed from Wurgen on the 15th of January with the Rest of the Army, which he brought to an Encampment about Goldingen, and took up his own Lodgings in the Castle.

There had been during these Tranfactions several Skirmishes between the Parties of Ogin/ki and the little Garrisons the King had lest at Seelburg and Bau/k. The Governour, Lieutenant-Colonel Peter Banner, who was at Seelburg, had detached in the Month of December in the preceding Year 2 Captain of Dragoons, who fell on a Party of the Enemy, discomfitted them, and took some Prisoners. Colonel Nil Poss sent the following Relation, in the Swedish Language, from Baushenburg to the King, to inform his Majesty of what passed in this Action.

SIR,

Concerning the Expedition of Major Trausetter, I have the Honour to tell you Majesty, that the Major departed from hence the 22d of December 170th upon those Orders which he had received, with 150 Dragoons of Colonel Gustavus Albedhyl's Regiment, for Gulbin in-Lithuania, to serve as a Guard on the Territories of the great General Sapieha, against the frequent Incursions of Oginski, who put all to Fire and Sword.

Being arrived the 23d at Gulbin, be beard that a large Party of the Enemy were scattered in the influence Villages, where they entertained themselves with Plunder. He instantly attacked them, killed a great Number, and took the Rest Prisoners, namely, four Officers, and 20 Soldiers, which have been sent from hence to Riga. He took from them at the same Time one Sandard, two Kettle-Drums, and sive Tattarian Standards.

This Loss which the Enemy received, obliged him to retire for some Time from the Lands of the Sapieha. As to Major Trautfetter, he posted himself at Gulbin to observe the Motions of the Enemy.

The 11th of January I was informed, that a Colonel of Ogimki's Party, whose Name was Berg, was arrived from Janitzieck with twelve Troops of Horse; that that he had passed near Schonberg on the Frontiers in bis Way to Birsen, one League from Gulbin, and that be bad destroyed all that belonged to the Sapicha in bis Road.

Upon this News I ordered Major Trautfetter, on the 12th, to bring up bis Detachment from Gulbin, which I intended to employ in levying Contributions on those Nobles of Qurland which had Mot paid them. He came to me the 1316, and after be bad acquitted bimself of that Commission, I gave bill on the 15th in the Evening Some Orders sealed up, which he was to carry with his Detachment, and not to open until a certain Distance. These Orders were to resume bis Post at Gulbin, and drive off the Enemy; and, in Case be could not find shem there, to look out for them and attack them. The Major, coming to Gulbin the 16th at Break of Day, learnt that the Enemy after baving been defeated some Days before near Dunenburg by Captain Ramfelt's Party, bad been so terribly frightened, that they retired sbree Leagues from Gulbin into a Town called Coppieha. Major Trautsetter learnt farther, that these Troops, having been advertised of bis Departure from Gulbin for Gourland, were leparated, leaving Rue Companies at Coppieha, where they thought themselves in Security; and the Seft were lodged in the adjacent Village, after baving bad the Precaution to barricade all the Passages.

The Major in Consequence of bis Orders, departed from Gulbin the same Evening with 100 Dragoons, the Rest being fick, or out on Parties, and arrived the 17th at Break of Day at Coppieha, where, after having forced the Guard, be made some of bis Party dismount, and attack those who were shut up in the Houses, and discharge their Muskets and Granades on them, by which they were driven from House to House to the End of the Town, more than 100 of them being flain on the Spot.

As this Action lasted near an Hour and a Half, the Enemy, who were posted near at Hand, ran up from all Paris at the Noise of the firing, upon which the Major was obliged to retreat, as well on the Account of their great Numbers, as the Fatigue of bis Horses. This Retreat was bowever performed in good Order; and as the Enemy feared an Ambuscade, or that the Major might receive some Succours, they durst not attempt to pursue bim. They retired into e neighbouring Wood, and afterwards went to join Oginski, who was posted at two Leagues Distance with all bis Forces, which, as they pretended, amounted to 6000 Men. He is since gone, as I am informed, to Vichur, where he has some Cannon, and has fortified bimself.

All the Booty, which was at first made, was gotten by the Peasants, except the Colours of Colonel Berge. We brought away one Lieutenant and five Soldiers Prisoners. On our Side we lost Lieutenant Bachman, two non-commissioned Officers, and seven Dragoons, who were killed. We likewise missed the two Drums, with three Dragoons; and as the Enemy must be certainly informed of the Weakness of the Major's Party, I resolved to recall bim from Gulbin, lest be should be attacked by all their Forces, and he bath joined me accordingly. I now wait your Majesty's fariber Orders.

Baukenberg, Jan. 18, 1702. NILS Poss

All

All these Excursions of Oginski, with those of the Liwunian Poles, joined to the Slowness of the Republick in declaring herself and giving his Majesty Satisfaction, determined him at last to enter Poland with the Rest of the Army. He departed from Goldingen at the End of January to Rossenne, 12 Leagues from Kauno, whither Mr. Spens had gone before, as we have already said.

The Artillery and heavy Baggage had been fent back to Riga; and we left in the Towns of Courland a sufficient Number of Horse and Dragoons to keep that Province in Order, of which Baron Stuart, Major-General, was made Governor. He chose Mittau for the Place of his Residence, and neglected nothing which might contribute to the Desence of the Country during his Majesty's Absence.

The Army passed the Frontiers in three Columns, the first and second of which took separate Routs to Lubenick, where they joined again; whilst the third Column continued to follow in another Rout. The general Conjunction of these Troops happened some Leagues from the Frontiers.

The King was extremely fatigued during this March, always riding from one Regiment and one Column to another, notwithstanding the Rigour of a very severe Winter, without giving himself any Relaxation, or taking any Repose. He would never repair to his Head Quarters, named Bielowice, the Seat of a Gentleman of that Name, a long Half-League from Rosenne, before he had distributed the whole Army into good Quarters in the Neighbourhood, where they remained 'till the End of the Month of March.

One of the first Things which his Majesty did, was, to drive away a great Number of lewd Women, who had slipp'd in amongst the Troops, and introduced Libertinism and Disorder; but he took such Measures that very sew Women durst remain amongst them.

King Augustus in the mean Time flatter'd himself with I know not what ill-grounded Hopes, with which the Countess of Koningsmark had sed him of Success in her Negotiation. She had ever since her Departure from Wurgen coasted along the Frontiers of Samogitia, and was now come to Tillsen in Prussa, which is situated on the Frontiers, and at a little Distance from Rosenne and from his Majesty's Head-Quarters.

King Augustus sent, higher Mr. Witzthum d'Eckftedt, his Chamberlain, to confer with her, and to remain 'till farther Orders. Koning mark very dextrously prevailed with him to go to the King of Sweden, and make a fecond Trial; which he did. Count Piper, his Majesty's first Minister of State, to whom he notified his Arrival, at the fame Time demanding an Audience, was very much surprized to find him arrived before he had asked Leave to come; however, he agreed to see him; but when Mr. Witzibum would have delivered him a Letter from King Augustus, the Count excused himself from receiving it without his Swediff Majesty's Permission.

The King was incenfed at this Proceeding, which was a Liberty that ought not to have been taken in Time of War; he therefore order'd Baron Buchwaldt, his Aid-de-Camp General, to put Mr. Witzibum in Arrest, and at the same Time set an Ensign of the Guards with twelve Men over him.

Mr. Witzthum was treated with all imaginable Civility, and waited on by the King's Servants. Amongst his Papers, which were instantly seized, was found, with his Instructions, a Letter written by King Augustus's own Hand to the King of Sweden, in which he engaged in the most complaifant and even submissive Terms, to attend his Swedish Majesty in Perfon, and to clear up by a Conference all the Difficulties which obstructed the Conclusion of a sure, solid, and lasting Peace.

Mr. Witzthum remained in arrest all the Time of the King's Stay at Bielowice; he was afterwards conducted under an Escort to Riga, where he had Liberty on his Parole to walk where he pleased; till at last, the King being arrived at Warfovia, permitted him to return into Saxony, ...

About this Time Count Sapieba, Great General of Lithuania, fent a Captain of Horse to Bielowice, to ask the King's Leave to pay his Respects to him, which he immediately obtained; and having fet out for the Head-Quarters; attended by a numerous - Train of Nobility and Domesticks, he was much surprized to meet his Majesty on the Borders of Pruses with only four or five Attendants. He appeared very well fatisfied with the tavourable Reception which was graciously given by his august Procector.

grew worse every Day, he now thought himself in so dangerous a Situation, that he determined to convene 2 Diet at Warsovia. He then imparted the King of Sweden's Refolution to the Assembly, with the Perplexity he was in on that Account. A great Number of Mal-contents took this Occasion to exclaim against the present Government, which they now ventured to do in the most publick Manner. However, a Resolution pasfed to fend a folemn Embassy to the King of Sweden, and offer him the Intercessions of the Republick.

Baron Sacken, the Chamberlain, was fent to communicate to his Majesty the Republick's Resolution to send an Embassy to him. The Baron had been formerly fent by the Cardinal Primate to Stockbolm, to notify the Death of the late King of Poland. He arrived the 12th at Bielowice, and had an immediate Audience. He demanded of his Majesty the Time and Place in which he would be pleased to give the Ambassador, who was on the Road, the Honour of attending him. Hewas told, that the King's Intention was to spare him half his Journey: and he departed thence without being able to obtain a more positive An-

It might have been imagined, that fince the King of Sweden was with his Army in the Heart of the Enemy's Country, they would not have dared to undertake any thing to molest our Quarters: However, Oginski and Prince Wisnigwiski committed continual Hostilities, scouring about daily with their little Parties; in which Attempts they were generally worked, tho.

tho' they never attacked our small Detachments unless with three or four Times their Number.

These daily Skirmishes chiefly incommoded the Detachment at Kauno. whither the King fent Lieutenant-General Liewen, who was posted at Kudani with his Regiment of Foot, to reinforce them. Colonel Hummer bielm. who had hitherto commanded there. had had the good Fortune some Days before to defeat a Party of twelve Companies, belonging to Wisniowiski, near the Castle of Jesna, which is the Property of a Gentleman named Paix. and to take ten Pieces of Brass Cannon; but as he could not carry away more than four, for want of Boats, he resolved to return soon after in order to fetch off the fix others.

Having put himself with this View at the Head of 130 Troopers, he departed from Kauno, and at the same Time embarked in two large Boats 110 Men of the Regiment of Footguards, commanded by Captain Gufavus Siegroth, to bring back the six Cannons by Water on the River Memel, near which the Castle is situated.

Prince Wisniowiski being advertised of this Design, drew near Jesna with 6000 Men, amongst which were four Regiments of German Foot and Horse. Hummerbielm, who had heard nothing of this, or perhaps would not believe it, having passed the River near Jesna, and continued two Days March by the Water side, that he might not be at too great a Distance from the Foot, quitted the River the third Day, and marched before towards a little Town named Dorsinski, six Leagues from Kauno, where he waited the Arrival of the Insantry.

When Wilniowiski saw that he was separated from his Foot, he thought proper to attack him, and with that Design brought forward his Vanguard, which was repulsed with great Bravery by Mr. Hummerhielm. The Enemy returned again to the Charge with all their Force; and Mr. Hummerbielm. being advanced to reconnoitre them, was unhappily intercepted and made Prisoner. Mr. John Siegroth, Major to Morner's Regiment, had now with the rest of his Officers no other Game to play, than to break through Sword in Hand. The Swedes had the Advantage in the Beginning of this Action. having overthrown all those who opposed their Passage; but getting by Misfortune into a Morass, they-could neither advance nor retreat, and were there, after defending themselves with incredible Valour, all cut to Pieces, there being neither Officer nor Soldier who had not received several Wounds. Twenty only were taken Prisoners, and those all covered with Wounds; two Troopers of this Number had the Courage to throw themselves into the Memel, and swam over to the other Side; one of whom was killed by the Pealants, so that only one escaped to bring the news of this Defeat to Mr. Gyllenkrok, Major of the Guards, who was detached with a Party into the Neighbourhood to raile Contributions.

After this Action, the Enemy being advertised of the Approach of the Foot with the Cannon, went to meet and attack them. They were commanded by Gustavus Siegrosh, Brother to the Major of whom we have just spoken, and who, being ignorant of Colonel Hummerhielm's Fate, had landed a Non-Commission Officer with fome Soldiers to bring him News. These met with the Vanguard of Wisniowiski's Army, and, after having flood some Musket-shots, returned to their Body, to give them Advice of the Enemy's Approach. Seigroth, who could not believe it, landed himself, with about 20 Men; but after a Discharge on the Scouts of the Enemy, whom he now perceived to be advancing, he retreated in good Order to his Boats, intending to defend himself till the Arrival of Hummerbielm. from whom he expected Affistance: But in that Instant while he was preparing to pass to the other Bank of the River, his Boats unluckily ran on the Sands, nor was it possible for him to get them off again. In this Conjuncture, Siegroth law, that he had no Way left but to defend himself to the last Extremity, especially as the Enemy had now planted fix Cannons against him, from which they fired incessantly on our Boats, and pierced them in such a Manner, that our Soldiers were up to the Middle in Water; however, they lost not their Courage, which when Wisniowiski; faw, and found what resolute Troops: he had to do with, who had by a Volley just repulsed his Men as they were endeavouring to plant a Cannon on the Brink of the River, he ordered a Trumpet to be founded, which was answered from Siegroib by a Drum.

A Colonel of the Enemy, whose Name was Grotbusen, approached Sietrotb at this Interval, and acquainted him with the total Defeat of Hummerbielm, who was taken Prisoner, and then summoned him to surrender also with his Men; but Siegrotb, very far from accepting his Summons, plainly declared his Intentions of defending himself to the last Extremity, or till he had received those Succours, which he could not fail of from Kauno.

Grotbusen then represented to this brave Officer the great Danger to which he exposed himself and his People. Prince Wisniowiski being present with his whole Army; but he could not move Siegroth, who continued his firing, while he had Powder or Ball In the mean while the Enemy. who faw with Astonishment the extraordinary Defence made by this Handful of People, and perhaps feared the Arrival of Succours from Kauno, as Siegroth had artfully infinuated, offered him the Liberty of returning to Kauno with his Men, which he was at last obliged to accept, feeing no room to flatter himself with Hopes of better Conditions.

The Capitulation slipulated, that the Soldiers should lay down their Arms, but that the Officers, even the Subalterns, should keep theirs; and that they should be allowed an Escort, and Waggons to carry off their Wounded and their Dead.

In this Manner this brave Officer extricated himself with Honour out of so dangerous a Situation; six Men only of his Detachment were killed and nine wounded, and he returned with the rest to Kauno.

Lieutenant - General Liewen, who commanded at Kauno, no fooner heard of this Defeat, than he instantly recalled all the detached Parties from the other Side of the River, that he might be in a Condition to make Head against Wisniowiski, in case that Prince should think proper to attack him. At the fame Time he encreased all his Guards, and sent Advice to the King. But the Enemy, instead of improving their Advantage, had hastened directly to Wilna.

As foon as the King had heard what had past, he ordered all the Army to decamp, and march towards Kauno; and Major General Morner and Count Stenbock, who were posted with their Regiments on the Side of Wilna, had private Orders to march and surprize Prince Wisniowiski at that Place.

To hasten this Expedition, the Horse took the Foot up behind them; and marching through Forests and thick Woods, that they might not be perceived by the Enemy, they arrived at Break of Day before the Town, forced the Barrier, and instantly began the Attack.

The Enemy, who had no Mind to fight, took the surest Method to save themselves, which was to run away sull Speed. This however they could not execute so expeditiously, but that several were made Prisoners, and so many killed, that the Streets of the Town were all cover'd with dead Bodies.

Wisniowiski was in great Danger himself of being taken by a Trooper, who pursued him so closely, and pressed him so sharply, that, if the Trooper had not been unluckily killed, that General would have fallen into our Hands. He lost all his Cannon, his Horses and his Equipage.

General Morner remained at Kauno, in Conformity to the Orders he had received; and, as he was to flay here fome Time, he laid the Town and the adjacent Parts under heavy Contributions, having first received a Reinforcement of some Troops.

The King was still at Bielowice, tho' all the Army was already decamped; and as the Great General Sapieha and his Brother were in the Neighbourhood on the Frontiers of Prussia, his Majesty paid them a Visit, and held a Conference with them. He staid with them all Night, and returned the next Day.

The Duke of Holstein-Gottorp arrived some Days after at Bielowice. He came by Sea to Riga from Stockbolm, and performed his Voyage in eight Days. His Design was to make a Campaign with the King, who received him with all the Tokens of a perfect Friendship.

At length the King with his Drabans began his March towards Kauno. He left in Samogitia Colonel Charles Gruus with his Regiment of Horse to levy the remaining Part of the Contributions; and as the Colonel remained some Time at Rossenne, there were frequent Skirmishes between his Parties and the Poles.

His Majesty on his Arrival at Kanno, took Care to bring the Sick safely up into Courland, and then continued his March directly into Lithuania; and that the Army might not want Provisions, he divided them into two Columns, one of which was commanded by Lieutenant-General Spens, and the other by his Majesty, who had with him the Duke of Holsein, and some other Generals. This latter Columni coasted along the River Momel through Runifish, whence it marched to Diefinski, the Place where Colonel Hummerbielm had been deseated.

The

The King surveyed the Field where the Action had been, of which Capt. Siegroth related to him all the Circumstances. The next Day he gave Orders to bury the Dead; and having caused the Officers and Soldiers to be put into Coffins, they were buried with the usual Ceremonies, the King himself assisting at the Funeral, and the Troops honoured the Memory of those brave Men by several Vollies. They set Fire to the Town, which, except the Church, was burnt to the Ground.

The Column afterwards continued its March towards Punia, which Place had likewise some Days before been partly reduced to Ashes by Mr. Roxman, Captain of Horse, who commanded a Party of Swedes. One of the Ecclesiasticks of this Place had given the Enemy timely Notice of Mr. Roxman's Arrival, who was attacked by them, but he repulsed them with Loss. From Punia the Column drew towards Olita, where his Majesty staid some Days.

In the mean Time Prince Wisniowish, enraged at the Surprise of Wilna, thought of nothing else but how to revenge himself. He believed that Easter-Day would be a most favourable Time for the Execution of his? Design. As he maintained an Intelligence with fome of the Citizens, he repaired thither with little Noise, forced the Guard, who suspected nothing, and entered with his Troops, who fet up an universal Outery and This was most dreadful Howling. done at Noon, when all our People were at Dinner.

They did at first some Mischief; Lieutenant Colonel Treffenberg and fome others were killed: But they did not long maintain this Advantage; for our Troops running instantly to Arms, attack'd them so briskly on all Sides, that tho' they were our Superiors in Number, they were drove back, broke, and at last entirely disperfed.

Wisuiowiski was again in Danger of being taken; but having saved himself through a Convent, he escaped Mr. Morner, who eagerly pursued him: He left however a great Number dead and wounded behind him, with some Trophies in our Possession; and he had the Shame and Vexation to fly with Loss before an Enemy who was much weaker than himself, and whom he had at first surprized. We took in their Retreat without the Town B Captain of Horse and some Troopers wounded. This Action having taught Wisniowiski, that the Swedes were an improper People to be play'd with, he for some Time lost all Defire of giving us fresh Disturbance.

The King marched from Olita to Merecz, where his Majesty remained some Days, 'till the Army had passed the Memel, on such Floats as they could get together, and then he marched to Liepuni, where the Army rested 'till the 17th, and then decamped and came to Sopotskini, leaving the Town of Gradno on the left.

The Polish Ambassadors, who were already arrived there, and who saw the King pass by the Town, sent to his Majesty to know in what Place he would permit them to attend him. The King, who easily penetrated into the Design of this Embassy, the End of which was only to amuse him till King Augustus had Time to bring his Troops into Poland, and to form there an Army with the Permission he had obtain'd of the greatest Part of the Senate, firmly resolved not to hearken to any Propositions which the Ambassadors should make to retard the Course of his victorious Arms; the rather, as the Chief of them was a declared Partizan and Creature of King Augustus.

In the mean Time his Majesty was pleased to hear what they had to say, and acquainted them by Mr. Cederbielm, Secretary of the Chancery, that he would expect them at Diougowitz, five Leagues from Grodno, one of the largest Villages in Europe, which extends five Polish Leagues in Length, and is several hundred Paces wide.

The Army being come hither on the 22d of April, the Ambassadors immediately tollowed it; but it was presently discover'd, by the Difficulties which they started concerning the Ceremonial, that they thought of nothing farther than to gain Time; on which the King very plainly declared to them, that, if they persisted in their Chicanery on those small Points, he would pass on without giving them any longer Hearing. This Declaration at last obliged them to accommodate themselves to his Majesty's Pleasure.

These Ambassadors were five in Number, of which the two Chief, Mr. Lipski, Waiwode of Calis, and Mr. Crispin, Waiwode of Witepsk, were Deputies from the Senate; and the three others, namely, Count Tarlo, Mr. Oginski, and Mr. Crispin, from the Nobility.

The King had prepared a Tent at fome Distance from the Village to receive them. The Drabans were drawn up on Horseback before the Tent, with 600 of the Foot-Guards, Colours flying and Drums beating. Lieutenant-General Liewen received them at two o'Clock in the Afternoon to conduct them to the Audience, whither they repaired with a Train of 200 Horsemen. They were received before the Tent by Mr. Hard, who performed the Office of Marshal, and by the Officers of the Court, who conducted them to the Antichamber. Baron Knut Poss, Major-General and Colonel of the Guards, met them at the Entrance of the King's Apartment, and conducted them to his Majesty, who was feated on a Chair of State, with the Duke of Holstein, Count Piper, and several other General-Officers and Colonels on both Sides of him.

The Waiwode of Calis first spoke in the Latin Tongue; and, as soon as he began to speak, the King arose, and remained standing during the whole Audience, in which Count Tarle afterwards spoke also in Latin.

These two Ambassadors desired his Majesty to be pleased to make a Peace; not to advance farther into Poland; to abandon Courland, to restore the Cannon and Artillery taken at Dunamund and other Places, which King Augustus had made a Present of to the Republick, to make an Amends for the Damages caused by the War, and the heavy Contributions raised in Courland, Samogitia, and Lithuania; lastly, to name Commissaries to treat with them on all these Articles, and those other Propositions which they had to make on the Behalf of the Republick.

Digitized by Goodmissaries,

Commissaries, the Ambassadors withdrew, and his Majesty presently named Count Piper, Mr. Wachshager, formerly Resident in Poland, and Secretary Hermelin, to treat with them; but as their Demands were very exorbitant, and on the other hand the King, who was the most jealous Prince in the World of his Glory, would not suffer them to prescribe Laws to him, most Part of the appointed Time for the Conferences passed in supporting the Arguments which were suggested on both Sides, without bringing any thing to a Conclusion.

Violent Disputes happen'd among the Ambassadors themselves, which almost came to Blows. The Waiwodo of Calis was the Person who chiefly embroiled the Affairs, being a Creature of King: Augustus, who had made him a Present of a Starosty, the better to support his Interest, and which cost him dear, as we shall see hereafter. This Ambassador, who was a violent Man, and shewed no Respect to any one, and always spoke in a magisterial Voice with great Fierceness, at last incenfed his Majesty so much, that he resolved to be no longer amused, and to march directly to Warsovia to find out the Enemy.

The Regiment of Horse of Scania, commanded by Major-General Stromberg, being arrived during these Transactions with some Field-pieces taken at Kaune, the King caused the Army to decamp from Dlougowitz, and march to Sykinkuri, and on the next Day to Knysin. And to rid himself at once of the Ambassadors, who always followed him, the King resolved to quit his Column, and with a small Train, to join that under the Command of Mr. Spens, which was some Leagues distant from the other.

His Majesty having learnt that the Saxons appeared at Brzescia, a Town advantageously situated on the River Bug and the Confines of Great Poland and Lithuania, he presently marched thither with Major Greutz at the Head of 300 Horse-guards, where he soon arrived, and made himself Master of that Pass, which the Saxons had just abandoned.

This Column continued its March towards Tykozin, a Town belonging to the Son-in-law of Sapieba, a well-built Place, and in which there are a great many Jews. Here is a little Castle, situated in the Middle of a Morass, which the Swedes had formerly fortified, and kept a long Time, but the Republick had now a little Garrison therein.

The Ambassadors persisted in sollowing the King's Column, and never ceased pressing Count Piper, continually flattering themselves that some Resolution would be at last taken in their Favour. But all their Instances were useless, their Demands appearing fo exorbitant, that it was thought proper to give them no Satisfaction. At last, finding the King resolved to fee them no more, they quitted the Army, and repaired to King Augustus at Warsovia, giving that Prince an Account of the ill Success of their Negotiation, and affuring him that he had nothing to hope from the King of Sweden, whom they had found inflexible.

Upon this Augustus set out instantly for Cracovia, whither the Army which he had brought from Saxony had Orders to march, to oppose the Enter-K prize of the King of Sweden. He was attended by several Senators, and particularly by those who had consented to his bringing his Saxon Troops into Poland. In the Number of his Attendants in this Journey were the Princes Lubomirski; one of which was lately made Great General of the Crown, in the Place of Potoki, who had succeeded the brave Gablonofski, and had been Great General no longer than a Fortnight, which gave Room for a Suspicion, that the Death of these two brave Noblemen was not natural: As to the Cardinal Primate, and the other Senators, they retired home, to wait the Issue of an Adventure which held all Europe in a Suspence.

During the King's Absence, Count Piper continued to conduct the Column through Pembrawa to Oftrowia, where he published his Swedish Majesty's Manifesto, and his Proclamation, addressed to all the Estates of Poland.

The unjust Proceedings of King Augustus were berein set forth at large; and the Wrongs done his Swedish Mazesty by that Prince; in what Manner he had violated the Oath made the Republick, and bow little Dependance was to be had on so troublesome a Neighbour; that the Republick could take no better Measures than to set a Prince on their Throne, whose peaceable Inclination and constant Friendship with Sweden, would put ber into a flourishing Condition, and render ber formidable to all those Neighbours who would undertake to give ber any Trouble. As to the rest, his Majesty promised to cause the Troops to observe an exact Discipline, provided that they furnished them with Provision and necessary Subsistence, during the whole Time that he should be obliged to pursue the Enemy in Poland, and as soon as he should have entirely quitted the Country, he assured the Republick to put them to no farther Charge.

From Ofrewia the Column marched to Perembi, where the King joined them; and they marched the next Day to Wifterna on the Bug, to pass which they set about a Bridge, which was sinished the third Day. Axel Gyllenkreck, Major of the Guards, then received Orders to go before with a Detachment, and post himself at Prague, which is the Suburbs of War-sovia on this Side of the Vifula.

The King followed with the Army, and encamped at Radzimin, half-way between Warfovia and Wiskowa; here they halted one Day, and marched on the following towards Propue, taking their Way through a Plain, where his Majesty's Grandsather, of glorious Memory, CHARLES GUSTAVUS, King of Sweden, gave Battle, with FREDE-RICK - WILLIAM, firnamed the GREAT, Elector of Brandonburg, to the Polish Army, which he entirely defeated, after a Battle which lasted three Days, notwithstanding the Superiority of the Enemy.

Charles XII. who had a happy Memory, and well understood History, took great Pleasure in recounting to the Generals, who were about him, such Particulars as could have only been known by a great General, shewing them the Places of Attack, and informing them in what Manner the Squadrons and Regiments were drawn up.

The King lodged at Prague, and the Army was distributed along the Vistula, Vibula, and in the neighbouring Villages. Towards the Evening his Maiesty commanded Baron Charles Poss. Lieutenant-Colonel of the Guards, with 400 Men, to pass the Vistula in Pass presently took Possession of the Castle in the Town without the least Opposition from the little Garrifon of the Republick's Troops. was made Governor of that Place. where he maintained good Order, notwithstanding the ordinary Insolence of the Populace and the inferior Gentry thereabouts, who are much given to Insurrections. The same Day they set about a Bridge, in order to país over the Army; but instead of choosing the casiest Place, where there is always a floating Bridge during the Diets, his Majesty made them begin it on the Side of the Suburbs of Cracevia, oppofite to Prince Radzivil's Palace, in the most dangerous Part of the River, where it often runs over its Banks, especially in rainy Seasons, which had now continued feveral Weeks, notwithstanding which it was remarked that the Water was not rifen at that Time.

The King at the same Time was careful to give his Troops some Rest after the laborious and severe Marches they had made. To surnish them with Subsistence, he proposed to the Town to contribute 20000 Crowns, besides other Things of which they were in Want. The Town at first found this Demand so much the more grievous, as the greater Part of the Merchants were retired with all their Effects. They offered 12000, without reckoning Beer and other daily Provisions which they were obliged to surnish.

The Convents only were exempted from this Tax by the express Orders of his Majesty, as well as the House of Marienville, which belonged to the Queen Dowager of Poland, and which was inhabited by a great Number of Servants. These Measures, joined to the King's Manifesto printed and made publick, by which he declared he was come as a Friend to the Republick; and lastly, the good Orders carefully observed among the Soldiers, brought back all the Inhabitants which had fled at the King's Approach; who could not sufficiently praise and admire the perfect Discipline which reigned in our Army.

Colonel Crues, who had been employed in levying Contributions in Samogisia, was now returned into Courland with his Regiment; but as Recruits were daily expected from Sweden, for the whole Army, and as we wanted a Magazine for their Sub-fiftence, he detached a Captain from his Regiment, called Rutenschild, towards Janiska on the Frontiers to gather together Provisions. He had scaree taken his Post before he was surprized by a Lithusnian Party, and taken with all his People.

Upon this News Baron Stuart detached Colonel Cruus with Count Adam Lewenbaupt and Baron Budbusch, each with his Battalion, to give Chace to the Enemy.

Mr. Cruus was very successful in his Expedition; he surprized a Lithuanian Partizan, named Zanarech, between Javiski and Schaud, and took from him a Standard, three Pair of Kettle-Drums, and all his Baggage, having pursued him three Leagues without losing a single Man of his own in this Action.

One of the Enemy's Parties attacked, a few Days after, a Captain of Horse, named Roxman, who had Orders to go from Libaw to Janiski. This Enterprize did not succeed; he was fo well received by our Troops near Raumkaski, that having been purfued into a Morass, he had 40 Men killed, more than 100 wounded, and Those who made Prisoners. escaped having rejoined Zanareck, he undertook to attack Roxman a second Time, who was posted at Janiski, with all the Forces which he could draw together; but he succeeded no better than before, being obliged after a bloody Fight, which lasted from 11 in the Morning to 6 in the Evening, to retreat with the Loss of some hundreds of his Men killed and wounded; the Captain had on his Side no more than 7 Men killed, and 28 wounded.

Upon the Peipus there was a very bloody Battle between our little Squadron and a great Number of Russian Vessels, which were transporting Troops into Livonia, of which the following Relation was written to the King in High Dutch by Loscher, who commanded that Squadron.

SIR,

N an Information which I received the 27th of May from our Peasants of Porcasaar, that the Enemy prepared to attack our Blockbouse, in order to render themselves. Masters of the Mouth of the River, I resolved to weigh Anchor with those Vessels under my Command, namely, the Galley Charles, the Galley Vivat, with a Yacht and six great Shallops, and to fail the Day following towards Plefcow.

This I executed on the 28th, by sailing out of the Mouth of the River; and being arrived near Ismen, I learn'd that the Enemy had transported some Troops into Livonia on 200 Lodiens or Barques, amongst which there were 5 or 6 mounted with three Cannons each. I presently attacked them, and put them to Flight.

In the mean while, as I was in Purfuit of them, I was much furprized, at doubling a Promontory, to find myself furrounded on every Side by 200 little Vessels, which had on board the Transports, with whom I fought for three Hours, from 6 in the Morning till 9. I sunk three of the greatest, out of which not a single Man was saved; this put the others on tacking about, and regaining their own Coast.

The Yacht distinguished berself very much, baving received above fifty Cannon Shot in her Flag and Sails, which were shot through and through. Russian Vessels bad each from forty to fixty Men, amounting in the whole to about 10,000. I bad but one Man killed, with fix others very much wounded. Upon my Pursuit, I found the rest of the Army, Horse and Foot, encamped by the Side of a Wood, near the Sea-shore. I then began to salute them with my Cannon, which obliged them to strike their Tents, and remove farther up into the Country, at the same Time string on me from a Battery which they had raised and mounted with five Cannons, but without any Success. At my Return toward our Coast, I met a Russian Vessel, which I sunk. We have not, however, taken any Prisoners, the Enemy being being too firong. I have sent to Colonel Skytt for a Reinforcement of fifty Men, with some Powder.

Loscher.

From on board the Charles, May 29, 1702.

This Action did in Truth hinder the Enemy from making an Invasion on Livonia; they had however many Rencounters on the Peipus, till they had an Opportunity of being reinforced, and getting the Advantage of us, as we shall see a little lower.

The Column of Lieutenant-General Spens arrived at last in the Suburbs of Prag, where he applied himself without ceasing, to put the Bridge in a Condition of passing over the Army. The Count Sapieba Great-Treasurer of Lithuania was arrived here, to put himself in a Place of Sasety, and to make a Campaign with his Majesty; he had with him his Son the Commissary-General of Lithuania, and a small Train of Polish Gentlemen.

ger, the Resident, was sent to desire him to hasten to Warsovia. He at first raised some Difficulties on that Proposition, pretending that he would avoid giving any Suspicion in so delicate a Conjuncture; but at last he thought better on it, and arrived at Warfovia the 30th of May, and had the next Day a publick Audience of the King, who afterwards took him into his Closet, where that Prelate employed all his Eloquence, in endeavouring to bring about an Accommodation with King Augustus, representing to him, That the Deposition of that Prince was not so easy a Matter as it was imagined; and that he could never contribute to it; bowever, be offered to use his utmost Care and good Offices, to bring Affairs to an amicable Determination, and in that Way to procure bis Majesty all the Satisfaction be could de. are.

The King was the more surprized at this unexpected Change in the Cardinal, as that Prelate had himself made the strongest Instances to his Majesty, when he was in Courland, to induce

^{*} The other Historians have set the Cardinal in a very different Light from that in which our Author hath represented him. We are not therefore to doubt his Integrity, who very likely might not have been admitted into all the Secrets which passed between the King of Sweden and his Eminence; nor is it indeed certain that his Swedift Majesty himself was openly dealt with by that cunning Prelate, who was afterwards rather a Tool to execute that King's Designs, than able, by Means of the Swedish Force, to execute his own. His Name was Radjouski, and he was Archbishop of Gnesaia; governed, says Mr. Voltaire, by an ambitious Woman, whom the Swedes called Madam the Cardanaless, who continually pushed him on to Intrigue and Faction. King John Sobieski, the Predecessor of Augustus, had at first made him Bishop of Warmia, and Vice Chancellor of the Kingdom, and he afterwards obtained the Cardinal's Hat by the Favour of this King, which Dignity soon opened to him the Road to the Primacy. This Interview with the King of Sweden was of the Cardinal's own feeking: And to prevent any Umbrage being taken at it, he went to King Augustus, and told him, that Charles was disposed to an Accommodation; upon which Hope Augustus permitted him to go to the King of Sweden, in Company with Count Lesckynski, Great-Treasurer of the Crown. And in the Conferences which they had with this Monarch, the Project of dethroning King Augustus was brought on the Carpet; to which Purpose all the Cardinal's suture Actions very apparently tended, tho' he still played the Hypocrite in his Words. Voltaire, Pufferdorf, &c.

him to come to Warfovia. This Difcourse therefore of the Cardinal gave him great Reason to suspect that he had been well paid for it by King Au-

His Majesty nevertheless gave no Token of his Displeasure; but continued to caress him very particularly, and ordered Count Piper, as his first Minister, to pay him a Visit. The Cardinal received the Count with great Civility, and discoursed with him near two Hours, in the Presence of the Little-General of the Crown.

The Result of the Conserence was, that the Poles were ready to submit to whatever else the King of Sweden should exact of them, but would never attempt to dethrone their King. In all the Conserences which were had with the Cardinal, he always spoke in this Language, whether for the Reason which we have above alledged, or whether he seared the Approach of the Saxon Army; or lastly, whether it was that he would not render himself suspected by the Nobility, whose Favour he very much courted.

This Conduct of the Cardinal did not hinder the King from marching directly to the Enemy, to put an End to all the Difficulties which obstructed his Designs by a Battle. However, he entered first into another private Conversation with him in Lubomirski's Closet; but the Primate stood firm, and gave not the least Symptom of ever intending to change his Resolution. He alledges as his Reasons, That he was considered by the Republick, out of the Diet, as only a private Gentleman; that during the King's Life, no other Person could convene a Diet; that if they should elest another King, there would never be any Peace in the Republick, the Elector of Saxony being a very powerful Prince, and so near a Neighbour; and lastly, that he would never be reproached with having dethroned his King.

The Primate concluded his Discourse by making several Propositions to his Majesty, which, as they were only for the Interest of Poland, and very far from amounting to such an entire Satisfaction as the King desired, were all rejected. The Cardinal seeing the King very steady in his first Resolution, and not thinking himself safe at Warsovia after his Majesty's Departure, had his Audience of Leave, and retired with Count Lessinski, to an Estate of his in the Palatinate of Lublin.

The King, before his Departure from Warfovia, fent an Express to Pomerania, with Orders to the General Baron Nils Gullenshierna to enter Poland immediately with his Army of 12000 Men, which he had drawn together near Stetin, and 'to come and join him, Baron Morner and Counc Stenbock, Major-Generals, who had remained at Wilna, teceived Orders at the same Time to leave some Troops with Count Sapieba, the Great-General, and with the rest to join his Majesty on the Road to Cracovia.

As the Bridge on the Vistula was finished, the King order'd Mr. Gyllen-krok, Major of the Guards, to march before, with 500 Horse, and 300 Foot, to gather up Provisions, and raise Contributions for the Army; and then, after giving an Audience of Leave to the Ambassadors from the Republick, who had remained at Warlovia, and a particular Audience to the Marquiss de Heron, the French Envoy, his Majesty departed the 16th of June, and encamped with his Army at Tarczin, in the Road of Craccovia, passing through Novemaisto, which is the thorter Rout, but very destitute of Provisions, the Palatinates of Sendemir and Craccovia, through which he was to pass, having declared for King Augustus, and the Inhabitants having carried away all their Effects and Provision.

The Army continued its March through Lecziezki, whence it came to Novemiasto, where it rested some Days. Thence proceeding to Drzewice, thence to Gowerkow, and then marched to Radozicza, where they encamped and resreshed themselves for some Days, before they marched to Gablowow. Major Gyllenkrok, who was now returned from this Expedition, being at Malogocz with his Detachment.

The Difficulty of meeting with Provision, caused a Resolution in the King to turn to the Left, towards Kielee, where the Country was in a better Condition, and there were not fo many Defiles and Forests to pass through, befides that he could that Way more conveniently join Morner's Brigade.

The Army decamped the rst of July from Radozicza, and marched to Kielce, a Town belonging to the Bishop of Cratovia. Here they rested the next Day, which was the Feast of the Visitation. We now received Advice that Morner and Stenbock had already pass'd the Vistala at Casimir, and were but 8 Leagues from us. This determined the King to stay some Days at Kielce, during which we learned that King Augustus had marched from Cracovia towards Pinschow, with 5000 Saxons, and that the Army of the Crown, under the Command of Prince Lubomirski, was to join him near Sendomir.

Colonel Meyerfelt was detached with fix hundred Horse, to reconnoitre the Enemy. He returned the fifth, without having met with more than an hundred Valoche Guards, whom Captain Fund purfued to no purpole; but as to the Peasants and Inhabitants of the Country, they had all abandoned it, retreating towards the Saxon Army. The King in the mean Time, attended by the Duke of Holftein, and a small Number of Officers, went to look after General Morner, who used all possible Diligence to join the Army. His Majesty returned the fixth in the Evening, and gave Orders for the Army's decamping the next Day, and marching to Opietza, which is three Quarters of a League from Clischow, and that one League and a Half from Pinschow.

Augustus was already come to Clischow with his Army, where he waited for that of the Crown, which was making great Haste towards him. Lubomirski had desired Augustus to stay for him, that he might have a Share in the Victory, which he promised himself over our Army, which he knew was not above 12000 strong; nor was our Number of effective Men greater, for we had a great many sick, besides our vast Loss of Horses, occafioned by our long Marches.

The Day after our Arrival at Opistza, there was an Alarm in the Camp. A Saxon Party had attacked our advanced Posts, commanded by Major Ornstedt, at Eight in the Morning. The Major repulsed them with such Bravery, that several of them were killed, several taken Prisoners, and their Commander wounded. This Shock put them out of any Humour of returning that Day. We lost in this Action Captain Fagerskioldt, who was killed, with some Troopers. The King, who hastened up at the first Discharge, and caused the Picquet to advance to engage them in the Action, sound it all over at his Arrival.

Mr. Morner came to the Camp the fame Evening with his Troops, which were very much fatigued, and a great many of them fick. The Arrival of these Troops gave his Majesty much Pleasure, who now took a Resolution to give Battle to King Augustus's Army, notwithstanding the Superiority of the Numbers of the latter, and the very advantageous Situation in which they were posted; and accordingly, Orders were given to, march the next Day towards the Enemy.

We shall here give a perfect Relation of that glorious Day, as it was written by Mr. Ebrenschants, a Lieutenant-Colonel, who was always near the King during the whole Action; which Relation was afterwards prefented to his Majesty in the Swedish Language.

In order to a perfect Comprehension of what passed in this Battle, it will be necessary to recapitulate some Circumstances which passed a few Days before it.

The King being arrived the 1st of July with his Army at Kielce, an epif-copal Town of Cracovia, being informed of King Augustus's March from Cracovia, detached Colonel Meyer-feldt, with 600 Horse, to reconnoise the Enemy. This Detachment marched out of the Camp on the 2d of July in the Night, and advanced to a Village called Opietza, near which 200 Cossacks lay in Ambuscade, in a Wood which covers the Villages they fell in with a small advanced Body of 30 Horse, commanded by Mr. Funk, Captain of the King's Dragoons, who repulsed them so bravely, that he dissipated and put them to Flight, killing and wounding many of them, without being able to make a single Prisoner.

On this News of the Enemy's Approach, the King ordered the Army to march on the 7th from Kielce, and to encamp at Opietza three Quarters of a League from Chilebow, where King Augustus lay with his Army: and without waiting for Mr. Morner. Major-General of Horse, who had passed the Vistula at Casimir, and was but a Day's March from us, his Majesty resolved the next Morning at the Break of Day to attack the King of Poland in his Camp; however, he at last yielded to the Instances of his Generals, who advised him to defer the Attack till the Day after, in hopes that Mr. Morner would not fail to come up, which he did accordingly, and joined the Army the Evening before the Battle.

The 8th of July, 1702, in the Morning, while the King was bufy in observing the Foragers, he perceived a Party of the Camp-guard, under the Command of Mr. Ornstedt, Major of Dragoons, engaged with some of the Enemy's Troops; he ran directly to them, with as many as he could get together; and gave Orders, at the same Time, to the Picquet to march: The Business was over before he came up, and the Enemy, which consisted of 200 Saxons, and about 100 Cossacks, put to Flight; we pursued them, killed twenty, and took about eight or nine Prisoners. On our Side, Baron Fagerskioldt, a Captain in the King's Regiment of Horse, was killed, and Captain Tyrol, of the same Regiment, with some Troopers, were wounded.

The Night which preceded the Day of Battle seemed extremely long to the King, who was impatient to see the Event of an Action, which could scarce fail of being decisive. The 9th, about six in the Morning, his Majesty drew up his Army, which was composed of 12,000 fighting Men, in order of Battle at the Head of his Camp, This Day had been already rendered samous by the glorious Passage of the Duna, which happened on the 9th of July in the preceding Year.

The Army was drawn up in two Lines, the Horse on the Wings, and the Foot in the Center; the King placed himself at the Head of the first Line on the Right, having with him Baron Rheinschild, a Lieutenant-General, Baron Morner, and Baron Horn, both Major-Generals of Horse: This Wing was composed of thirteen Squadrons, viz. one of Royal Dragoons, under Colonel Hamilton, one of the King's Drabans, commanded by Count Wrangle, a Colonel, and Lieutenant of the Drabans, who had with him Lieutenant - Colonel Otto Wrangle, of the same Corps; seven Squadrons of the Regiment of Hotse-Guards, under the Command of Baron Creutz, a Major; and four Squadrons of the Ostrogoths, which were led by Mr. Burenskold, Lieutenant-Colonel of that Regiment.

His most serene Highness the Duke of Holftein-Gottorp led the first Line of the Left Wing, having under him Baron Welling, General of Horse, and Major-General Stromberg: This consisted of twelve Squadrons, the First being of the King's Dragoons, under Lieutenant-Colonel Rotblieb; two Squadrons of the Horse-Guards. commanded by Lieutenant - Colonel Skyttenbielm and Captain Lybecker; three Squadrons of Smoland, commanded by Lieutenant Strablbammar: and fix Squadrons of Scania, under the Command of Lieutenant-Colonel Ridderkants.

Baron Liewen, Lieutenant-General. and Count Magnus Stenbock, Major-General, both of Foot, were in the main Body, at the Head of the Foot of the first Line; which consisted of twelve Battalions, four of the Guards. of which Count Sperling, Major, commanded the Granadiers; Lieutenant-Colonel Baron Poss, the second Battalion; Quarter-Master-General Gyllenbrok, the Third; and Baron Arfvidson, a Captain, the Fourth; two Battalions of Upland, under Lieutenant-Colonel Holft, and Major de Post; two Battalions of Wormland, commanded by Colonel Roos, and Lieutenant Colonel Cronmann; two Battalions of Wasmanland, under Baron Axel Sparr, and Lieutenant-Colonel Feilitz; lastly, two Battalions of Dabl-Carlers, led by Lieutenant-Colonel Siegroth, and Baron Swinhufvud, a Captain.

In the second Line, Lieutenant-Colonel Spens led eight Squadrons on the Right; the First of Royal Dragoons under Captain Funk, three Squadrons of the Horse-Guards under Captain Weszel, and four of Offragosbs, commanded by Major Sturkenfelt. On the Left, Major-General Nieroth was at the Head of eight Squadrons, one of Royal Dragoons, under Baron Creutz, a Captain; five Squadrons of Smoland, commanded by Baron Morner, a Major, and two Squadrons of Scania, led by Major Ridderkiold.

The Foot of the second Line confifted of fix Battalions, commanded by Major General Poss, whereof the two first of Westerboth, on the Right, were led by Colonel Fersen and Major Biornbufwad; the two other of Calmar and Smoland on the Left were commanded by Colonel Rank, and Lieutenant-Colonel Silwerfourr; and the two Battalions of Tremanning in the Middle, were led by the Lieutenan-Colonels Eksbladt and Hammerbielm. The referved Body confisted only of 100 Dragoons of Albedybl's Regiment, under the Command of Major Trautfetter, who was afterwards commanded with a Battalion of Tremanning to cover the Baggage.

position, in which we were afterwards obliged to make some small Alterations in the Time of Action, according to the Occurrences, giving, with a loud Voice, his usual Word, With God's Assistance, waited with Impatience for the Enemy's Army, which we had heard in the Morning were in full March to attack us; but as they did not appear, and we heard no farther News of them, his Majesty refolved, according to his first Project, to go and attack them in their own Camp.

To which Purpose he made all the Army pais through the Wood about Nine in the Morning, and gained the Plain, which is on the other Side; the Right Wing marching in two Columns, and the Left in Order of Battle, because the Wood is more open and more passable on that Side a when we were arrived here, we discovered two Bodies of the Enemies Troops near the Wood on the Left; but they retreated, without mistrusting any more than that a large Body of Swedes were advancing.

King Augustus was said to have been here in Person; and that having only feen our Left Wing, (the Columns of the Right Wing being hidden from him by some Hills) he gave himself no Trouble about us; an Error which afterwards cost him dear. The Army continued their March in four Columns, through the Extent of the Plain, at the End of which, there being a Wood, the King made them all wheel half round to the Right; paffing along by the Side of the Wood, which was on their Left, and leaving the Village of Groscow on their Right. Now we discovered the Enemy's Camp, it being precifely Noon. The King, to prevent the Enemy's Knowledge of the Arrival of his whole Army, ordered all the Horse to lower their Standards, and the Foot to surl their Colours, and carry them down, as well as the Pikes, which made the Enemy judge it was only a large Body, detached to reconnoitre them; in which false Opinion they remained very quiet in their Camp, thinking they had nothing to sear.

The King then ordered the Right Wing to pass round the Corner of the Wood to the Left, while the Left Wing under the Duke of Holstein, marched directly forward with the Foot; so that all the Army drew up as once, in the Order we have above represented, within Cannon-shot of the Enemy, and on the Back of the Wood they had just passed,

The Enemy now took the Alarma feeing all our Army advancing in Order of Battle, they presently beat the General, and gave the Signal by the Discharge of two Cannon, the third not going off.

The King, attended by the Duke of Holltein and the Generals, went instantly to reconnected the Ground in Person, and sound the Attack very difficult, not to fay impracticable, on Account of the Morasses with which the Enemy's Camp was almost surrounded. The Head of the Camp was fixed on a riling Ground, which commands all the Country round it, and whence the Gannon which was there mounted, played on all the Avenues, and hindered our Approach. Before this Place, there were two Monasses, at a Mile Distance from each other, that on the Right beginning at a Village named Coquet, and the other between Coquet and the Village of Virbitza; reaching the whole Length of their Camp, and ending in a Pond or Brook on their Left, furrounded with Bogs, near the Village of Rembowa, which protected their Wing; and beyond this Pond a third Morals was extended in the Form of a Half-moon, behind their Camp almost as far as their-Right; and was flanked by a thick and shady Wood: In short, a Post, so advantageously situated for Defence. and so difficult to be attacked, would have disconcerted any Charles XII.

His Majesty seeing the absolute Impossibility of attacking the Enemy, as they stood in Battalia, at the Head of their Camp, making a very smart. Fire on us from their Artillery, performed the Part of a great General, and ordered the Army to wheel a little to the Less, to gain the rising Ground, and disangage themselves from the Morasses, which absolutely, hindered them from acting.

This Motion obliged the linemy to change their Disposition; and quitting their advantageous Situation, to draw towards the Right, passing through some marshy Ground, and the Village, of Cogner, where the Desiles produced the Effect which the King of Sweden had promised himself,

The Enemy now ranged the Crown Army, confishing of 12000 Men, on the Right, with the Coffacks in their Flank, and lined them with the other Pancenes and Poles, armed Cap-a-pee, in Ranks at cermin Distances, according to their Manner, before the Village of Kye; wherein they committed a great Error, the Ground there being properer far the Saxons to act in, whose Situation was by this Means embarrassed. Their Right Wing of Horse was ranged before the Village of Coquot in several Lines, and from thence to their Lest was a Line of Saxon Foot, with a Morass both before and behind them.

Whilst the two Armies made these Motions, we perceived the Enemy's Left Wing of Horse beginning to defile along the Village of Rembowa, to fall on the Right Flank of the Swedish Army: His Majesty being ·acquainted with this, answered sternly, Let them do it; not doubting but that' they would be repulled with Vigour. About two in the Afternoon, the King, having thus gained the riling Ground, as well as all that which lay? between the Wood and the Morafs. thought proper to line the Squadrons with some Regiments of Poot, "viz." those of Dabl-Carlers, Wefmanland,1 and Wormland Commanded by Lieutthant-General Liewen and Count Stenbock; at the fame Time ordering the Regiment of Calmar to have an Eye on the Flank, amount of it right against

The Duke of Holstein was new ordered to begin the Attack; but while! this brave Prince was preparing to march ("he unfortunately received a thot from a Falconet in his Body, which obliged him to have himfelf conveyed to a poor Cottage hard by, where he died a few Hours afterwards. they began to turn about, and at last ran away full Speed, through the Village of Kye; nor was it possible to bring them any more back to the Charge.

General Welling, who, after the Duke of Holftein's Death, commanded on the Left till the King came thither himself, seeing the Saxon Horse drawn up in feveral Lines, and led by Mr. Flemming, proposed to attack them Front and Rear, himself making Head against them with four Squadrons of Scania, and ordering one Squadron of that Regiment, at the same Time, to attack the Enemy in Flank; by which Means they were to vigorously pressed! from all Quarters, that after a very bloody and obstinate Dispute on both Sides, the Saxons began to give Way, and retreated full Speed to the Village of Coquot; in their Way to which Place they were exposed to the Fire of our Regiments of Foot, namely, the Guards Upland, and Westerbothn, who' by their Discharges on them compleatedottien Rout. ow: ho - "

Our Foot in the mean Time having fafety past the Morais, prepared to attack the Enemy's Foot, who had several! Pieces of Ordhance, and a Chevaux de Frise before them, whichdefended their whole Line from one End to the other. Notwithstanding? which advantageous Situation, Major-General Poss, who commanded our Foot, attacked those of the Enemy so roughly, and with such Valour, that he broke and routed them several Times, took their Canhon, put them to Flight, and purfued them over a Morals which was in the Enemy's Rear, beyond that riling Ground which led to their Camp, where being all broke and disordered, they dispersed themselves several Ways.

A Battalion of Saxon Guards met in their Retreat with the Battalion of Tremanning, newly raised, and commanded by Mr. Ekebladt, which made a great Slaughter among them. Those under young Steinau, Brother of the Voldt-Marshal, attempting to retreat in Order, fell in with a Battalion of the Regiment of Upland, which attacked them with such Vigour, that, after killing a great many of them, they drove them on a Battalion of Calmar, and three Squadrons of Burenskiolds, who entirely defeated them, and forced them to throw down their Arms, without suffering one to

While all this passed in the Center; and on our Left, where the King was, the Left of the Enemy, commanded by the Voldt-Marshal Steinau, after, having leifurely defiled through the Village of Rembowa, as we have faid. above, fell with great Fury on our Right, which they attacked in Front, in Flank, and in the Rear. The Fight. was very bloody, and the Victory very stoutly disputed. In the mean Time the Generals Rheinschild, Spens, Morner, and Horn, who commanded there, and had at the first Shock very bravely sustained all the Efforts of the Enemy, who were very much superior to us in Horse, perceiving that their fecond Line endeavoured to gain the Wood which was in the Rear of the Swedes, and that their first Line had got between them and the Village of Brotzin, to cut them off from that Village; these Generals, I say, seconded by the incomparable Bravery of our Squadrons, which were in very close Order, took an immediate Resolution to draw up with a double Front; and Mr. Spens, at the Head of some Squadrons of the Horse-Guards, and of the Ostrogoths, facing those who approached on the Side of the Wood, overthrew them after a bloody Battle, and obliged them to join their first Line, having however first done all that could be expected from brave Men.

The Saxons, surprized at a Defence so much beyond their Expectation, and at the incredible Efforts of Bravery. in our Drabans and other Troops. which, without firing, defeated Sword in Hand all that they encountred, and, attacking their Squadrons, overthrew them one after another, resolved: at last on an hasty Retreat; which; they executed with great Precipitation, lest it should be cut off by the Swedish Foot, who were yet engaged with that of the Enemy, and from whom they were separated only by a Morassi But as our Horse pressed them too close at. their Heels to permit an orderly Re-, treat, fo, being put into Confusion, they ran over each other, and, afteri the greater Part of the Squadrons hadpassed the Defile, the rest threw themfelves all together into the Village of Virbitza. All of the same

Our Troops having surrounded them on all Sides, they had nothing left them but to cut their Way throws Sword in Hand, which they attempted; but after having cut through our Horse, they had the Missortune to meet our victorious Foot, to whose Fire they were so terribly exposed, that most of those who were not killed or wounded, were mired in the Morrass; and, to complete their Distress, the few who escaped endeavouring to take the Road by which the Left Wing had fled above the Village of Virbitza, met three Squadrons of Scania, commanded by General Welling, who were returning by the King's Orders from the Pursuit of the Enemy to join the Right Wing; these pushed them into the Village of Coquot, and put them to the Sword, except some few, who were drowned in the Canal in that Village.

In the mean Time the Saxon Horse of the Left Wing, which had eleaped the Heat of the Action, took Possesfion of a rifing Ground, very commodious to draw up in; where perceiving the Approach of our Squadrons, they gave them Time to defile over the Morals and range themselves, and then attacked them with all imaginable Bravery. Both Sides fought with great Fury; and had it not been for the extraordinary Exploits of our; Squadrons, especially the Drabans, the Enemy had penetrated through to our Foot; but finding every where an equal Relistance, that brave Body of Profe was broke, and, after having perform'd as much as could be expected from them, were at last entirely routed, and purfued into the Morafs behind their Camp, between the Villages of Clifford and Rembows, where many of them were drowned, and the rest owed their Escape to the extreme Drought of the Season. The Saxon Foot had already faved themselves the same Way under savour of the last Fight, and through the prodigious Efforts of their Horse.

King Augustus, now seeing all lost, hastened at the Head of the Right Wing and the Crown-Army to Plins-chow, whence he took the Road of Cracovia with the scatter'd Remains of his Army, the Poles having secured themselves at Sendomir.

The Ardour of the King's Troops still remained, after a Battle of four Hours; but his Majesty, who since the Death of the Duke of Holstein had fought at the Head of the Left Widg, perceiving that they were much fatigued, recalled all those who were in the Pursuit, and at 6 in the Evening entered the Enemy's Camp to the Sound of Kettle-Drums and Trumpets.

We found in the Camp 48 Pieces of Cannon, 12 of Twelve-pounders, and 26 of Three-pounders, with altheir Artillery and Ammunition. We had 300 Men killed, and 800 wounded in this Action. The Foot-Guards, who performed Wonders that Day, suffered the most; Major-General Poss, who commanded them, being very dangerously wounded.

The Enemy lost near 2000 Men killed and wounded, belides 1700 made Prisoners: "(According to Puf-" fenderf, there were 4000 sacons kil-'led, and 2000 taken Prilaners, without reckoning the Poles, which is indeed a Number more agreeable to a Victory that is agreed on all hands "to have been complete, and also to the Account which our Author him-'felf gives of the Action.)' In the Morafs behind the Camp, through which the Enemy fled, we found all their Baggage, which was there mired, particularly King Augustus's magnificent Equipage, with his Mules, Plate, and Military Cheft; likewise all the Waggons belonging to the Russian Envoy, who had faved him-

All this was the next Day given up to be plundered, which, together with the fine Tents, and the rest of what was found in great Abundance in the Camp was very convenient for our Troops, who having lest all their heavy Baggage in Courland, were very thinly provided with Equipages.

We took likewise some Ladies in the same Morass, with a great Number of Women and Children, who were all civilly treated, and soon after sent back. The Evening of the Battle the King caused Te Deum to be sung in the Camp, to give God Thanks for that signal Victory which he had just obtained.

The only Thing which cast a Damp on this publick Joy, was the Death of the great Duke of Holsein-Gottorp, with which the King was sensibly afflicted, and which all the Army extremely lamented, on Account of his Bravery, Generosity, and Greatness of Soul. His Body was embalmed, and some Time after carried to Holsein, as we shall see below.

The Day after this glorious Battle, in which we gained so complete a Victory over an Enemy so advantage-ously posted, and so much stronger than ourselves, the King caused all the Dead to be buried, and ordered great Care to be taken of the Wonnded, and that they should be conveyed as soon as possible into Houses for their better Accommodation. He then detached Major Crestz with some hundred Horse and Dragoons to make himself Master of Plinschow Castle, a League and Half from the Camp, through which the Saxons had pass'd and repass'd to Cracovia. The Major presently took Possession of the Town and the Castle, whose advantageous Situation on the River Nida render'd it very difficult to be attack'd.

The King, who came thither the next Day with a small Train, seemed furprized, that the Enemy had not expected us in this Place, instead of marching forwarder, and posting themselves, as they had done, between two Morasses; by which Means Augustus might have defended himself with more Advantage, and the Victory would at least have been longer It is very certain, that disputed. King had very bad Counsellors on this Occasion; and 'tis as true, that the Loss of this Battle was a fatal Blow to Saxony.

The King gave immediate Orders to conduct all the Wounded, both Swedes and Saxons, to Plinschow, where the Air is much wholsomer. and the Water better. The Officers, who lodged in the Castle, were treated at his own Table. His Majesty refolved to leave them here under a good Guard, and not to burden himfelf with them when he should pursue the Enemy, as he proposed. Saxon Artillery arrived first the next Day under a good Escort, the Sick and Wounded the Day afterwards; then followed all the Army, and encamped on the Banks of the Nida, in a fine Plain below the Town. Count Zinzendorff, who succeeded Count Weltz in Quality of Envoy from the Emperor, arrived now at his Majesty's Camp. As the King had no Leisure to give him Audience, he departed instantly for Cracovia, to wait for a more more favourable Opportunity. He had already been at Kielce for that Purpose, but could not speak with his Majesty there. We now sent back all the Ladies, who had been made Prifoners, with an Escort to the Frontiers of Silesia; among whom was the Wise of a Colonel, and the Wives of several other Officers.

As to the Saxon Prisoners, who beside the Wounded amounted to 1100 Men, the Council of War was divided in their Opinions concerning what Methods were to be taken; but at length his Majesty found out a Mean, which was, neither to fend them back, nor to keep them all Prisoners, but retaining only the Natives of Saxony, permitted the others, which amounted to goo Men, to enter themselves, with some of their Officers, into his Service. He formed a small Body of them, which he sent to Pomerania, to be distributed among the Fortresses, causing two Months Pay to be advanced to them. But these Troops were scarce arrived on the Borders of Silefia, when they mutinied, abused their Officers, and disbanded, many of them returning back to King Augustus.

After his Majesty had settled every Thing for the Wounded, Sick and Prisoners, he lest Lieutenant Colonel Feilitz at Plinschow to cover them with a small Body of Foot and Dragoons, which were also to levy Contributions, and keep the Polish Parties and Cossacks thereabouts in Order. The Army then decamped, and advanced (three Leagues) to Skalmiers.

We ought not here to forget to give an Account of fome Actions which happened about this Time, as well in Courland as Livonia. Bandomir, a Polish Partizan, having on the 15th of June surprized the Quarters of our Dragoons near Seelburg during the Absence of Lieutenant-Colonel Bunneer, who was at Mittau, carried off all their Equipage, and killed 29 Dragoons and a Drummer. Captain Swab was also made Prisoner in this Rencounter, with a Lieutenant and some Dragoons. We shall soon see in what Manner our Troops sound an Opportunity of being revenged.

The Battle of Einbeck in Livonia is of fomewhat more Importance, and deferves to be here reported. The following is a Relation of it. After Mr. Loscher's Action, whereof we have before spoken, the Czar, being desirous to take an Advantage of the King of Sweden's Absence, had drawn together a very confiderable Army on the Frontiers near Plescow and Pitschur, to make an Irruption into Livonia, and put all to Fire and Sword. The better to spread his Army, he had divided it into different Bodies, some stronger than others. That which marched on the Side of Waskenarva was very roughly handled by Lieutenant-Colonel Stablbom, who at the Head of 400 Men only took from the Russians, who were infinitely his Superiors, a Post called Ablfang, and drove them quite out of that Country.

Fourteen Vessels having appeared on the Peipus in the Latitude of Porkazara, Loscher, who commanded our Squadron, gave Orders to Captain Hokenstycht to go with the armed Galley named Vivat to reconnitre them. As soon as he had doubled the Promontory, he saw himself immediately surrounded on all Sides by the Enemy's Squadron. Our Vessels, which saw this, could not come to his Assistance, on account of the Calm which happen'd at that Instant; so that the Captain of the Galley, after having defended himself two Hours together with astonishing Bravery, and having spent all. his Ammunition; he then blew up his Vessel and a great Number of Muscovites at the same Time. All the Crew perish'd, except a single Priest, who had fav'd himfelf at first in a small Shallop, and brought the News of the Defeat. This passed on the 11th of Fuly.

The 16th of the same Month Major General Schlippenbach had Advice, that the Main of the Ma/covite Army, confifting of 50,000 Men, had passed the Frontiers, and was already arrived at Eratfer. The 17th the advanced Guards were alarmed by the Enemy's Parties. Mr. Schlippenbach, who had in all but 6000 Men. detach'd Baron Ungern of Sternberg, Great Hunter of Livonia, who perfectly knew the Topography of the Country, with 300 Horse to reconnoitre them. Having met a Party of 2000 Horse, he attacked them, and after having routed them, he drove them back to the Body of their Army. He then retreated, and was purfued home to the Picket of Schlippenbach's Army, which was drawn up in Order of Battle; and coming to his Assistance, obliged the Enemy to stop, and retreat with great Precipitation.

Mr. Schlippenbach now went himfelf without Loss of Time to reconnoitre their Forces and Designs; and seeing the Enemy cause their Troops to desile cross the Morass at Taggaval to surround them on all Sides, he instantly retreated towards the River Embach to dispute the Enemy's Passage, in case they should follow him. This Retreat was perform'd in good Order over two Bridges, which he had made; but as the Heat of the Season had brought the River very low, and the Enemy had passed over the Ford and on Pontons in several Places, the General found himself obliged to stand his Ground, and draw up in Order of Battle.

The Fight began at Six in the Morning : and notwithstanding the Enemy's superior Number, our Troops, after a Fight of two Hours, repulsed them, broke them, and put them to Flight, and purfued them as far as the River Embach, taking from them fix Field-Pieces, and a great Part of their Baggage: Here the Action was very hot; the Enemy, who could not fave themselves by Flight, defended themselves in Despair, and, having received Succours, they at last made our Horse give Ground, who throwing themselves on the Foot, put them in Disorder, whilst themselves ran away full Speed; nor could Mr. Schlippenback or the Officers make them rally, or bring them back to the Charge.

The abandon'd Foot were now entirely defeated, except a small Number which saved themselves in the Woods. The General seeing all lost, retreated towards Pernau, with as many of his broken Troops as he could get together. He was obliged after this Defeat to abandon all this Country to the Russians, who plunder'd it, set Fire to the little Town of Walk, where they inhumanly murder'd the Inhabitants, and carried all those who sell into their Hands, as well young as old, into Slavery: However, they did not as yet undertake the Siege of Dorpt; and instead of improving the Advantage they had gained, they repassed the Frontiers according to Custom.

Augustus, who had retreated to Cracovia after the Battle of Clissowa, thought of nothing but of drawing up the Remainder of his Army, and to put himself in a Condition to oppose the new Enterprizes of the King of Sweden. This King, having received a Reinforcement of eight Regiments. which General Robel had brought him from Saxony, caus'd an Intrenchment to be made, which should cover his Camp, in case that the King of Sweden should attack him, as he had great Reason to apprehend. He sent back Baron Sack to his Swedish Majesty; the Baron was a Captain of the King of Sweden's own Regiment of Horse, and had been made. Prisoner at the Battle of Cliffowa, through the Impetuolity of his Horse, which had carried him into the Middle of his Enemies Squadrons.

The Baron returned to the King's Camp with feveral Propositions of Peace on the Behalf of King Augustus; but they were all rejected. In the mean Time his Swedish Majesty, that he might not be behind hand with the King of Poland in Generofity and Politeness, returned him thirteen Saxon Officers the same Evening, having first magnificently treated them at his Court. And as he heard on all Sides that the King of Poland had a Design to repair to Leopold, to avoid a second Battle, Count Stenbock was detached the same Night the shortest Way towards the Vistula. The King presently caused the Foot with the Artislery and Baggage to pass over the River, which being not very deep in this Place, tho pretty wide, the Horse, to gain Time, passed at a Ford; so that the whole Army was got over by the Evening, and encamped near Solomna, where they rested one Day, and the next Day proceeded to Bocknia, a little Town, where there are Salt-pits, sive Leagues from Cracovia.

Augustus, having timely Notice by the Cossacks and his Parties of the King's March, departed suddenly, and prevailed fo much by their long Marches, that his Army decamped from Bochnia the same Morning that ours was on their March thither. His Rear-guard appearing on a high Mountain to obferve us, his Majesty mistook them for the Van-guard, and made the Army hastily pass a little River which empties itself into the Vistula, and there ranging them in Battalia, advanced briskly towards the Mountain, not doubting but that he was on the Point of giving them Battle. But the Rearguard of the Enemy, contented with having observed our Motions, and covered the March of the main Body of their Army, which had already gained a League of us, hasted to join them full Speed. The King therefore, at his Arrival at Bochnia, seeing that it was impossible to overtake them, encamped his own Army near a Castle before the Town, in which there remained a few Saxons with one Baggage Waggon and some Tents.

The next Day the King, as he was riding out on Horseback with Count Stenbock, and twenty Officers, hearing that the Valoches had come to a Village near his Camp, and had killed fome Soldiers who were looking after Provisions, his Majesty hastened thither; and whilst he was riding backwards and forwards to discover whether any of the Enemy were there, he was all of a sudden attacked by a large Party, who had lain in Ambuscade among the Houses, who came out upon him with a great Outcry.

The King, who was infenfible of the Danger, presently engaged them, repulsed them, and pursued them near a Quarter of a League out of the Village; but as their Number continually increased, it was necessary for him to think of a Retreat before it was cut off, especially as the Valoches were in Possession of a Bridge over which we were to return. The King then resolved to go directly up to them, and to present his Pistol without firing till he was sure of his Mark. This Boldness discomfited them, and gave his Majesty with Count Stanbock and several Officers an Opportunity to pais.

Colonel Dabldorf and Mr. Nils Rofenftierna, Captain of the Guards, were wounded and made Prisoners, their Horses being too much fatigued to save them. A Page named Klinkowfirom was shot through the Arm by an Arrow, and several of those Officers who escaped were wounded by Sabres and Tartarian Picks, which are called Copeies.

The Picket of the Army having heard the Fire, advanced with great Haste; but the Valeches had the Prudence to retreat at their Arrival, and to carry their Prisoners away with them. The King returned safely to the Camp, without having received the least Hurt, tho' he had never been in greater Danger, his Horse twice sallen under him in the Middle of his Enemies.

. The King having lost all Hopes of bringing the Enemy to a Battle, turned towards Cracovia, to stay for the Arrival of General Gyllenstierna, who came from Pomerania with 12000 Men to reinforce him. The Army staid some Days on the Road near the Convent of Stauenko, three Leagues from Bochnia, where the Duke of Mecklenbourg-Swerin arrived, and had an immediate Audience of the King. At the same Time two Deputies from the Palatinate of Cracovia came to befeech his Majesty to have Pity on their Country, which had already suffer'd much by the Saxon Army that had flaid some Time amongst them. They offered to furnish his Majesty with Provision and whatever he would exact for the Sublistence of his Troops. This Submission was very well received. and they departed well fatisfied with the Promises which were delivered him in Writing on the Behalf of his Ma4 jesty, by Mr. Hermelin, Secretary of the Chancery, which affined them of his Protection, and that he would take Care to make his Troops observe a most exact Discipline.

From thence the Army marched directly to Crawvia, a large and fine City situated on the Visula, where the Kings of Poland are commonly crowned, and where they often fix their Residence. It is sufrounded by an old Wall, with a Mote, and has very large and beautiful Suburbs. The Castle is sufficiently strong to make some Resistance in case of an Attack, and by that Means to obtain an honourable Capitulation.

before Cracevia, the Starost Francis Vielopol/ki, who commanded there, caused all the Gates to be shut, as well of the Town as the Castle, making a Shew of pretending to defend himself. with the small Garrison of the Crown, which he had sunder his Commando The King, incenfed at feeing a Place of so little Consequence dare to dispute the Entrance of a victorious Army, embark'd a Detachment of 400 Ment under the Command of Count Stepbeck, on several Boats which we found: on the Vistula, and made them pass over to the other Side, the Sanons having taken the Precaution to break down the Bridge which usually: stood in that Placecia, recally the got doubt This Detachment having found the Gates of the Suburba of Calmir topens enter'd them without any Oppolition. and advanced up to the Gates of the Town, which were shut, and provided with Guards. The Count caused them: immediately to be fummon'd in his Majesty's Name to surrender; and having had no other Answer, than that they bad lost the Keys, he defired to speak with the Governors who afser much Difficulty, came to confer with him in an Outwork, which was only of Wood appredowith Publishes and an Iron Gates The Countilisms month him again to open the Gites to the King, shewing thin the Danger to which he zexposed whimself wand: the Town by a longup Reliftance: . He reprefented to himpselpically the good Intelligence which fublisted serween his Majesty and the Republick; and that they had every where opened the Gates to the Swides. The Governor's Answer was, that the Town and Caffle had been introfted to him by the King his Master, and that he could not sucrender them without making a Defence.

In the Middle of this Dispute, and whilst the Count was beginning to threaten the Governor, that if he did not open the Gates immediately, they would be all put to the Sword without having any Favour to expect, the King, impatient for the Event of this Affair, and who had passed the River, came up to the Governor without making himself known to him, and ordered him in French to open the Gates instantly, faying to him, Outre la Porse. The Governor, who knew not the King, made him no Answer; at which he being to the last Degree enraged, order'd the Gates to be instantly actacked and forced; which Orders were executed with fo much Vigour, that the Governor had scarce Time to regain the great Gate of the Town, which the King entered at the same Time. As his Majesty had forbid them to fire. they forced the Guards with their Swords : Bayonets and Canes, throw down their Arms. The King. pursuing his Point, detached presently fome Platoons to secure the Streets. which were all full of Genery on Horseback, and to disarm the Mainguard in the Market-place. Charles himself with a small Party pursued the Governor so briskly, who fled towards the Castle to defend himself. that he enter d'at the same Time with him with his Sword in his Hand; 200 c Men being the Guard, were so disconcerted, that they presently threw down their Arms.

At this Instant a Lieutehant of the Artillery had the Boldness to attempt to give Fire to a Cannon which was pointed at the Gate against the Swedes, who crowded in to follow the King. His Majesty perceiving him caught him by the Throat, threw him down, and fnatched the Match out of his Hand. The Governor now perceiving himself in the Hands of the Swedes, and knowing that the King was there in Person, approached his Majesty, and threw down his Arms, defiring his Favour; but it was now too late, so that he was arrested and made Pri-The Deputies of the Palatinate in vain interceded on his Behalf; he was kept Prisoner till he had paid a large Sum of Money for his Ranfom.

The Conduct of Vielopolski on this Occasion, was condemn'd by his own Countrymen; for when he should have. either taken Measures to have defended himself, or have surrender'd the Town and Castle with a good Grace, he did neither the one nor the other; and by his false Bravery incensed a Prince who was inur'd to Conquest, and whom he could not refift. Count Stenbock was made Governor of the Town, which paid very dear for the rash Resistance of their late Governor : and the Inhabitants were condemned in 100000 Crowns Contribution, befides the Provisions which they were oblig'd to furnish the Garrison with, which confifted of three Regiments of Foot, which the King plac'd here to keep the Town and Suburbs in Order.

To open a free Communication, they began at the fame Time to throw a Bridge over the Vistula, which was finished the next Day, but was carry'd away a few Days afterwards by a great Over-flowing of the River, occasion'd by the Rains which fell on the Hungarian Mountains, where this River rifes. These Waters likewise overslow'd the Quarters of some Regiments of Horse, which were encamp'd on the Banks of the Vistula. The Bridge was, however, soon repair'd, and the King brought all the Sick into the Town, for their better Accommodation.

All this while the Valoches, who from Clischow had never ceased to attend our Army, continually harraffed those Parties which we were oblig'd to detach for Forage and Contributions, and who sometimes brought off some Soldiers, Victuals, and Servants, from the Enemy. The 7th the Valoches, to the Number of 3 or 4000 Men, attack'd, a Quarter of a League from the Camp, Mr. Ornstedt, who was made Lieutenant-Colonel to the Regiment of Scania, which had been detach'd to cover the Foragers. This Officer, with his small Party, overthrew them, and push'd them into the Wood, before the Picker, which haften'd to his Assistance, was come up. The King, to prevent these frequent Difturbances from the Valoches, order'd the Foot always' to accompany the Horse on the foraging Days, and to lie in Ambufcades to furprize them. This Precaution oblig'd the Valoches to keep on their Guard, and not to return but with a good Force.

The King now caused them to make a Brais Coffin at Cracovia, for the Corpse of the Duke of Holstein, which they had always carry d in the Rear of the Army, and which had been embalm'd the Day after his Death, at the Battle of Clissowa. Charles, according to the establish'd Custom of Sweden, repair'd in Company of the Duke of Mecklenbourg, Count Piper, and his principal Generals, into the Hall, which was all illuminated, where they had deposited the Body of the Prince, which they had laid on a Bed three Foot high, under a Canopy of black Velvet, lac'd and fring'd with Silver. His Majesty and the Lords of his Train laid the Lid on the Cossin, on which they afterwards spread a long Velvet Pall, edg'd with Silver.

After this Ceremony, the King retir'd, much afflicted with the Loss of a Brother-in-Law, whom he very tenderly lov'd. The Duke of Mecklenbourg appear'd no less afflicted, having been a great Friend of his late Highnels, who when the King was at War-Jovia had fent Mr. Birckboltz, a Gentleman of his Chamber to the Duke. to affure him of his Defire to make a Campaign with him under his Majesty. Perhaps he had likewise another secret Reason for this, namely, to marry the younger Princels of Sweden, Sifter to his Majesty and the Dutchess Dowager of Holstein. He was already come as far as Breflaw. when he heard of the Duke of Holstein's Death; and being unwilling to return before he had feen the King, repaired afterwards to his Majesty. who gave him a very good Reception. He returned Post as soon as he had paid his last Respects to the Duke of Holstein.

The 11th the King caused the whole Army to defile through Cracevia, and encamp on the other Side of it, where the Ground was higher and the Forage better. Augustus, after his Retreat from Bochnia, was come to Sendomir, to convene the Nobility and Grandees of his Kingdom. After they had deliberated on the present Conjuncture, which appeared very dangerous to this King, they resolved to send a new Embassy to the King of Sweden, to offer bim the Mediation in the Name of the Republick; and, if he would not consent to it, that the Nobility, or Pospolite, should confederate themselves in Favour of King Augustus, and assure him of an inviolable Fidelity, with a Promise never to consent that this Prince should be dethroned.

But the greatest Part of the Nobility, especially those of Great Poland, were not herein comprized, nor present, and consequently the Republick was not complete, the Resolutions of this Affembly was looked on as null, and produced no Effect. Mr. Lip/ki. Waiwode of Calis, who had been a Deputy to his Swedish Majesty at Dlougowitz, in Quality of first Ambassador from the Republick, had the Missortune to lose his Life on this Occasion. The Nobility, who knew very wellthat he had been gained by the Prefents of King Augustus, and who likewise knew with what Haughtiness he had spoken to the King of Sweden's Ministers, reproached him with having been the Cause of the War, by an illtaken Pride, which had incensed that Prince; so that after having resolved on his Destruction, they gave him fome Cuts with a Sabre, of which he died a few Days afterwards,

As Trouble and Division encreased every Day, and the Diet was on the Point of breaking up, Augustus abandoned Sendomir, passed the Vistula at Casimir, with his Saxon Army; and, after having settled his March, he went before to Warsovia, with 4000 Horse. But before he quitted the first of these Places, he sent back to the King of Sweden 38 Soldiers and Valets, made Prisoners by the Valoches-fince the last Battle, with a Lieutenant, who was to present them to the King, and an Escort of thirty Troopers. Charles took this very well of Augastus, treated the Officer at his Court, and ordered the Escort to be well entertained till their Departure. He likewise made the Officer a Present of fifty Ducats, ten to each non-commission Officer, two to every Trooper; and not contenting himself with all this Return of Civility, he sent back at the same Time a Major, named Opela, to whom he presented a fine Horse out of his own Stable, with all his Caparison, and a Sword of the Swedish Fashion: He likewise permitted the Officer to retake with him from Plinschow all the Saxon Officers' who were recovered, and in a Condition of travelling: And likewise gave Leave to 400 Saxon Soldiers, who were fick at Cracovia, to return into their native Country.

In the mean while, General Brandt joined the Crown Army at Sendomir, with a Regiment of Dragoons which he brought with him from Prusha; he likewise gave them to understand, that he had formed some Design on the Castle of Pinschow. He was a Man of Fortune, but an old Soldier, and a famous Partizan, and had acquitted himself with great Reputation in the last War in Poland. The King being apprifed of his Design by Lieutenant-Colonel Feilitz, who commanded at Plinschow, and knowing likewise that he harassed the Parties detached from the Castle to raise Contributions, sent Colonel Meyerfelt, at the Head of 600 Troopers, who having laid all the Neighbourhood under Contribution, supplied Plinschow with a great Quantity of Provifions, and burnt the Town of Noviomasta, which had refused to contribute. By which Example of Severity, he designed to inspire Terror into all Places which might be inclined to Resistance.

The fame Day Count Zinzendorff, the Emperor's Envoy, had his first Audience. He began with congratulating his Majesty, in the Name of the Emperor his Master, on the Victories which he had gained; assuring him of the unalterable Friendship of his Imperial Majesty: Lastly, entreating bim to bave at Heart the deplorable State of Affairs in Europe, and to apply a Remedy to them, by a firm Peace with Augustus, and by accepting the Mediation of all the contending Parties, as he had formerly done at Ryswick. He concluded with complimenting his Majesty, in High Dutch, in a very bigh Strain, on the last Battle of Clissowa. King thanked him very graciously, in the same Language; and appeared very well satisfied with this Ambasador.

We have already observed, that this Minister not being able to obtain Audience at Kielce, had followed the Army to Plinschow; where his Majesty, who was weary of seeing him always at his Heels, fent Mr. Ducker, his Aid-de-camp-general, to make him a Compliment, and defire him to absent himself from the Army, till he could find some Place more commodious; representing to him at the same Time, that his Majesty could not allow him a Liberty which he refused all other Ministers. Count Zinzendorff repaired then to Cracovia, where he was at last admitted to an Audience of the King, whose gracious Reception made him amends for all the Time which he had lost in Solicitation.

This Minister had, however, little Reason to be pleased at the Success of his Negotiation. He was charg'd to neglect nothing to effect a Reconciliation between the two Kings, with which View he offer'd the Mediation of the Emperor his Master. And obferving the Civilities which mutually passed between these Princes, in fending back Prisoners to each other without Ransom, he thought he could not make Use of a more favourable Conjuncture; flattering himfelf, that the King of Sweden would at last comply: and be brought to a perfect Reconciliation with the King, who was his Relation, and who protested, that he wish'd for nothing more ardently than To prevent any Doubts of these good Dispositions in Augustus, this Minister produc'd Letters from Count Stratman, who was his Imperial Majesty's Envoy to the King of Poland; in which he afferted, that this King was ready to give Charles XII. all the Satisfaction which could be requir'd of him. Lastly, to remove all Suspicion, he gave Assurances that King Augustus would, without Delay, withdraw all his Troops from Poland, to engage them in the Emperor's Ser-And, that he might not give the least Room for any Umbrage, he engag'd, in no Manner to oppose the March of those Troops which Major-General Maidel was bringing to reinforce his Swedish Majesty's Army. Besides all these fine Promises, Count Zinzendorff produc'd a Letter, written with King Augustus's own Hand, by which his Polish Majesty left not any Reason to suspect the Sincerity of his Intentions: But as this Minister fear'd that Letter might remain unanswer'd, he excused himself, at present, from leaving it in his Majesty's Hands.

Whilft Count Zinzendorff employed all his Engines to make these fair Propositions agreeable to the King of Sweden's Ministers, Augustus labour'd on his Side to re-unite Men's Minds at Warfovia, where he had call'd a Diet. that he might animate them against the King of Sweden, and bring them heartily to espouse his Cause. These Proceedings, which did not at all agree with the fine Promifes of the Imperial Minister, broke all the Meafures which he had taken, and involved hish in very great Difficulties; till at last, not knowing which Way to turn himself, he cast all the Blame on the Cardinal Primate, and the Family of Sapieba, whom he fuspected to be always good Frenchmen, and publickly accused to be the Cause of the Continuation of all the Troubles; in which Opinion he was particularly confirm'd by the Cardinal fending Colonel Sauerbre with a particular Commission to Count Piper. In Reality, Count Stratman knew so well how to infatuate King Augustus, that Mr. Heron, the French Minister, as well as the Cardinal, afterwards very much refented this, as we shall see a little lower.

About this Time Baron Nils Gyllenfierna arriv'd at Cracovia, and inform'd his Majesty that the Pomeranian Army, which had passed thro' the higher Poland, was but four Leagues distant from this Town. The King came hither the next Day, and was highly pleased with the fine Appearance of his Troops, which amounted mounted to near 12000 Men, all well disciplin'd, and well cloath'd. As it was very easy to find Forage in these Quarters, which indeed very much abounded with it, the King lest here the main Body of his Army, and detach'd Lieutenant Colonel Burenschild on the other Side, towards the Hungarian Mountains, to lay all the Country under Contribution.

General Gyllenstierna remain'd not long with the Army. As the King wanted a Man of some Capacity in the conquer'd Provinces in Germany, he order'd that General to repair thither, as well to have an Eye over the neighbouring Powers, as to levy Troops, and put those Provinces in Posture of Desence.

As foon as all the Dispositions were made, the Body of the late Duke of Holsein was carried, with a strong Escort, to the Frontiers of his Dominions, where he was afterwards buried in the Tomb of his Ancestors at Sleswick, with great funeral Pomp. About this Time a great Number of invalid Soldiers, who were in no Condition to serve, were sent back to Sweden; his Majesty having before their Departure distributed Twenty Crowns to every one of them, to defray the Expences of their Journey.

Some Days afterwards the King gave Orders to the Army to hold themselves ready to march. As he intended to conduct the Sick and Trophies by Water on the Vistula, he detached Colonel Axel Sparre, with 300 Foot, to get together as many Boats or Vitines as he could pick up along that River; at the same Time ordering him to prepare Floats, which might be used in case the Boats should not be sufficient. The Night before Col.

Sparre's Departure the castle of Cracovia took fire, without any one's being able to discover how it happened. This Fire continued all the Day, and reduced the Castle to Ashes; several Persons being buried under its Ruins.

The News of Mr. Sparre's Departure being brought to the Crown Army, which still remained at Sendomir, Prince Lubomirski, Chamberlain of the Crown, began his March immediately, with Twenty four Companies, to attack him. The Colonel was posted in a Town called Usia, four Leagues from Cracovia. The Enemy arrived about Noon, having with them a great, Number of Peasants, to level the Hedges, and remove every Thing that might obstruct the Attack. Mr. Sparre, who luckily had received timely Information, drew up in the Place in order of Battle, and distributed Platoons through all the Streets, to divert the Enemy, who entered with a dreadful Outcry on all Sides. Our Platoons presently fired on these Troops, being almost close to them; and as they were usually afraid of our Foot, they foon gave Ground, and contented themselves with having set fire to some wooden Houses round the Market place. This Enterprize not having, succeeded according to the Enemy's hopes, they now began to retreat in great Confusion, and were briskly pursued by our People; some of them retreated into the Churchyard, and made a shew of intending to defend themselves there, others got into the Church, and climbed up into the Bellfry, whence they fired inceffantly on the Swedes. Mr. Sparre ordered Gustavus Stiernbock, Captain of the Guards, to dislodge them. The Captain attacked them so gallantly, that he was in a little Time Master of the Church-yard, and put them to slight, with the loss of several both killed and wounded.

On the other Side, General Brand gave continual Disturbance to the Garison of Pinschow, which he made a show of attacking by Storm; to prevent which his Majesty gave immediate Orders to the two Majors of foot and horse Guards, Gyllenkrok and Creutz, to march with 2000 and some hundred Men, who were also to bring away from Pintzchow all the Sick, and the Saxon Trophies, which they were to guard as far as the Vistula; and as this Detachment was to use Expedition, they mounted the Foot on Horseback, in order to hasten their March: As foon as the Polift General was informed hereof, he changed his Resolution, and passing near Pintzchow, with 1000 Horse, went and posted himself at twelve Leagues distance; he surprized at Drbrokowa. and near the Castle of Zarnowatz, and in a third Place, 200 Horse, with two Captains and two Lieutenants. who were all made Prisoners. nel Crassau, of the Pomeranian Army, had fent that Detachment towards Peterkow. levy Contributions. to The Majors Gyllenkrok and Greutz finding no Enemy at Pintzchow. contented themselves with withdrawing the fick and wounded, most of whom were already recovered, whom they conducted, with the Cannon and Trophies, to Oparowitz, some Leagues from Cracovia, to wait the Arrival of his Majesty.

Party which had been detached by Lieutenant general Stuart, and which was commanded by Colonel Adam Lowenbaupt, made continual Incurfions into Samogitia, where they commited great Ravages; the Colonel likewise made several Prisoners. mong which wore Colonel Korff, the Constable Pufing, and Captain Ruffel, whom Lowenbaupt, had fent to Mittaw, as Hostages for the Contributions which were laid on the Country. At his Return he was befet near the Pass of Possible, by a large Body of Lithuanians, whom he couted with half their Number. This Party returned to the Charge with fresh Troops, near the Town of Chaimen, and attacked Lowenhaupt with all imaginable Fury, both fighting with great Obstinacy: the Victory was some Time doubtful, 'till the Lithuanians having lost their Commander, were put to flight; and Lowenbaupt purfuing them, they left great Numbers dead and wounded behind them. We had on our Side only one non-commissioned Officer and fixteen Soldiers killed, and two Lieutenants, some non-commissioned Officers, and twenty-four Soldiers wounded.

Every Thing was now ready at Cracovia for the Embarkation of the Cannon and Trophies on the Vitines and Floats, which they had there got together, when an Express arrived with Letters from the Cardinal Primate, and Mr. Morstein, who at the last Diet at Sendomir had been picked out as an Embassador to the King, The former yet offered his Mediation, and the latter brought Advice of the Commission with which he was charged. But Mr. Morstein

having used some haughty Expressions, and even such as were a little hard, in the Letter which he writ to Count Piper, the Express was presently sent back with an Answer, purporting, 'That his Majesty would not admit " Morfein, in case that he had any ' Propositions to make, differing from those his Majesty had made on his ' Part; that the Republic had besides ' shewn too much Partiality for him to accept of her Mediation; that if " she had defired to have had a share in determining the Differences between the contending Parties, the should not have interested herfelf either on one Side or the other; that several of her Members had com-" mited many Hostilities; and lastly, if his Majesty should resolve on Peace, and to accept of the Republic's Mediation, the ought first to punish those who had diffurbed the publick Tranquility, and by their continual Excursions had hindred his 5 Majesty from effecting his good De-" ligne."

Mr. Morstein did not rest here, he writ back again, and once more defired his Majesty to allow him an Audience; with Assurances, that as soon as the Negotiation should be on Foot, the Republic would not fail to punish those who had the Missortune to displease him by their Conduct. The King remained unmoveable on this Article: he sent no Answer to Mostein, and gave him sufficiently to understand, that he would not fail to execute the Resolution he had taken.

An Accident which happened to the King seemed likely to disappoint all his great Projects, his Majesty having had the Missortune to break his left Thigh; that unfortunate Accident, which spread a Consternation through the whole Army, happened by the following Means.

Count Stenbock, who was lately made Director-general of War, had formed a Company of Towarches, which was composed of 150 Men, all poor Polish Gentlemen, who were ordered to perform their Exercises in his Majesty's Presence. The Count putting himself at their Head, to this purpose departed from Cratovia on a gallop, and paffed by the King's Tent at the Instant he was litting down to dinner; his Majesty, instead of dining, ordered his Horse immediately to follow them; and being arrived at Morner's Regiment, his horse entangled himself in the Lines of the Tents, and falling on the King's left Thigh, broke the Bone quite off.

This unforefeen Accident brought Tears into the Eyes of all who were present, he alone seemed not to feel it; and speaking to those who appeared the most trightened with wonderful Resolution, he told them it was nothing, and would be easily eured; no one heard him complain, or give the least Token of that Pain which he must necessarily endure.

As he could not support himself on his Leg, some Drabans carried him into Mr. Morner's Tent, where the Surgeons applied their first Remedies; from thence the King was carried into a House in the Suburbs. And as this Missortune necessarily retarded the Departure of the Army, they were sent into Quarters in the Town and the Suburbs, the Season of the Year not permiting them any longer to keep the Field.

The

The news of this Fall soon became Publick; nor were any Pains omitted to spread abroad that Charles XII. was dead; his Enemies caused that: News to be put in the foreign Gazettes. It is certain, that he appeared at first in extreme Danger, which put all the Army in a great Con-They were very much sternation. afraid of the coming on of a Fever, which is common enough on such Occasions, at least they thought he must pass his Winter at Cracovia. But the King's excellent habit of Body. foon gave them Comfort; and in about eight Days he began to talk of his Departure.

To make the King's Voyage more commodious, they had prepared some large Vitines, in which they had built Cabins for his Majesty, and part of the Court, in order to carry them by Water; but the Evening before his Departure he changed his Resolution, and chose forty-eight Soldiers of the Guards, which were to carry him by turns on a Bed, and to whom he gave every Day of their March a Crown a-head. The King found this way of Carriage more convenient than a Litter, which would have shaken him too much.

Every Thing being ready for the Departure of the Army, and the Floats which the Colonels Axel Sparre and Rank had taken care to provide being got ready, four Regiments of Horse were ordered to go before towards Sendomir, and the King himfelf began his March with the rest of his Army.

They encamped at Igolomia, whence Count Jaspar Sperling was detached with some hundred Men over the River, to take up Provisions, and to cover on that Sides the Boats which came down from Cracovia. Days before the King had given Count Zinzendorff, who went to attend his Majesty's Arrival at Warsovia. an Escort of fifty Troopers, under the Command of a Captain, to fecure him from the Infults of the Polish Parties; a Regard, with which this Minister feemed highly delighted, and which he very publickly extolled.

The Princes Lubomirski were much' alarmed at the Rout of our Army, on account of their large Estates on the Vistula; and very far from continuing obstinate, as they had been, in the Demand of 9000 Ducats for the Ranfom of Mess. Dahldorff and Rosenstierna, who were taken by the Valockes at Bocunia, Lubomirski, the Great-chamberlain of the Crown, sent them hastily back to Igolomia, under an Escort of some Tartars and his Aid-

He took this Resolution as soon as he saw the King's Answer to Mr. Dahldorff, who informed his Majesty of the Pretentions of the Lubomirski touching his Ransom; the King signified to Mr. Dabldorff, that if the Great-chamberlain refused to set him. and Mr. Rosenstierna at liberty, he would entirely destroy all his Estates. Lubomirski endeavoured to make a Merit with his Majesty of the Liberty. which he had granted these Gentlemen. He writ to Count Piper, that he had taken great care of the Prisoners, and that he hoped they would shew the same Tenderness to his Estate; the rather, for those respectful Sentiments, and that Attachment, which he bore to his Majesty, and his Interest.

terest. This Declaration of Lubomirski carried no Appearance of Sincerity; and it was very eafy to observe, that his present Circumstances, and his own Interest, had brought him to this Language: His Majesty therefore contented himself with giving him for Answer, that in sending back the Prifoners he had done no more than his Duty, and that he should see if his future Actions would verify the Defire which he expressed to gain his Majefly's good Graces. About this Time the Cossacks of the Ukrain, which were under a Dependance on the Poles. having begun to stir up a great Revolt, and kill their Chiefs, who endeavoured to oppress them, entered, to the Number of 20,000 Men, into Podolia, and cut off all those Lords who had the Misfortune to fall into their Hands. Some rich and powerful Perions, who were Enemies to the Gentlemen of the Country, were at the Head of this Revolt.

It was plain by those Letters which we intercepted, that the Czar and King Augustus underhand somented this Rebellion, with Hopes, by those Means, to oblige the Nobility to mount their Horses, and to bring them against the King of Sweden. This Project had not the Success which Augustus expected; nay, he had the Mortification to see a Resolution taken in his Presence at Warsovia, to march a great Part of the Crown Army, under the inferior General Siniassiki, to reduce those Rebels.

In the mean Time the King began visibly to recover; and the Army having marched from Igolomia to Pikari, he caused himself to be carried from Regiment to Regiment, by that Means to visit and encourage his Troops, who were yet alarmed with the Danger to which his Majesty was exposed by his Wound. The Army remained at Pikari till the 29th of Ostober; which Time the King employed in settling the Rout; and it was agreed, that the Troops should march but slowly during the Winter; and that they should always chuse the best Places to repose themselves several Days together.

Angustus, on his Side, seeing the Diet which he had convened at War-sovia was like to produce him as little Good as all the rest, the Senators and the greater Part of the Nobility not coming thither, caused his Army to march into Polish Prussia, in order to put them into Winter Quarters.

He soon followed them himself, and came to Thorn, where he was received with all the Honours due to. him. He knew so well how to gain on the Magistrates of that Town, by his Eloquence and great Civility, that they consented, against their Privileges, to receive a strong Garrison of Saxons, to reinforce, as he pretended, those of the Town, in case of an Attack. The Magistrates of Danizick and Elbin, fearing to be surptized in the same Manner, had the Precaution humbly to offer their Towns to that King; with a Request, that he would come as a Father of their Country, and not as Sovereign. He, however, obtained, by his Presence in these Provinces, infinite Advantages for his Army, greater than he could have had in Poland, had he remained there. It must be, however, confessed, that they granted them all this more thro Fear, than any Love they had for him. The Marquis of of Heron, the French Ambassador, suffered at that Time a Digitize by GOGIC very very sensible Affront. The Emperor's Minister had a long Time placed him in a bad Light to King Augustus, who suspected that he had by his Intrigues continued the War. Mr. Heron could not but observe the Discontent of this Prince; and feeing himself treated with great Coldness, he writ to the King of Sweden, desiring his Leave to repair to him, which his Majesty would not grant, after having refused it to other foreign Ministers. King Auguflus having been informed of this Step which that Minister had taken, forbid him the Court, and ordered him to depart from Warsovia. Mr. Heron answered, that he did not think himfelf obliged to obey him, without an express Order from the Republic, to whom he was as well fent by his Master, as he was to his Majesty. flus was extremely shocked at the Anfwer of this Minister; and after having repaired from Warlovia to Thorn. he gave Orders to have him arrested: One Evening, as this Ambassador came out of the House of the Great-Marshal Bielinska, where he had supped, twelve of the Body-Guards feized his Person; and without giving him · Leave to return home to fettle his Affairs, they carried him instantly from Warsovia to Thorn, where he remained Prisoner some Time, and was from thence conducted through all Germany. to the Frontiers of France.

The Marquis of Bonac, the French Envoy at the Court of Sweden, had at the same Time an Accident of much the same Nature. This Minister, after having stopped at Riga, according to the Orders of the King his Master, had set out for Warsovia, without an Elcort, confiding in his Character, which he thought would have pretected him from all Insults. At his Approach to Kauro, he fell into the Hands of Ogin/ki, who, without paying any Respect to the Right of Nations, killed his Valet-de-chambre, treated him as a Prisoner of War, and carried him about with him for some Time.

The most Christian King, incensed to the last Degree at the Insolence of the Republick, in suffering such Violences to be comitted on two of his Ministers, the both of them had been set at Liberty, demanded a publick Satisfaction; and at the same Time imprisoned all the Pales of Distinction who were found in the Provinces of France.

After his Swedift Majesty had settled the March of our Army, he caused them to decamp from Pikari, and march to Przimakow, where they remained eight Days together.

The Loss of the Battle of Embach had changed the Face of Affairs in Livonia, where Mr. Schlippenbach was no longer in a Condition to keep the Field, till he had received a new Reinforcement, which he importunately folicited. The Czar, taking Advantage of the Weakness of the Swedes. caused his Army to defile towards Ingria, to beliege the little Town of Noteburg, fituated on the Nieva, at the Mouth of the Lake Ladoga, which is the Key of Sweden, being her farthest Fortress on that Side. fome small Vessels which cruised thereabouts, but the Enemy, whose Forces were superior to ours, obliged them to repais the Nieva, and to retreat towards Wybourg, so that the Russians. became entire Masters of Ladera.

Velt-Marshal Schreremetoff having approached this Place with the Ruffian Army, detached on the 26th of September, 400 of the Preobrofinski Guards to post themselves before the Place. Two Battalions of the same Regiment followed the same Evening, with all the Army, and arrived there the next Day. The Russians presently opened their Trenches, and raised some Forts, so prevent any Succours being conveyed into the Town. However, three Veffels from Carelin, with fome Soldiers and Provisions, found Means to get in. But to shur up this Place the closer, and to hinder it from receiving any future Succours, the Enemy caufed 2000 Men to pass the Nieve on the 30th, and take Possession of a finall Redoubt, fituated on the other Side, which fome few Soldiers who were there had abandoned. In this Manner the Town was thut up on all Sides.

The Muscovites at the same Time raised three Batteries, placing twelve Mostars on the one, and mounting: the two others with thirty-one Pieces of Cannon, the first with Nineteenpounders, the fecond with twelve Twelve-pounders. From these Batte-. ries they made a continual Discharge, which let the Town on Fire in several Places. The Velt-Marshal afterwards having fummoned Governor Salippenback to furrender, he demanded a four Days Truce, to send to Major General Horn at Narva; from whence he was to receive his Orders. Schippenback not obtaining this Favour, hoisted the Royal Flag, as a Signal of the exfreme Distress to which the Place was reduced, and the Necessity he had of immediate Succours.

Major Sion was presently detached with 400 Horse, and four Field pieces. to attack the Besiegers on the Side of Carelia, and make his Way into the Town. In which Attempt he at first fucceeded well enough, having beat the Enemy who encountered him, back into their Intrenchments: But at the Instant that he entered them, with a Defign of making himfelf Master of them, he was attacked by all the Forces of the Besiegers, with Colonel Koming feck, whom the King of Poland had sent to the Czar, at their Head. The Swedes now found themselves obliged to retreat, with the Loss of their Cannon, having had twenty Men killed, several wounded, and a Corporal, with seven Men, taken Prisoners. A new Battery of fix Pieces of Cannon and two Mortars, which was in Readiness some Days after, was appointed to fire on our Vessels, which lay at Anchor under the Cannon, of the Town, but they did us no Damage.

The Breach being now made, the Enemy on the 10th of October, being Sunday, caused their Troops to give us an Affault, at a Time when a Fire raged in several Quarters of the Town. The Attack was carried on with all the Vigour imaginable; notwithstanding which, the Beliegers were repulfed with wonderful Valour. So that after a Fight which lasted, without any Discontinuance, from two in the Morning till: five in the Evening, they were obliged to give us some Rest, after a very confiderable Lofs. We now thought that they would return no more to the Charge; but soon after. feeing them make Dispositions for a new Attempt, the Governor determined to beat a Parly. He obtained an honourable Capitulation, and was permitted to march out through the Breach with 40 Men, which were all he had left, Drums beating, Colours flying, and to retire with four Field-pieces to Narva, whither he transported himself by Water, with all his Men, after having sustained a Siege of more than 15 Days.

In Courland continual Skirmishes pased between our Troops and the Lithuanians. Major Sass, whom Colonel Poss had detached from Rauskenburg, surprised at some Distance from Panusk, sour Companies of Lithuanians, commanded by one Goes, a Gentleman of Courland, whom he attacked, and entirely deseated.

The Enemy having posted themselves some. Days afterwards in the Castle of Dobeln, whence they made Excursions into all the adjacent Parts, Lieutenant - Colonel Wennerstedt was ordered to dislodge them, with a considerable Detachment, with some Cannon and Mortars. He departed from Mittau on the 17th in the Evening, and the next Day presented himself before Dobeln. On his Arrival, he found the Enemy were retreated, having left some sew of their Men behind them, whom he made Prisoners.

On the other Side, the Regimentof Wasinski and Knessewitz, after having burnt the Lordships of the Sapieba in Samogitia, made an Excursion into Courland, taking their Way through Sebrunden. They invested Goldingen with 2000 Men, 600 of which made themselves Masters of the Town, and took there Lieutenant Desson, who, however, escaped from them by Means of a Sally which Captain Aderkass made from the Castle with 30 Horse. The Captain dispersed them, and forced them to retreat, after leaving several killed and wounded on the Spot. The next Day, on an Account that Colonel Patkul was approaching from Mittau, they entirely abandoned those Parts, and repassed their Frontiers. But we will enter into no farther Detail of all the Rencounters, and other Particulars which passed amongst those little Parties, since it is now Time to follow the King into Poland.

The Swedish Army decamped on the 20th of October from Przimakow. and advanced two Leagues and a half. which is a little Distance from the Town of Viflicza, formerly famous in the last Polish War, in the Time of Charles Gustavus. Two Days afterwards the King detached Count Stenbock, with 2200 Horse and Foot, to pass the Vistula, and levy Contributions in the adjacent Parts. He advanced as far as Lemberg, and taxed: the Lands in grievous Sums, especially those of the Princes Lubomirski, and: their Adherents, to force them to give the King Satisfaction, and quit Augustus's Party.

These Lords were the more alarmed, as the Count threaten'd, in Case of Refusal, to put all to Fire and Sword. These Menaces brought from them all Kind of Submissions, by which they hoped to soften his Majesty.

Mr. Stenbock neglected nothing to gain over the Nobility of the Country, using gentle Methods with some, and rigorous with others. The Methods which he took produced all the Effects which he could desire. The Nobility, on all Sides, sent back the Swedif Prisoners which they had taken in several Rencounters; the whole, including those which General Brand had made, amounting to upward of 400 Men.

The better to subsist the Army, the King made them take different Routs, keeping no more than the Drahans, and the Regiment of Foot-guards, near his Person. He made the Army march in Columns, himself marching to Pierzicz. Here Mr. Meyerfeld, who commanded the Party which had hitherto remain'd at Opatowitz, join'd us, with those other Officers and Saxon Soldiers which had been taken Prisoners at Pinschow, and which were entirely cur'd of their Wounds. King gave them Money for their Journey, and fent them all back to Saxony.

As to the other wounded Saxons. who were not yet recover'd, his Majesty had the Goodness to put them with our own wounded Men, on the Vetines commanded by Mr. Sparre; and which were yet but a few Leagues from Cracovia, because the Waters of the Vistula were very low. The Colonel, the better to sublist his Sick, and his Detachment, sent out Parties on every Side to raise Contributions; he also sold, to that Purpose, at a very moderate Price, a great Quantity of Salt, which he had taken from the Salt pits of Bochnia, belonging to the Demelns of the King of 'Poland. foon as the Water began to rife, he continu'd his Voyage for Casimir, where he plac'd both the Swedes and Saxons' in the Town, to be there kept till they, were entirely cur'd.

Augustus, who remained still in Prussia, had little Reason to be pleased with what now pass'd in his Kingdom. This King, enrag'd that the Nobility of Great. Poland appear'd so attach'd' to the King of Sweden, especially the Count Leszinski, who, after the Battle of Clissow, had openly declar'd for his. Swedish Majesty, detach'd 8000 Men to bring these Nobles back to their Duty:

These Troops liv'd at Discretion on the Lands of the Nobility, in which they committed terrible Disorders, and unheard of Violences, by that Means so incens'd them, that Count Leszinski, putting himself at the Head of some Troops, fell on several Saxon Parties, in different Places, and deseated them. On the other Side, the Starost Gembiski surprized Egidsi, a Saxon Colonel, deseated all his Party, and kill'd him with his own Hand, because he had put his Brother under Arrest.

The Cardinal, who had long difpleas'd King Augustus, felt, with several others, the Effect of his Anger. That King baving rais'd more than 60000 Crowns of Contribution on his Estate, he complain'd bitterly; but finding that did him no Service, he writ the King a very severe Letter, which was all the Revenge he could get. In the mean Time, the King of Sweden was entirely cur'd of his Hurt, so that he could walk in his Chamber, by the Affistance of his Staff. the Army decamp'd from Pierszicz, he would try to mount his Horse, but was foon obliged to difmount. Army march'd thence to Olesniga, where they rested some Time.

On the 4th of November Captain Funk was detached from the Army, with 200 Dragoons, towards Sendomir, to establish a Magazine there; and the King following with his Column, arriv'd the 21st of the same Month at Sczeka, and the next Day march'd two Leagues farther to Nawodzic.

Here General Maidel join'd his Majesty. He came from Riga thro' Lithuania, with his Regiment of Dragoons, a great Number of Recruits for the Army, and three Regiments of Horse, viz. that of the Swedish Nobility, and those of Craus and Patkul. The two last had remain'd continually in Samogitia and Lithuania, to cover the Territories of the Sapieba; but being now order'd to join the Army, the Great-general Sapieba thought himself no longer secure; and therefore that he might not live at the Mercy of O. ginski and Wisniowiski, he follow'd these Regiments with a small Body of two or three thousand Men, and arrived at the same Time with them at the King's Quarters, whom he attended ever afterwards, throwing his Fortune entirely upon his august Protector.

In the mean Time, Count Stenbeck had several Disputes with the Nobility of Russia and Volhinia. He arrested the Waivode of this latter Province, who having refus'd to pay Contributions, was afterwards oblig'd to buy his Liberty with a very large Ransom.

As the Nobility were very turbulent, the Count ask'd them, whether they intended to declare for the King of Sweden, or against him; and insisted on a categorical Answer. They were very much perplex'd with this Question, especially the Lubomirski, who were in great Fears for their Estates, which they incessantly intreated might be spar'd. They assembled at Reisna to debate on an Answer, the Result of which we shall see hereafter.

The King continuing his March, arriv'd the 4th of December at Gorciczani, Half a League from Sindomir. the Capital of the Palatinate of that Name, fituated on the Vistula, where there had been a Castle, which Charles Gustavus blew up, and of which, at this Day, there remains nothing but the Ruins. The King, after a short Stay here, gave Orders to Burán Rheinfchild, a Lieutenant general, to march, with Part of his Army, towards Warfovia, to cover the Affembly of the Nobility, which the Cardinal had conven'd there, and to be ready to affift that of Great Poland against the Saxons.

Some Days afterwards his Majesty pass'd by Sendomir, and march'd towards Zavigost, where finding himself entirely recover'd of his Fall, he threw away his Crutches, mounted his Horse, and began, as usual, to satigue himself, and visit the Quarters of his Troops, All the Army shew'd an inexpressible Joy at the Dissipation of that long Fear in which the Accident that happen'd to that illustrious Hero had held them,

Neither the bad Weather, nor the frequent Storms, attended with Hail and Snow, which fell in Abundance: nor, in a Word, the severe and sharp Winter, could hinder the King, who was but just recover'd from his Fall, from paying regular Visits every Day to the several Quarters of the Army. The Troops were now encamp'd about Zavigost, which is situated on the Vistula, and where Charles Gustavus, King of Sweden, the Grandfather of our Hero, was join'd, in 1657, by Ragotski, the Prince of Transilvania, at the Head of a numerous Army of Hungarians and Cossacks. Here we re-main'd during the Christmas, after which his Majesty pass'd the Vistula with the rest of his Army, leaving behind him only some Regiments, which afterwards pass'd the River about Casmir.

About this Time our Troops were much harrased in different Places by the Lithuanians. Mr. Stuart detached feveral Parties to give them Chace. Captain Hammelsterna, who was posted at Debela, being join'd by Cornet Anrep, encountered them near Schagern, kill'd 50, and made 161 Prisoners. Some Days afterwards, the Lithuanians having shut up, at Lamberts boff near Bauske, Lieutenant-colonel! Bruchner, who was raising Contributions, the repulsed them with great Bravery, put them to Flight, and safely join'd our Detachment from Banskenburg.

On another Side, Major Mentzer furpriz'd a great Number in a Place where they had got together a Magazine, put all whom he met with to the Sword, and carry'd off their whole Magazine of Provision. Major Meyerfelt, Brother to the Colonel of that Name, and who was in Gaerison at Seelburg, perform'd such another Exploit a few Days afterwards, having beat a Lithuanian Party from Bandomir, who, were returning to Livania with a great Booty, which he took from them, after having rowed them:

Livonia after this was quiet enough for fome Months; whilt Ingria, on the contrary, became the bloody Theatre of the most barbarous Tragedies, which were there acted by the Russians. After having burnt the Villages of Zola, Kulla, Allekulla, Onekulla, and Kleinbulla, several Mills, and the Garden of the Senate of Narvaior Rath-

-shoff; they surprized, with some thoufand Horse, on the 4th of January, a little after Midnight, the advanced Posts at Narva, and penetrated quite into the Suburbs. To bring the Inhabitants out of their Houses, they made Use of a Stratagem, crying out, in the French Tongue, Let us fave ourselves, .my Friends, the Ruffians are a coming; which Expedient had fuch Success, that these poor People having open'd their Gates, were all inhumanly massacred. without any Diffinction of Age or Sex. The few Troops which were in the Suburbs made all the Relistance they could, but were with great Violence driven back to the Counterscarp, after -a very stour Fight.

The Rustians, as soon as this Expedition was over, seeing the whole Garrison ready to attack them, retreated, with all their Dead, after having for six Hours together done a great deal of Mischief, and exercis'd all Sorts of Cruelsies.

The King continued his March the 3d of January, on the Road of Lublin towards Dzircowizza. Here his Majesty met the two Potocki; Sons of the Great-general of the Crown, who had Audience of his Majesty, and very humbly begged his Protection. His Majesty received them very graciously, and made them a very considerable Present of Money; which they so ill required, that instead of employing it, an they had promised, in raising Men so this Majesty's Service, they put it to a quite contrary Use.

At this Time Count Stenbock returned from his Expedition, with Advice that the Assembly at Wishia had at last declard for his Majesty, and had already named Deputies to demand his goons, were fent to raile it. 100 100 The Army decamp'd on the 22th, and march dito Kelanian, a Gentleman's House, near the little Town of Belziz, from thence to Walgethow, afterwards to Lublin, where the Wagifirates came out to meet the King. He march'd thro' the Town with his Army, and encamped at Jacobowiez, a Castle situated Half a League from Lublin, and which belongs to Prince Lubomir skip Here the King find his Head Quarters, and distributed the Drabans, with the Regiment of Guards, among the Villages and neighbouring -Houles.

Some Days afterwards his Majetty dispatch'd an Express, with a Letter to the Cardinal, in the following Terms:

CHARLES, &c.

Free our long Expectation, we do not fee any Remedy propos'd capable of putting an End to those Troubles, which have so unsprofitably retain'd our Armies in this Kingdom; whereas we have nothing more at Heart, than to find out Measures proper for that Purpole. For

The Cardinal, who arrived the 26% of January at Warfovia, having reas we have afready feen, against King Augustus, publifird ap Order, convening the Convocation on the stb of February: Which Order contained in Substance what follows:

That he immented the Negligence and infentibility of the Poles, who "look"d without Emotion on the Ruin of their Country, which was become a Prey to foreign Troops, and a Jest to her Neighbours. That they ap-" pear'd to have neither the Laws, nor the Justice nor the Liberty, por the Courage, nor, indeed, any of the Virtues of their Ancestors. That * nothing was to be found among them but Weakness and Dejection; they "being all dispers'd, and keeping "themselves at a Distance, as if they had no Concern in the Destruction. of the Kingdom.

'That he had repair'd to Warfovla to consult with the Pope's Muncio, and the other foreign Ministers, on * some Means to remedy such pressing Evils; but they had all affur'd him that it was impossible to find any, unless the Poles themselves would set their Hands to the Work. That therefore? for the Discharge of his Conscience, and by the Authority inherent in his Dignity, he convented fall the Senators, and those who had "been Deputies, to treat of a Peace, to Warfevia, on the 3th of February, "that they might deliberate on the belt Means of laving the Republick, and 26 appealing the Tumults with which fine was agitated, "Gc."

Very few, however, of the Grandees, repair'd to Warfovia. The Greattreasurer, Count Etienn Leszinski, and · Sapieba the Great-treasurer of Libuania, were almost the only Persons "there: So that the Cardinal was obliged to adjourn the Assembly to the 2716 of March, and thence to the 16th. of April . All al al a long

The Cause that the Convocation, came to so little was, the Senutus Convilium, which King Augustus had appointed at Thorn the 16th of March and which he removed to Marienburg, for the Conveniency of the Quarters. This King, being diffacisfy'd with the Cardinal's Conduct, tax'd him in his Turn with Partiality to the Swedes, and! accus'd him of being the Caule, by his. Obstinacy, of all the Confusion and Troubles which had rag'd in Poland. He concluded with faying, that it did. not belong to the Cardinal to call a. Congress; and that the Assembly at Warfevia was contrary to his Rights, and the direct Way to overturn the State.

Towards the End of the Month the Deputies of the Palatinate of Ruffia, in Conformity with the Decree of the Affembly at Wisnia, fearing to be fack'd, as they were threaten'd, cameto Jacobowitz, and had an Audience of the King, who took them under his Protection 3. Protection s and after a gracious Reception, fent them back with a very favourable Answer.

Hostilities continued daily between the Parties of the two Armies. In Courland, General Stuart detached Lieutenant colonel Bruchner, with some Troops, to oppose Oginshi's Party. He met with six Companies at Janisha, put 100 of their Men to the Sword, made nine Prisoners, took two Standards, twenty-four Lances or Copies, three Pair of Kettle drums, two Trumpets, and above 300 Horse, with some other Booty.

A few Days afterwards Count Adam Lowenbaupt, entering Lithuania with a Detachment, surprized, under the Favour of a thick Mist, four Companies of Lithuanians, which guarded an advanc'd Post before Janiska; he killed forty, made several Prisoners, and carry'd off a Standard, with two Pair of Kettle-drums. ... Those who escap'd having carry'd, the Alarm to Oginski, that Commander retreated hastily, without drawing far, however, from Janiska, which was in the Possession of Lowenbaupt. The Enemy, on their Side, some Days afterwards attack'd a small Party detach'd from Janiska to raise Provisions, but were repuls'd, with the Loss of two Captains, and some Soldiers kill'd, Whilft these were harrassing each other, King Augustus set all his Engines to work to gain over the Nobility and Senators assembled at Marienburg. This Assembly was very numerous; nor were King Augustus's Endeavours absolutely vain. The Crownarmy under Prince Lubomirski the Great-general, who remain'd saithful to him, notwithstanding the Desolation of his Territories, sent Deputies to assure his Polish Majesty that they were resolved to facrifice under him their Lives and Fortunes for the Maintenance of the Republick and their Religion. The whole Army then took an Oath of Fealty, according to a Formulary which King Augustus drew up, as well for the Generals of the Crown, as the Subalterns and Soldiers.

At the same Time Prince Lubomir ski publish'd with the Sound of Trumpets in the City of Leopold, at Reschow, and other Places, that the Nobility should mount their Horses within a Month's Time, in order to join the Crown-army against the Swedes, under Pain of being declar'd guilty of High Treason, Traitors to their Country, and punish'd accordingly.

This Affair was brought on the Tapis in the Diets of all the Palatinates, where they deliberated on the Choice of Deputies, which were to be fent to Marienburg. The Palatinate of Lublin did not dare to declare herself openly, on Account of the Swedilly Garrison which was in that Capital, and the near Neighbourhood of our Army. They however affembled some of the Nobility, who demanded an Audience of the King of Sweden; which Favour his Majesty willingly granted them, and promis'd them his Protection, which they desir'd.

Count Stenbock having finish'd his Levy of Contributions, follow'd his Majesty with his Troops; and passing near Zamosk, a Town included in the Number of the Fortresses of Poland, a great many of the Nobility, who were steady alarm'd with the Apprehension of an Attack by the Count; which Fear carry'd them to set Fire to the Suburbs, and to rely entirely on the: Desence of the Place, which they were resolv'd to make in the best Manner possible. But the Count pass'd by them, contenting himself with laying all the Country under Contribution, which he continu'd to do, till he at length join'd his Majesty's Army.

Fear

Some Days afterwards the King detach'd Lieutenant-Colonel Charles-Gabriel Horn, with the Regiment of Foot of Pomerania, towards Brefzifzi, to fecure that important Pass, which is situated on the Consines of Poland and Lithuania; and the same Day his Majesty, after a Stay of fix Weeks at Jacobowitz, march'd to Lewarthoff.

Mr. Robinson, the English Envoy, who came to speak with the King, met him half Way, attended by several Generals. This Minister had no sooner faluted his Majesty, but he demanded his Permission immediately to disclose: the Orders of the Queen his Mistress; to which the King confented, and remain'd uncover'd while Mr. Robinson made his Speech in the Swedish Language, which he spoke perfectly well, having been a long Time a Resident at the Court of Sweden. As the King. well knew this Minister, he gave him a very gracious Answer; nor could he keep himself from laughing at the pleasant Figure which he made, having turn'd the Fur of his Pelisse*, as well as his Cap, on the Outside, which, join'd to the great high Road where this sudden Audience was given, put the King into a very good Humour.

The Day after his Majesty's Arrival

at Lewarthoff he perceiv'd in himself some Symptoms of a Fever; but as this slight Indisposition produc'd no ill Consequence, the Army continu'd their March, and encamp'd at Czermenick, after having pass'd the little River Wieper, which empties itself into the Vistula.

The same Day the Council of Marienburg was open'd; it was in some Respects imperfect, as well thro' the Absence of the Primate, as of several other Senators, who excus'd themselves from coming on Account of the Saxon Garrison, which hinder'd the Freedom of their Debates. Augustus, however, propos'd to them seven Articles, of which the following is the Substance.

r. What was to be done for the Defence of the Kingdom and the Republick, fince there was no longer an Appearance of Peace.

to oppose the Diet which had been conven'd at Warsovia to the Prejudice of his Majesty's Rights, and to the Subversion of the State.

3. What Method they should take to punish the Adherents to, and Supporters of the Swedish Party, who stubbornly persisted in their Defigns.

4. If any Regard should be had to the Demand of some of the Palatinates, who desired the calling of a general Diet.

5. How to encourage more and more the Army of the Crown, and accommodate their Generals.

6. If Alliances should be made with the neighbouring Powers who mediated them, offering Succours of Troops

6. That in order to neglect nothing which might advance Peace, the Embally, which had been named a long! Time ago for that Purpose, should have fresh Orders to sound the King of Sageden's Dispositions, and endeavour specidily to procure Peace, without engant ging themselves, however, in any Pro-: jects which ntay cause a dismembering of the Republick, or the plunging her into a foreign War.

7. That they would debate farther on the Alliances to be made with for: reign Powers, in order to extricate the Republick out of the Perplexity in which she was entangled.

This Convention was figured by all the Affembly, except the Bishop and the Palatine of Culm, who refused it: and they afterwards dispatch'd the Commissaries of Poland to the King of Sweden, as we shall see presently,

This King, who continued to advance towards Werfouid, march?d thre? Razin to Lukew, thence to Wilniew. But scarce had he quitted Lablin, when Petockic who had made him fuch fine Promites, began his Hallities, by disturbing the Swedish Posts in the very Suburbs of that Town, where Colonel-Meyerfeld had remain'd with some Troops; and as this Colonel was efcorting the Contributions which that Town had been obliged to furnish, Par tacks, whole Courage was perhaps fomething elevated with the Hopes of carrying off that Sum, continually harrais'd this Detachment in their long Marches nowards Cazimie, but that in so weak a Manner, that, thro' the great Care and Vigilance of Mr. Meyerfeld, they arriv'd safely at Cozimir with all the Baggage, and without the Loss of a fingle Man.

At Gezimin they met the Vitines which had carry'd the Trophies and Sick upon the Vistala's Mn. Meyerfeld join'd them, and continuing his March along the River Side for their Security, they all arriv'd lafe at Warfonia, without having lost the least Thing by allthe Efforts of Potocki to trayorfe them, and give them Disturbance.

On the 131b of March the King decamp'd from Wisniow, and march'd to Zelischow, where the Army remain'd. fome Days; and afterwards to Ceploto, and thence throf the Town of Minsko to Okniow, which is 3 Leagues from Warlovia.

The Nobility of Samogitia began now to disband, and retire in whole Companies, being weary of making War with so little Success, and in which they got nothing but Blows. Oginski, who was in Despair at seeing them take a Resolution to make no farther Head against our Troops, did all he could to prevent them; but when he found that all his Efforts were in vain, and fearing that after this Defertion he should be inclos'd by the Swedes, who would not fail to make their Advantage of this Conjuncture, he thought the best Measures he could take were to procure himself an advan. tageous Retreat.

With this View he took with him his best Troops, and went directly to Birsen, which he took Possession of, tho' that Town belong'd to the House of Neuburg. He resolv'd at the same Time to draw thither a Body of 3000 Russian Foot, which had been in Winter Quarters at Drugen near the Duna, stattering himself, that with this Reinforcement he should be able to form a good Garrison, and to assure himself a Retreat, where he should be able to resist all our Efforts.

As this Neighbourhood must have given great Disturbance to our Troops in Courland, Baron Stuart, their Governor-General, being desi ous to prevent the Russians who were on their March towards Birsen, took a Resolution to send thither a large Detachment, which were to make themselves Masters of that Town before their Arrival. To this Purpose, Count Alam Lowenhaupt, a Colonel, who was posted in Samogitia, ten Leagues only from Birsen, receiv'd Orders to march thither with all Expedition; and in Case he should find the Russians already enter'd, to endeavour to bring them to a general Engagement. Colonel Clost was sent at the same Time to reinforce him; he was to join him without Delay with some Artillery and 400 Foot, which Count Frolich had drawn out of the Garrisons of Riga and Mittau.

Colonel Lowenbaupt, with 900 Foot and Horse of his Detachment, having join'd Mr. Gloot at Janiska, turn'd towards Birsen, and was attended the whole Way by fourteen Companies of Lithuanians, who only harrass'd him from Time to Time, without ever daring to come to a formal Attack. But nothing retarded so much the Count's March, as the horrible Desiles, and almost impassable Roads thro' which he was oblig'd to pass, which gave the Russans Time to get into Birsen, when our Troops were about four Leagues off.

Mr. Stuart having receiv'd Advice, and knowing likewise somewhat of himself, that these were some of the Czar's best Troops, being old Strelizes, which were very sull of Bravery, and who had serv'd in the last War against the Turks, sent the Count Orders to return the same Way he came; the rather, as several of our Men were sick, thro' the Fatigue of their tiresome March.

The Enemy looking on this Retreat as a Flight, march'd out of Birsen to the Number of 6000 and odd Hundred Men, both Russians and Lithuanians, with some Artillery, to cut off the Count's Passage, whom they encounter'd near Salat. They presently posses'd themselves of all Sides of the Wood thro' which he was to pass, and shew'd themselves only in Platoons, to make make him quit his Advantage, and draw him to an Engagement. Lowenhaupt observing their Design, prefently recall'd all his detach'd Parties. and that Night lodg'd himself with his Men in the best Manner he could in the little Village of Salat, and held himself ready against all Events. The Enemy, tho' much his Superior in Strength, made no Motion, but contented themselves with kindling large Fires, to preserve themselves from the Cold, which was then very piercing. The next Day the Poles appear'd in greater Numbers. The Count, on his Side, drew up his Men, and, after he had caus'd Prayers to be faid, he exhorted them to conquer, or die. He then march'd boldly up to the Enemy, and, under the Favour of a very thick, Mist, made himself Master of a Defile which the Ruffians had neglected to possels themselves of. These, believing they might easily repair the Fault which they had committed, pass'd a fmall River, and rang'd themselves in Battalia on the other Side, where they flood expecting us. The Count, who had with him about 1000 Men only in a Condition of fighting, pass'd the River likewife, and drew up in one Line, mixing his Foot with his Horse. The Baggage was plac'd in the Rear. and form'd the f-tond Line. The Rushans under the Command of the two Colonels Nizeschof and Protopon, had the Precaution to barricade themfelves with their Waggons, which they guarded on the Outlide with Chevaux de frise, and within by their Artillery. The Poles were on the two Wings. commanded by the Regimentary Gordon and two Gentlemen, whose Names were Karper.

Count Lowenbaupt, being advanc'd within Cannon shot, gave Orders to attack the Russians in their Intrenchments. At the same Instant the Poles began to charge our Left Wing under Colonel Clost, who received them for brifkly, and gave them so many home Charges, that they were oblig'd to retreat in Confusion. Whilst our Lest Wing, under the Command of Count Lowenbaupt, continu'd advancing, 6 or 700 Poles, who were in the Dress of German Dragoons, and who attempted to take us on our Flank, were likewise repuls'd with Loss by our Cannons and Granades.

Lieutenant-Colonel Baneer, having had two Horses kill'd under him, put himself at the Head of the Infantry with Major Wrangel, who was kill'd foon afterwards, and march'd Sword in Hand towards the Ruffians, who were intrench'd up to their Teeth behind their Waggons. As there were a great Number of them, they made a terrible Fire, but without Effect, most of their Shots slying over the Swedes, who were now ascending a Hill, at the Top of which the Enemy was barricaded. Our Fire, on the contrary, did great Execution, very few Shots miscarrying; and our Foot, having at last broke thro' and forc'd their Intrenchments, began to make a dreadful Execution, in Spite of all the vigorous Relistance of the Russians, who, feeing themselves press'd and lost, Tought with the But ends of their Muskets, Halberds, and Pikes, and at last threw themselves under the Waggons, where they made a most desperate Defence.

The long Pikes of our Foot were now to extremely useful, that the Raf-

fians, feeing themselves unable to make any longer Resistance, took to their Heels in the Rear of their Intrenchments, and sled in great Consusion thro' the Village of Ziaggerini, which is situated some Miles off towards Birses. Great Numbers of them were kill'd in their Flight; and it is certain, that not one would have escap'd if the Count had bad more Horse, the whole Complement which he had with him amounting cally to 300 Men.

As to the Poles, they made not the keaft Motion during the whole Action. contenting themselves with very quietly looking on; but as the Count did not know what might be their Intention, he call'd back those who had pursu'd the Enemy, and presently drew up all his Men in Order, that he might be ready in Case they should think proper to attack him a fecond Time. But as they thought of nothing less than so rath an Enterprize, after they had obferv'd our Disposition, and gather'd together those Ruffians who had bad the good Fortune not to fall into our Hands, they ran away full Speed, and by that Means about Noon put an End to a very obstinate and bloody Battle.

The Count new order'd a double Discharge of 16 Pieces of Cannon, as a Signal of his Victory, and then commanded his Men to conduct all the Wounded to Ziaggerini, together with all the Cannon and the Trophies, which conflited of 12 brass Culvering and Field-pieces, 1058 small Banners of Taffery or Damask, embroider'd with Gold, Silver, and Silk, and 33 Drums, without reckoning the rest of the Booty, which was considerable.

Six Hundred Muscovites were flain on the Spot, besides those kill'd in the Flight; fo that of all this Body, 1200 Ruffians only return'd to Birfen, having lost in this Rencounter a Colonel, a Lieutenant-colonel, and several other Officers. Of all the Pissoners we spared only 8. On our Side, 2 Majors, and 40 Men, were kill'd, and about 100 Officers and Soldiers wounded.

The Night after the Battle the Count remain'd in the Village, and gather'd together his Dead and Wounded; the next Day he decamp'd on his Return thro' Baulk to Mittat.

This Victory, gain'd over an Enemy fix Times our Superior, and intrench'd, was much applauded, and pleas'd his Majesty so greatly, that he sent Count Lowenbaupt a Commission of Major-General, and a little While afterwards that of Vice-Governor of Courland, in the Absence of Mr. Stuart, who was gone to drink the Waters in Germany,

The King was now at Okniow; but being defirous to fpeak with the Cardinal, he fet out with a few Attendants for Warfovia, and had an Interview with that Prelate at Villanova, where the Conference lasted three Hours, namely, from Four in the Afternoon till Seven.

Immediately after this Interview, General Rheinschild was order'd to march with his Army towards Rava and Lenziei. We have already remark'd, that this General, when be quitted the King at Sendomir, had set out to cover the Affembly of the Nobility, conven'd at Warfovia. He had pass'd thro' Janowitz by Redom, and came to Blonia the 91b of January, where he had canton'd his Army in the adjacent Houses and Villages. The 1616 of the same Month he detach'd Lieutenant-Colonel Resbleib with 200 Horfe P 2

Horse towards Zukazow, who defeated a Party of Poles and Saxons in a little Town call'd Clodowa, and took 2 Captain and two Lieutenants, with 22 Pancernes.

Rheinschild having receiv'd Orders to march towards Rava, decamp'd from Blonia, and arriving at Rava the 24th of March, he quarter'd his Troops in the Neighbourhood of that Town; and judging that it would be convenient to prepare a Magazine at Wladislaw, situated on the Vistula, and on the Road to Thorn, he detach'd Major Laurence Creutz with 270 Horle, to possess himself of that Place, and presently to get together whatever might be necessary for the Subsistence of the Troops, in Case his Majesty should take that Road; and as he apprehended a Surprize from the Enemy, Colonel Lillieback was order'd some Days afterwards to reinforce him with his Regiment of Foot.

As foon as the Floats were arriv'd at Warfovia, the King went to Prague to see them, and caus'd a Bridge to be thrown over the Vistula, at the same Place where he had pass'd before, which was perfected in a few Days. His Majesty was now again attack'd with some severish Symptoms, which did not however prevent him from continuing his Exercises, which, join'd to his excellent Habit of Body, contributed much to the entire Re-establishment of his Health.

The King, having decamp'd from Okniow on the 7th of April with the Court and Drabans, took up the same Quarters at Prague which he had been in the preceding Year, and gave some Days afterwards a publick Audience to the Imperial, French, English, and Dutch Ministers.

The Army having follow'd his Majesty, all the Regiments were distributed near the Town, and in the Suburbs of Warsovia, the better to guard against the Insul's of Potocki, whose Parties continually scour'd the Country, and had lately carry'd off some of the Horse belonging to the Regiment of Smoland, and some Foot from another Regiment: They were desirous of doing the same by the Regiment of Horse Guards, whom they closely attended in their March, but had not the Courage to attack them.

Lieutenant - Colonel Charles Horn was order'd at the same Time to return to Breszizi with the Regiment of Pomeranian Foot, that the Army might not be too much scatter'd, since we had entirely chang'd the Plan of Operations for the Campaign. We had, however, so well succeeded in all our Marches, that the River Bug only separated our Army from that of Saxony, the latter being encamp'd near Pultowck along that River, while ours was posted between that and the Vistula.

The King, burning with Impatience to come to Blows with the Enemy, thought on all imaginable Methods to oblige them to defend themselves, and stand their Ground: To this Purpose, commanding Prince Wurtemburg and some others to sollow him, he repair'd to the Bug, from whence he could reconnoitre the Saxon Camp, the Sight of which extremely animated him; but whilst he was riding backwards and forwards, the better to remark their Situation, and the Ground thereabouts; he perceiv'd at a Distance a Saxon Corporal poral with fome Dragoons, who had pass'd the River in Quest of some Provisions in a neighbouring Village. The King prefently purfued them, but could take no more than two; the Corporal, with the rest, having had Time to recover their Boat, and fave themselves. His Majesty, on his Return to Warlovia, being firmly refolved to attack the Enemy, set his Men to Work about a Bridge which was to be thrown over the Bug, and at the fame Time gave private Orders to get together all the Boats which they could find, small and great, to place them on Waggons, and, when every Thing was ready, to carry them to Nowodwor, a Village where the Bug discharges itself into the Vistula, and where Charles Gustavus, King of Sweden, had formerly pass'd that River, and defeated his Enemies.

Whilst these Preparations were carrying on, his Majesty made a Promotion of General Officers. Lieutenant-General Rheinschild was made General of Horse; Lieutenant-General Liewen General of Foot; and the Major-Generals Meidel, Stuart, and Stromberg, were made Lieutenant Generals. Some Days afterwards Count Morstein, who had been deputed by the Assembly at Sendomir in the Quality of first Ambassador to his Majesty from the Republick, arriv'd at Marienburg with two other of our Commissaries, namely, Zudowsky, Ensign of Cracovia, and Stephen Count of Leznic Lescinsky, according to the 6th Article of the Refult of the Council which they had held. They demanded an Audience of his Majesty, which was granted them; but as their Propositions were by no Means agreeable to that Satisfaction and Security which he required. they receiv'd the next Day a very short Answer, by which they were given to understand, that his Majesty apprehended that the Orders or Members of the Republick would have immediately enter'd on fuch Measures as might have produc'd a firm Peace, and that his Majesty might, in Consequence thereof, have regulated his Proceedings, and taken fuch Steps as he should have thought proper. As to the rest, they were referr'd to a Declaration made in the King's Name by Count Piper, to the Cardinal Primate, of the same Date with the Day of their Audience, and which laid down the Deposition of King Augustus as a Preliminary Article.

This Embassy having incens'd, instead of appeas'd his Majesty, he now resolv'd to push his Enemy to the utmost. As soon as the necessary Preparations were made for the Expedition in Question, the King departed from Prague on the 18th of April at Four in the Morning, without speaking to the Cardinal, to whom Count Piper afterwards sent a Letter, when the Battle of Pultowck was gloriously determin'd.

The King took with him all the Horse and Foot, except the Regiment of Upland, which remain'd at Prague, to cover the Court, the Chancery, and the Artillery. The Colonels Axel, Sparr, and Clerk, were likewise order'd to stay at Warsovia, to take Care of the Sick, and have an Eye on the Conduct of the Poles. The Vitines began in the Night to fall down the Vistula under the Command of Colonel Rank; and the Waggons, which carry'd the Boats for the Bridge, took the same Road with his Majeffy, and with the Horse, being all arriv'd at Nowodwor, which is four Leagues from Warsovia, they began in the Evening to work upon the Bridge, under the Direction of Count Stenbock.

The 19th the Saxons having appear'd in the Morning on the other Side opposite to the Bridge, where they threw up some Breast-works with a Shew of intrenching themselves, his Majesty caus'd 16 Pieces of Cannon to be brought down to the Banks of the Bug, which play'd fo well on the other Side, that the Enemy were oblig'd to abandon their Works, which were just This determin'd the King immediately to pass over 1500 Men to take Possession of them. Lieutenant-Colonel Poss pass'd the River in Front with 500 of the Foot-Guards on Boats which they had ty'd together, and on the Floats. Poss was supported by Count Jasper Sperling, a Lieutenant-Colonel, at the Head of 1000 Men of the fame Regiment, who all landed fafely, without any Opposition from the Sanons, who, tho' they were all Horse and Dragoons, had no Dispofition to engage, and retreated out of Musket-shot to at least 150 Paces Distance.

The King, who plainly saw by this that the Enemy were afraid to try the Fortune of a Battle, pass'd hastily over the River, follow'd by the Princes of Wurtemberg and Saxe-Gotha, several Generals and Officers; but as the Boats could not be push'd fast enough to the Shore, his Majesty threw himself into the Water some Distance from the Bank, and led his Troops after him, who were all up to their Middle.

This bold Action so insimidated the Sanons, that they ray away sull Speed, without a single Discharge, nor were we able to overtake one of them, except a sew Poles, for want of Horse. The King, however, pursu'd them Half a League Home to the Village Ponikowa, where he lest the Detachment, which posted itself there, and return'd the same Evening on Foot to Nowodwor, with the Princes and other Officers.

The next Day the King pass'd the Bridge, in order to find out the Enemy. His Majesty was attended by the Princes, Generals, Officers, and Voluntiers, and follow'd by his Drabans, his Regiment of Horse Guards, with the Regiments of Horse of Smoland and Scania, and 200 of Colonel Buchwald's Dragoons. He knew the chief Forces of the Enemy were posted at Puliowsk, under the Command of Velde-Marshal Sceinau.

He took the Road of Ponikowa. where our Detachment ead pass'd the Night. Before this Village runs a listle River, not wide, but deep, over which was a Bridge, which the Sastons had broke down in their Retreat. The King, who faw their advane'd Guards on the other Side, was so animated. that he resolv'd to pus it instantly, whatever Price it cost him. lander, who offer'd to found the Depth, had all the Difficulty in the World to get over to the other Side: where, as fome Saxons were approaching to lay hold of him, the King order'd some of his Men to make ready to fire on them, which check'd them, and gave our People Time to fetch him back in a small Boat which they had at last found in a little Village. His Majesty order'd 30 Ducats in Gold to be immediately paid down to the Polander on his Return.

The King, seeing the Impossibility of passing at this Place, went Half a League farther to find out another near a Mill; where, having sounded the Ground himself, he sound it firm, and threw himself the first into the Water; whose Example was presently sollow'd by all his Men, only one of whom was drown'd, notwithstanding the Rapidity of the Current, and that a great Number of our Caralry were oblig'd to swim over their Horses.

His Majesty then march'd thro' a neighbouring Wood, without the Enemy's having the least Suspicion. We took some Valoches, with a Kettle-Drummer, Prisoners, who were far from believing us so near. At last, after a Moment's Halt, we arriv'd at a little Village, where a Sakon Officer was posted with some Dragoons, who were all taken, except a very few that escap'd, and carry'd the first News to Mr. Steingu of the Approach of a large Body of Squades. The King. who follow'd on a full Trot at their Heels, arriv'd at Pultowsk before Break of Day, without having stopp'd a fingle Moment during the whole Night, after having surprized several advanc'd Guards who were posted on that Road.

Steinau, at the first News of our Approach, came forth at the Beginning of the Night to reconneitre us; but he thought us not so strong as we were; nor did he imagine that we intended to attack him, much less had he the least Suspicion that the King was there in Person. However, at his Return he drew out his Squadrons in Battalia on a Hill before the Town, and gave Orders, out of Precaution, that all those who were posted in different Places should mount their Horses, and come immediately to his Assistance; which they did, but it was now too late.

The King being arriv'd in Sight of the Enemy, found them busy in making the proper Dispositions to receive us. His Majesty presently examin'd the Ground, and the Desile which led to the Town, as much as the Darkness would permit him, and afterwards rang'd his Horse in several Lines.

Steinau, whom the Break of Day now undeceiv'd, furpriz'd at the Number of our Horse, which were superior to his own, thought of taking the necessary Measures for a Retreat. With this View, he gave his Men Orders to return to the Town, which is furrounded with Water, intending to defend himself by pulling up the Draw-Bridges on all Sides; but the King, who prefently suspected his Intention, detach'd the Dragoons to cut off his Passage, who attack'd him so briskly, that Colonel Buchwald was with his Squadron on the Bridge at the lame Instant as the last Saxons were pressing Buchwald made himself imto pais. mediately Master of the Gates of the Town, after a very flight Resistance.

The Saxons now fled full Speed thro' the Town, piffing near the Castle to fave themselves over the Bridge on the River Narewa; but they were so smartly pursu'd by the Dragoons, that falling over one another, those who were once pass'd broke down the Bridge, and abandon'd such as remain'd in the Town to the Mercy of the Conqueror. These now made no longer Resistance, and throwing down their Arms, begg'd humbly for Quarter, which was presently granted them by his Majesty himself, who was now come up with the Drabans and the other Regiments. We afterwards resisted the Bridge, and Colonel Buchwald pursu'd the Enemy Half a League farther, but was not able to overtake them.

The King having pass'd himself with a small Number, attack'd Lieutenant-General Beust, who seeing no Possibility of escaping, had hid himfelf, with some Dragoons, in a Water-Mill. His Majesty took him Prisoner himself, and without making himself known to him, left him his Sword on his Parole; and hearing a new Fire on that Side where we had enter'd, he hasten'd up to us, where he found a Party of our Horse, which had stood to observe the Enemy, engag'd with a Saxon Regiment which was just come from their Quarters, and knew nothing of what had pass'd. Our Horse receiv'd them so gallantly, that after having lost many of their Men both kill'd and wounded, they were utterly broken, and put to Flight in great Disorder.

As to Mr. Steinau, he had the good Luck to fave himself over a little Bridge, and thence thro' a Convent of Fesuits; but all his Baggage, with that of his Officers, a great Number of Horses, two Pair of Kettle Drums, and five Standards, were taken by the Swedes.

Amongst the Prisoners, were the Count de St. Paul, 3 Majors, several other Officers, and between 6 and 700

Men, who were all conducted under a Guard to the Castle. Several Officers were kill'd on the Spot; but the Place where the Enemy suffer'd the greatest Loss was in their Passage over the last Bridge, where, rushing one upon another, more than 1000 of them were drown'd. It is almost incredible, tho' it be a certain and well-known Truth, that we had but eleven Men, in all, either kill'd or wounded.

In the Evening Mr. Beuft being conducted to pay his Respects to the King, was very much surprized to see the august Person who had taken him Prisoner. He had the Honour to sup with his Majesty, who ever afterwards gave him many Instances of his Goodness.

The next Morning, early, the King commanded Colonel Wrangel with the Drabans, 100 of Buchwald's Dragoons, and four Troops of the Horse-Guards, to go and look after the Enemy. His Majesty, attended by the Princes, and several Officers and Troopers, soon after follow'd this Detachment, after having given his Orders, and lest the rest of the Horse at Pultowsk under the Command of Major-General Ridder-bielm, they march'd all that Day without hearing any other News of the Enemy, than that they had abandon'd all the Places where we came.

We continu'd our March on the 23d, and his Majesty about Noon being inform'd that the Enemy was at Ostrolenka, presently took that Road. After having march'd all Day, we arriv'd in the Evening at a Village one League distant from that Town, where the King himself made an Officer, and some Saxons, Prisoners, who inform'd inform'd his Majesty that 3000 Sanons were advantagiously intrench'd at O-linka with the Lithuanian Army.

As it was dangerous for so small a Number to give an Enemy Battle, who was so much their Superior, and reduc'd to defend themselves in Despair, and besides that the Person of his Majesty would run too much Risque, where the Loss appear'd inevitable; the Princes, the Counts Wrangel and Stenbock, and all the other Persons of Distinction, join'd in their Intreaties to dissuade his Majesty, who, at last, on their lively Instances, resolv'd, tho' with some Regret, to return back again.

We retreated two Leagues that Evening, to a Village which is five Leagues from Pultowsk, and where his Majesty caus'd the Detachment, which had great Need of Repose, to halt. We plac'd, however, very strong Guards on all Sides, to prevent a Surprize from the Enemy, who thought of nothing less than attacking us. The next Day, at 9 in the Morning, after Prayers, his Majesty continu'd his March, and arriv'd in the Evening at Pultowsk.

The Cardinal rook this Opportunity to answer Count Piper's Letter, in which he had acquainted him of the King of Sweden's Departure. This Answer was very moving, and is a lively Picture of the Extremity to which the Affairs of Poland were at this Time reduc'd. It was written in the following Words:

Flatter'd myself with the Return of his Majesty from his glorious Expedition, till the Moment that I receiv'd the Honour of that Letter, which your Excellency writ me when you fet out to join him. So fudden a Farewel could not be otherwife than very afflicting to me, as it depriv'd me of the Pleasure of embracing you in a closer Manner, and at the same Time threw me into a very great Anxiety on the present Posture of our Affairs, which seem to be entirely abandon'd to the Mercy of Fortune. I have waited patiently five Months at Warsovia, in order to obtain a more agreeable Separation, and which might yield a greater Consolation to the two Kingdoms: Nor will I yet despair of the Piety of a Prince, who, conforming his Actions to the Will of God, will not disdain to hearken to the Voice of one, who neither ought to have, nor can have any other View than the Glory and the Interest of his People. The Angels were the first that proclaim'd Peace at the Birth of our Saviour. The first Word which he spake to his Apostles after his glorious Resurrection was Peace; it is this we are order'd to preach; a Circumstance which must excuse me before his Majesty, if I always talk ' m'im in that Language. I doubt not but your Excellency will affift me with your Authority, and support that little Credit which I have always endeavour'd to merit of his Majesty; and that your Excellency will on your Part give me Reason in all Places in a real, not a ceremonial Manner, to express with how much

Some Days afterwards the Assembly came to an End, and the King of Sweden appear'd as little satisfy'd as the Enemy, who had so loudly cry'd out against the Cardinal on the Account of their meeting. His Maiesty, particularly, express'd great Impatience on their continual Delays touching the Proposition which had been made them of dethroning King Augustus. In a Letter dated the 5th of May, in which the Cardinal anfwer'd the King of Sweden's Declaration, he avoided even the Mention of this Article: which Silence determin'd his Majesty to have the Cardinal write ten to on this Subject a few Days before his Arrival at Thorn. Count Piper therefore writ to him in Substance as follows: 'That the Republick would do well to declare themselves as soon s as possible by, his Eminence, and pofitively to represent what Satisfaction " she intended to give his Majesty; to ' procure from him a firm and solid · Peace. That as his Majesty was always inclin'd to a ftrict Friendship with the Republick, sq he would take Measures to prevent any future . As the King never lost Sight of the great Object which he had constantly propos'd for the Determination of the War, he apply'd himself, immediately on his Return to Pultousse, to put the Army in a Condition of undertaking the Siege of Thorn, where the best Foot of the Enemy were shut up, and to penetrate afterwards into the Heart of their Estates. His Majesty had the Goodness the Day after his Return, after having made Mr. Beust dine with him, to take that General alone with him into his Chamber, where he convers'd with him feveral Hours in the most gracious Manner in the World.

The Day following a Polish Count arrived on the Part of the Commissaries of the Republick, with Letters for Count Piper, whom he expected to find at Pullowsk; this Count was very well entertained at Court.

The King having permitted Counce See Paule who was a Goldnel, and another Captain of Dragoons, to go on their Parole to Warfouis to be cur'd of their Wounds, gave Orders to Mr. Greutz, Major of the Horse-Guards, to escort all the rest of the Prisoners with 500 Horse, and a Squadron of Dragoons, and sent them on before; but his Majesty kept Lieutenant-General Beast near his own Person, and would have him always eat at his own Table.

The same Day, in the Afternoon, the King: decamp'd from Pullowsk, and match'd to Szirotozin. All the Regiments that had remain'd on the Bug, as well as that of Upland, being Foot, which was at Prague, had already receiv'd Orders to join his Majesty's Detachment. All these Troops were immediately put in full March. As to the Floats and Vitines, which were under the Command of Ranck and Clerck, they fell down the Vistula, keeping themselves always opposite to our Army in their Match.

The 29th his Majesty proceeded thro' Novamiasto towards a Place where General Welling waited for him with a Party of Foot. They repair'd thro' Phasko to Razimino, where they halted the next Day, on which Count Piper join'd the King. The Army march'd hence to a little Town call'd Bodzenow, being two Leagues distant, where we waited some Days for the entire Conjunction of all the Regiments.

Whilst the King was every Day thus gathering fresh Laurels in Poland, our poor Frontiers of Livenia lay exposed to the Plunder and Barbarity of the Rushans, who, as foon as they had open'd themselves a free Passage by the taking of Noteburg, exercis'd the most horrible Cruelties. They likewise laid Siege to the little Fort of Nyenfcbantz, a very bad Fortification, and very weakly maintain'd; which, nevertheless, defended itself so well, that they could not carry it but after a long Siege, and three subsequent Assaults. They allow'd the Governor, upon beating a Parley, very honourable Conditions; which the Enemy, however, did not think proper to keep, but made all the Garrison Prisoners of War.

Some Days afterwards they laid Siege to Jama, an old Castle two Leagues from Narva. They began to bombard it the 12th of May, and took it the 14th by Composition, the Governor retiring with his Arms and Baggage to Narva.

In this Manner the Czar made himself Master of all this desolate Country, whence he was afterwards able to make continual Irruptions into Livonia.

The King's Army having decamp'd from Bodzenow, pals'd by Ploczko towards Tiburs on the Road to Thorn. As 7000 of the best Foot of King the Command of General Robel and Major-General Canitz, the same who had commanded the Year before in the Fost of Dunamund, we hasten'd our March to shut them up, and prevent them from any Possibility of escaping.

We came then to Camin, near the Town Drobozin, where some Gentlemen being got together, sell on our Baggage, but without Success; for instead of the Booty which they were in Hopes of carrying off, they got nothing but Blows; and, for a Punishment of their Bravado, they had the Vexation to see all those Houses and Villages, where they retired, set on Fire.

The Army continu'd its March towards Salmetz, and the next Day came to Bobrownika, five Leagues from Thorn, where Count Stenbock was detach'd a few Days afterwards with some Horse and Foot to post himself a League from the Town on the River of Dribentz, and there to build a Bridge.

The Saxons had no sooner receiv'd Information of the King's Approach, than they gather'd up all the Peasants of the Country, whom they employ'd together with the Garrison, which was very numerous, to repair the old Fortifications, and add new ones. The Day following his Majesty coming with the Army to Slotoriza on the Dribentz, found the Bridge almost finish'd, as it was effectually a few Hours afterwards.

In the mean Time the advanced Guards of the Enemy were retreated under the Cannon of the Town. The Governor caus'd all the Houses of the tifications, to be burnt; nor did he even spare the Church itself.

The King seeing this Fire afar off, without waiting till the Bridge was finish'd, pass'd the River at a Ford with his ordinary Retinue and some Dragoons, and approaching within a Quarter of a League of the Town, he attack'd an advanc'd Guard, and forc'd them to a hasty Retreat. The same Night 500 Horse were order'd to post themselves where the King had advanc'd the Evening before. They were reinforc'd the next Day by another Detachment; so that the Enemy being oblig'd to quit all their Avenues, and shut themselves up within the Walls, his Majesty pass'd all his Foot over the Dribentz, and brought them to an Encampment almost under the Cannon of the Town.

His Majesty rode round the Town to reconnoitre it, and advanc'd up to the Glacis of the Counterscarp. To keep the Town block'd up, we posted a Guard on the Visula on the Side of Sr. James's Gate, amongst the Ruins of those Houses which had been burnt, under the Command of a Major. We likewise plac'd another Guard on the other Side of the Town opposite to the Gate of Culm, in a Garden near the Church which they had burnt, under the Command of a Colonel.

Several other Guards, of less Confequence, were distributed in several other Places, so near to each other, that they could foon join for their mutual Support. They were reliev'd every Day by the two first; so that on the Side of the Vistula and the Palatinate of Culm nothing could either enter or go out of the Town.

To hinder likewise all Communication on the Side of the City Dantzick, all Avenues to the Town on that Quarter were posses'd by the Horse, reinforc'd by a Regiment of Foot. In the Monastery of the Village of Putgurse, opposite to the Town, his Majesty plac'd Albedbyl's Dragoons. under the Command of Major Trantfetter. As to the Floats, the Vitines, and the other Boats which were on the Vistula, they were plac'd near the Quarters where the Horse were posted on the Road to Dantzick, and were cover'd by the two Regiments of Foot of Smoland and Calmar. The Saxons. who were taken Prisoners at Pulsowsk. were conducted into an Mand of the Vistula under a strong Guard of Foot.

The Town being thus block'd up, the King repair'd with the Princes of Saxe and Wurtemberg to the Colonel's Quarters, who was posted before the Gate of Culm, and beheld over a Garden-Wall the Manner in which the Saxons carry'd on their new Ravelin. General Lieuven being now come up, and standing by the Side of his Majesty * a little too openly, a Saxon Gunner perceiving him, pointed his Cannon that Way, and took off ^{*} Liewen had impolitickly distinguish'd himself by the Richness of his Dress, which the King perceiving, and imagining he might on that Account be pick'd out by the Enemy, he order'd him to stand behind himself; and Liewen, who was assaid of endangering his Majesty, hesitated on obeying him. The King then took him by the Arm, and pull'd the General behind him, at which Instant he receiv'd the mortal Wound from a Cannon which was fir'd on his Flank. This Accident, says Voltaire, consirm'd the King in his Opinion of an absolute Predestination, and that his Destiny had so singularly preserv'd him for the Execution of very great Actions.

one of his Legs, of which Wound he dy'd the same Evening, much lamented, on Account of his Bravery and Experience in the Art of War.

The fame Day twenty Soldiers, with a Captain, having been detach'd towards Slotoriza on the Dribentz. to bring up the Timber which was to be employ'd in building a Bridge over the Vistula, were attack'd by fixteen Lithuanian Companies, against whom they defended themselves with so much Bravery, that; after a continual Fire, they had the Happiness to gain the Bridge, and repulse the Enemy, with the Loss of a great many, both kill'd and wounded. This Action so extremely pleas'd the King, that he rewarded the Officer very liberally, and gave ten golden Ducats to every These 16 Companies had Soldier. been lately detach'd from the Town of Pultowsk, where the Lithuanian Army was posted after the Departure of the King of Sweden, in order to procure Intelligence.

Some Days after this Skirmish, 16 other Companies having pass'd the Vistula partly on Prames, and partly by swimming, near Bobrownika, to have an Eye on General Rheinschild's Army, which was collecting a Magazine at Wladislaw, as we have said above, and where Colonel Liellieboek was in Garrison with his Regiment, they took it in their Heads to attack them, which Design they executed at Day-break, under the Favour of a thick Mist with all imaginable Fury, and at first kill'd some Soldiers whom they met in the Streets; but the rest of the Garrison presently getting together, foon repuls'd them out of the Town with Loss, without giving them Time to set Fire to a single House, much less to the Magazine, as they had propos'd. At last, to compleat their Missortune, as they were reposing themselves in a neighbouring Wood, one Vitting, a Captain of Horse, who had been sent out to levy Contributions, by Accident surpriz'd them on his Return, and entirely deseated them: He kill'd above a Hundred of their Men, and took from them almost as many Horses, and all the Booty as they had plunder'd in so many different Places.

As to General Rheinschild, who commanded this Army, he went from Rava on the 4th of April, where we left him, and having pass'd thro' the Towns of Gezew, Glowno, and Piontek, he came on the 7th to Lencici, where he stay'd till the 14th of May, when he took the Road of Zoravice. The 151b he pass'd thro' the Town of Britzia, whence he departed for Mievice, and march'd on the 16th to Radzieuf, whence he came to pay his Respects to his Majesty before the Town of Thorn; he afterwards rejoin'd his Troops, with whom, on the 251b, he took the Road of Konari, as we shall see hereafter.

King Augustus, who had stay'd all this Time at Elbing, now set out for Warsovia, making his Tour thro' the Bishoprick of Worms, with Design of being at the Diet which he had conven'd at Lublin. He lodg'd in the Suburbs of Prague, in the same House which his formidable Enemy had quitted, not being willing to venture within the Town itself.

But the better to decry the Swedes as a Nation which trampled all Laws under their Feet, he complain'd to the foreign Ministers, and in all their Courts, on the Subject of the Battle of Pultowsk, which he would have look'd upon to have been a Breach of a Suspension of Arms, which he suppos'd to have been concluded between This Affair made 10 the two Armies. much Noise, that as the Cardinal had writ to Sapieha, the Great Treasurer of Lithuania, the King was so enraged, that he ordered Count Piper to write to the Cardinal, which he did on the 15th of May in pretty sharp Terms. This Letter from Count Piper entirely undeceiv'd the Cardinal, giving him very plainly to understand the Falsity of the above-mention'd Imputation.

While all this pass'd, the Saxons compleated a new Ravelin at Thorn, on which they had work'd with fo much Diligence, without any Interruption from the King. For as he had resolv'd to keep this Town closely block'd up, he was well persuaded that fuch laborious Work, join'd to the Want of Provisions for so strong a Garrison, and the Distempers which rag'd among them, would not fail to reduce them in a little Time, without any Necessity of using Force, or expoling the Troops. We therefore sufter'd them to carry on their Works, and they had all the Liberty they could defire to strengthen them with as many Gabions and Guns as they pleas'd.

They fir'd inceffantly on all our Quarters, especially those of the King and his Drabans near the Village of Mockre; those of the Town discharged their Artillery at the same Time. They did us not, however, any great Mischief; and, except some Horses which they kill'd, with an old Suttler, who had his Head carry'd off, and a Scullion, who was divided in two by a Cannon-ball, none of our Men were much hurt. The King would never permit the least Breast-work to be raifed before his Tent for the Security of his Person.

The Day following the Bridge was finish'd, which the King had caus'd to be built over the Vistula, out of Cannon-shot from the Town; to open a free Communication with the Troops encamp'd on the opposite Side.

At the same Time the Major-Generals Ridderhielm and Nieroth were detached with their Regiments of Horse, in order to penetrate farther up into the Country, as well to surnish us with necessary Forage, as to escort the Provisions which should be brought to the Camp, and, above all, to have an Eye on the Lithuanian Army, which pretended that they would march towards Tharn, and attack us.

Some Time afterwards the Regiment of Horse-Guards, with Colonel Axel Sparr at the Head of some Hundred Foot, were order'd to join the Major-Generals, which they did without Delay, and posted themselves all together in the little Town of Strasburg on the Dribentz, whence they laid all the Neighbourhood under Contribution; and in order to have always a free Communication with the Army, they put a Garrison into Gollup, which is on the Dribentz half way, or thereabouts.

At length, as the Time approach'd for the opening of the general Diet, conven'd at Lublin on the 9th of June, King Augustus came thither from Warsovia, where he had remain'd some Weeks. He arriv'd on the 7th, and was follow'd by the English and Dutch Ministers, who presented him with their Credentials on the Road, without being able, however, to give him the least Hope of any Accommodation.

The Diet being affembled on the oeb, while the Russan Pospolite met. lskewisei some Leagues from therice; the first Thing, they did was to elect a Marshal of the Chamber of the Provincial Deputies; and the Choice fell on Prince Wishiowiski the Younger, a Lithusnien, and confequently of King

The King then propos'd to them 16 Articles, which all with don this Question. Whether the Republick ought to prefer the Friendship of Musicony to that of Sweden, in order to arrive at a firm and immediate Peace: It is casy to imagine to which Side their Inclinations leaded. The Exclusion of the Deputies of the Higher Poland came nextion the Outpet. It was alledged, as a Presence, that their Provincial Diet had been broken; but the true Reason was, that this Part of the Kingdom had always whemently oppos'd the War with Stubden, and they fear'd lest chose :: Departies:: should be fest, by the Adherents of Salieba, to kindle a Haction in their Bavouri This Exclusion of the Deputies gave thom Such a Shock, that, binding themselves closely together, they as last concluded a formal Confederacy.

After the Deputies had retir'd, a great Outgry was rais'd in the Diet against the Sapieba, and against the Cardinals, but, to the great Surprize of the Court, that Prelate army'd fix Days after the Opening. He fet out from Warfovia, after having writ a Letter to the King of Sweden on the ad of June, to distinate him from the Siege of Thorn, as it was a Town belonging to the Republick. The Court syas much troubled at his Arrival, for they had flatter'd themselves with his Ablence, by which Means they might more easily have succeeded, either by Perfusion or Force; in their Projects. which were, to declare War against Sweden: to make an Alliance with the Czar, and with Denmark : to condemn the Sapieba; and to annul the primatical Dignity.

.. The Cardinal enter'd the Town, as it were, in Triumph; attended by his own Retinue, and a numerous Train of several Senators and Lords, who went out to meet him. He immediately fent one of his Relations to the King to complement his Majesty, and demand an Audience pibut was much surprized at the Coldness with which his Relation was received, and to hear, at the same Time, that the Audience was refus'd him; which Réfusal was founded on an Imagination that the Cardinal would not come to the Senate. He took, however, a Refolution to go thither without having paid his Respects to the King, which determin'd his Majesty to give him an Audience three Days afterwards. They had usid many Endeavours to bring him into the Views of the Court, but that Prelate always firongly opposed them, and would never take the least Strp: which might be look'd on as an Effect of Weakness or Cowardice. He had his publick Audience when the King was on the Point of going to the Senate, whither he accompany'd him. and took his Place, without waiting till he was call'd.

The Affair of the Cardinal coming on the Carpet, some of the Deputies would would have declar'd the Dignity of Primate vacant, as well as that of Archbishop, being desirous to make him pass for a Traitor to his Country! and a Partizan of Sweden. was accus'd of enormous Crimes, and loaded with Injuries, he did not attempt to defend himself, but heard all with Patience, as he saw the Astembly prejudic'd and enrag'd against him, flattering himself that he should be able, by that Means, to appeale the first Emotions of their Anger. However, to exculpate himself, he desir'd that he might conform with the rest, and take an Oath to the King, and to the Republick; which he instantly did, and all the Senators, and Members of the lower Chamber, even those who had not affished at the great Councils of Thorn and Marienburg, follow'd the Example of the Primate, and took an Oath of Fealty.

The Party of King Augustus, surprized at the Cardinal's Constancy, sought after new Opportunities to raise a Storm against him, as well as Mr. Towianski, Palatine of Lencini, and his Son, who was the Cardinal's Minion. But after his Eminence had given a full Scope to the Animosity of the Nuncios, he ventur'd to speak at another Sitting, which he did with so much Force and Vivacity, that he entirely remov'd from the Assembly all the Suspicions which had been rais'd against him.

It was remark'd, that the profound Silence of the lower Chamber, and the Attention which they gave to the Primate's Discourse, caus'd great Uneasiness in the King. He afterwards spoke twice himself, and dwelt much on the Blindness of the Republick, her Disquiet, and Weakness in the Support of the Liberty of her Country. This he did with such Violence, that the Tables were soon turn'd.

The Nuncios, embolden'd by this Discourse, recover'd their Vigour, and spoke with more Freedom: They exaggerated the Elogiums of the Cardinal so far, as to call him the Father of his Country.

The Diet, however, came to a Refolution, which we shall mention a little lower, and the Affair of the Sapieba was concluded with more Moderation. The Alliances with the Czar and Denmark were carry'd in the Negative, as was the incorporating the Saxon Troops with those of the Crown.

During these Transactions, the King of Sweden answer'd, on the 29th of May, the Letter which the Cardinal had writ to him, to dissuade him from the Siege of Thorn. His Majesty, a little afterwards, sent Count Stenbock to Dantzick, to hasten the Transport of the Artillery, which would be necessary for that Siege, in Case the Garrison would not capitulate before they were attack'd in Form.

The Count, immediately, on his Arrival at Dantzick, sent Couriers to Riga and Carelfcroom to press the Transportation; but as the Convoy did not arrive in the Road of Dantzick till the End of June, Count Stenbock made. in the mean while, his Propositions to the Magistrates, to pay a pretty confiderable Sum of Money to the King, in the Form of a Contribution. The Town appear'd strangely alarm'd with this Demand, and would willingly have avoided the taking a Step which must be very disadvantageous, and of great Consequence to them for the future. future. But as they enter'd immediately into serious Reslections on the past Wars, where their Obstinacy in not paying had drawn great Inconveniencies on them; and as they heard, besides, that a new Fleet was on the Point of appearing in their Road from Sweden, they conform'd to his Majesty's Will, and agreed with the Count to pay him in all 100,000 Crowns; desiring, nevertheless, to reserve certain Articles very savourable to their Commerce, but which were entirely resus'd them.

The Town of Elbing was summon'd at the same Time by the Count to pay their Contributions to the King, which the Magistrates had the Boldness to refuse, tho' the Citizens offer'd willingly to comply; and we shall soon see the Severity with which that Town was punish'd for their Refusal.

The Garrison of Thorn, in the mean while, began by little and little to diminish, by the Distempers occasion'd thro' their Fatigues, and Want of necessary Refreshments, not to mention their Magazine, which was infinitely exhausted. They were oblig'd to keep from the Troops a Part of their ordinary Allowance. However, as they had a large Provision of Powder and Ball, they were extremely prodigal on that Head, and fir'd on our Quarters without Cessation.

It is aftonishing that his Majesty, who with his usual Intrepidity visited the Posts every Day, and approach'd fo near the Town that the Gunners were (if I may so express myself) obliged to fire several Times at his sittle Body of Attendants, during the whole Siege received no Wound, nor did any of his Attendants; for the Balls slew either over their Heads, or between the Legs of their Horses, or else passed by them.

But what is as furprizing, and what is rarely practis'd among polite Nations, was, that they spar'd the King's Quarters no more than the others, tho' it is usual to have the same Regard and Respect for those Tents, as for crown'd Heads. At their Morning and Evening Fire they never fail'd to distinguish the Head Quarters, where every one was in the greatest Danger of their Lives; and one Morning, particularly, a Bullet slew directly towards the King's Tent, but as it was wet, had not sufficient Force to pass thro' it *.

To replace the Regiments of Ridderbielm and Nieroth, the King breacht up Major General Morner, with his Regiment of Horse, from Rheinf child's Army, which lay at sour Leagues Distance, and order'd them to encamp on the Vistula, below the Town, where the Regiment of Foot-Guards was likewise posted soon afterwards. His Majesty sent Orders also to the same Army, to bring up two Companies of Lithuanians, one of which, after having been some Time at the Camp, was detach'd with Co-

There is a Circumstance in my Father's Journal, in Regard to this, which I think not proper to be omitted. One Morning, (fast be) as I was in Bed in my Tent, near the King's Quarters, I rais'd myself in my Bed to give some Orders to my Servants. I had scarce laid down again, when a Ball pass'd by, and broke a Case of Pistols to Pieces which I had plac'd at my Bed's Head; the Pieces of which sell on the Bedsted with a violent Noise. If I had not soon laid down again, this Ball would infallibly have taken off my Head.'

lonel Meyerfeld, to join Ridderhielm and Nieroth, and to afist in the levying Contributions.

About this Time the Crown Army, which might amount to 4000 Men, joined the Saxon and Lithuanian Bodies, who were posted at Pultowsk.

As these last had formed a Resolution to deliver the Town of Thorn, they thought that the Conjunction of all those Troops would furnish them with means of executing their Project; a very fine one, if they had had Courage to support so noble and bold an Undertaking, which ended in only fending out Parties with great Diligence to discover what Ridderbielm and Nieroth were doing in their Neighbourhood. A Curiofity which cost them dear. For one of their Parties, confifting of about 1000 Poles, under the Command of Potocki, had the Misfortune, together with some Saxons, to fall in with a Swedish Detachment, who made Ten of them Prisoners, and killed a great Number. This Shock took from them all defire of giving us any farther Trouble; nor did they any longer dare to think of raising the Siege of Thorn, though they had given the strongest Assurance of it to Robel and Cantiz, by a Letter which they had found means to convey into the Town.

The Enemy had, however, their Revenge in Ingria. After they had taken Noteburg, Nyenschantz, and fama, and built the Fort of S. Petersbourg, the Czar turned towards Finland with part of his Army, to attack Major-general Cronbiort, who had not quite 4000 Men, both Foot and Horse. That General performed, nevertheless whatever could be expected from an experienced Officer.

To stop the Torrent of so numerous an Army, Cronbiort took Possession of the Pass at Systerbek, nine Leagues from Wibourg, where he was attacked by 25,000 Russians, who had marched through Desiles, Morasses and Woods, which were believed impassable. The Battle lasted from Six in the Morning till two in the Afternoon, with great Obstinacy on both Sides.

The Russans, who returned always to the Charge with the fresh Troops, at last won the Day, and forced the Major-general to think of a Retreat before it was cut off, which was performed with so much Order and Boldness that the Enemy could never break the least Line of our Men, nor take from them their Baggage and Artillery. Cronbiort then posted himself half a League from the Field of Battle, where he always repulsed the Enemy, who undertook to force his new Post.

His admirable Disposition astonished the Russians, who lost all Appetite of returning to the Charge; and Mr. Cronbiers thought proper to take an Opportunity, in the Night, of retreating three Quarters of a League from Wibourg. He lost in his whole retreat but 200 Men killed, with four Officers, but we do not include those who fell in the Battle.

The Regiment of Tisenbausen suffered much in this Action. We had 171 Men wounded, besides Lieutenant colonel Glasenapp, Aid-de campgeneral Armselt, Lieutenant-colonel Leyon, who lost an Arm, with thirteen other Officets.

When Cronbiors had arrived safely in the Neighbourhood of Wiburg, he placed a Battalion of Foot in the Town, which were followed by some others, who were all fet to work on the Fortifications. Baron Lindbielm. Governor of that Province, was charged with the Direction of the Works; for they had no Doubt of being visited by the Russ with the first Opportunity. However, these undertook no such Matter; but after burning Walkisari, and some other little Places, killing or carrying away all they could find, they returned to Nyen, where they employ'd themselves in recruiting those Regiments which had fuffer'd the most at the Battle of Systenbek. They provided themselves likewise with a good Number of Floats and Bridges, to convey them into Estbonia, where they intended to attack Schlippenbach, as we learned from their Deserters, and at the same. Time to take Advantage of the Harvest.

With this View they reinforced their Detachment posted between Nyen and Andowa, and drew together a confiderable Force near Pitschur, to make an Irruption into Livonia, on that Side near Dirpt.

But to return to the Diet of Lublin, which concluded with great Satisfaction to King Augustus; the Articles of the Convocation which we mention'd above, purported,

1. That, to augment the Crown Army to 30,000 Men, and that of Litbuania to 12,000, the fourth Penny should be paid on all Liquors; that a Poll-tax should levied to pay the Arrears due to the Army; and, for an Acquittance of the Elector of Brandenburg's Pretensions on the Town of Elbing, every Mill in the Kingdom should pay two Crowns.

2. That they should give the King of Sweden six Weeks, to declare either for Peace or War.

3. That the Sapiebas should be declared Rebels, if after fix Weeks, which they further allowed them, they did not surrender themselves to the King; that they might in that Case hope to preserve some of their Offices and Goods, otherwise the whole should be confiscated.

4. That no more Thoughts should be entertained of dethroning King Augusus.

5. That, if the King of Sweden would not accept a reasonable Peace, but would continue the War, King Augustus might enter into an Alliance with what Powers he thought proper.

6. That, when the Troubles are quieted, the King shall be permitted to visit his hereditary Dominions, as often as he thinks convenient, without being obliged to consult the Republick on these Occasions.

The Cardinal was afterwards obliged, by a Senatus Concilium, to reply to the King of Sweden's Letter of the 29th of May, which was in Answer to one from his Eminence of the 23d of that Month: But the Primate would not undertake it, at least unless the Commissaries of the Republick would write at the same Time, which they did on the 12th of July, acquainting his Swedish Majesty that they had been confirmed in their Commission, and expected that he would send Deputies, to enter into a Negotiation for Peace, in Behalf of the Republick.

They at first declared, that as the Republick had by a new Oath bound themselves to the King her Master; and that his Majesty had by a new R 2 Diploma

Diploma engaged inviolably to preterve all her Laws, Liberties, Immunities and Treaties of Peace, they were charged, by virtue of the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, and of this new Diploma, to make the following Propositions in the Name of the Republick.

1. The Articles of Oliva, as well as all the other Treaties concluded with the Kings and Kingdom of Sweden, should be religiously observed, renewed and confirm'd by a new mutual Engagement on Oath.

2. It shall be so ordered, that the auxiliary Troops shall not remain in the Kingdom, and the Great Dutchy of Lithuania, any longer than the Continuance of the War, and shall return thither no more, on any Pretence whatsoever.

- 3. Care shall be taken that his Polish Majesty, or his Successors, shall not make any Alliance with the neighbouring Princes, nor any foreign Potentate, without the Consent of the Republick; and that any such Alliance shall be declared void on the Part of Poland.
- 4. His Polish Majesty, and his Successors, shall be hinder'd from bringing, either directly or indirectly, by themselves or others, their own Troops, or those of soreign Powers either by Sea or Land, into the Kingdom of Sweden, and the Provinces under her Dependance; and they shall make no War or Incursion there, much less suffer any Troops to pass through Poland, or her Frontiers.
- 5. Nothing shall be neglected to prevent his Polish Majesty, or his Successors, from furnishing any Subfidy or Troops to the declared Enemies of Sweden.

6. Matters shall be so regulated, that for the future none of the Polonese shall undertake Enterprizes of this Nature, without the Knowledge of the Republick; and that if any one should dare to enter on such forbidden Measures, he shall be declared a Disturber, and punished as a Criminal.

7. Lastly, That the foregoing Propositions, and those which shall be interchanged by the Commissaries, may be faithfully observed, and the Estates of the Kingdom of Poland, and of the Great Dutchy of Lithnania, and of the allied Provinces, engage, in Case of any Breach whatever, to unite against those who break it, and to send their Troops to the Assistance of the Party offended, for the Preservation of Peace and the Laws; for which they desire a reciprocal Security may be given.

The Cardinal before he quitted Lublin, writ at the same Time with the Commissaries, a very respectful Letter to the King of Sweden on this Head, who answer'd on the 21st of July; and at the same Time order'd Count Piper to write to the Commissaries of Poland, that his Majesty would willingly hearken to their Propositions, but remained firm in his Resolutions. absolutely to place no Reliance on the Promises of King Augustus, though feconded by all the Guaranty and Affurance that the Republick could give At last, though the Commisfaries, and particularly Count Morftein, did their utmost to renew the Affair, and though the foreign Ministers joined their Endeavours also to bring bring it to an Issue, they could gain no Ground, and the Negotiation was entirely broke up by the Steadiness of the King, who demanded the dethroning his Enemy, who had so often broke his Word, and of whose Promises he could make no Account. After the Diet was separated, the Imperial, English, and Dutch Ministers, sent their Secretaries to Thorn, who went down the Vistula, to inform his Majesty of all that had passed in this Assembly.

Notwithstanding all the fair Promises of the Poles to affist King Augustus, we continued to push the Siege of Thorn, with all possible Vigour. The Transports from Sweden were already arrived in the Road of Dantzick; and, some Days after, others came from Riga with the heavy Artillery. As the Recruits for the Army were without Officers, his Majesty dispatch'd a proper Number out of the Drabans and Foot-guards, with Orders to condust them to the Camp forthwith.

King Augustus being arrived from Lublin at Offick (a Castle belonging to-Mr. Biclinski, Grand Marshal of the Crown, and situated a League from Warsaw) ordered a Bridge to be thrown across the Vistula at Prague, over which he filed off the Litbuanian Army, and the Saxons who came from Pultowsk, in order to be nearer Thorn. Their Delign was to attack our Troops, which were encamped on that Side, while the Garrison made a vigorous Sally, and endeavoured to join them at the fame Time: By this Expedient Augustus hoping to preserve his best Infantry, which he deemed in extreme Danger in Case it failed.

In the Interval that Prince ordered a Detachment to march into Upper Poland, both to reduce the Nobles, who began to be regarded and were now to be treated as Rebels, and likewife to observe more closely the Movement of the Army under General Rheinschild, which gave him great Unersiness.

Prince Wisniowski had obtain'd the chief Command of the Troops sent on this Service, which had given such Umbrage to Prince Lubomirski, that he continued at Warsaw without any Inclination to follow it. He pretended 'twas against the Laws of the Realm, to admit the Lithuanians without the Consent of the Republick. But this gave the King so little Pain, that he left him to cool at leisure, persuading himself he would be easily regained, which actually succeeded soon after.

On the other Side, General Brand was on the Watch for all Opportunities to surprize the Swedes, who were encamped in the Neighbourhood of Strafburg and Neumarck, and who had fent out Detachments as far as Lauterburg to raise Contributions: Intelligence of which being brought to that General, and that one of these Parties still remained there, he marched immediately with all his Forces, amounting to 6 or 7000 Men, in quest of As all the Inhabitants were fled, and Major Charles Creutz of the Horse-Guards, who was the commanding Officer, could not be apprized of the Enemy's Approach, he was attacked by them so suddenly, that he had scarce Time to put his little Troop, of about 400 Horse, in a Posture of Defence.

They however behaved with such Gallantry, that Mr. Brand, having made made his utmost Efforts to break thro? them, and being always repulsed with Loss, at last gave Orders for all his Dragoons to alight, while the Horse entered the Town in another Place, to aftack them on all Sides at once. Creutz then feeing himfelf furrounded, had now nothing to do, but force his Way Sword in Hand; which he executed with all imaginable Bravery, bearing down all before him, and plunging into a pretty rapid Stream, which he iwam across, and happily landed on the other Side; losing in the Action, and in the Water, a Captain, a Lieutenant, and near 180 Troopers, of which fome were made Prisoners, and conducted to Warfaw, whence they were afterwards exchanged against the Saxons taken at Thorn. The Enemy, extremely surprized at the prompt Refolution and Intrepidity of Creatz in passing the River, durst not pursue him, but let him return quietly to Neumarck, having received but a flight Contusion in the Action.

Immediately upon his Arrival there, Major General Nieroth put himself at the Head of his Regiment, and, taking Creutz with him, marched full Speed towards Lauterburg, where Brand yet remained in Suspence; but, fearing at last he should be attacked in his Turn, retired as fast as possible, not caring to hazard a second Engagement. Mr. de Nieroth, at his Arrival, having caused the Dead to be interred, and gathered together certain of the wounded, who had hid themselves in the Wood, returned to Neumarsk, whither the King a few Days after fent a Reinforcement of 500 Men, to secure them more effectually from the Infults of the Enemy.

Upon another Side, Prince Wisniowiski and Mr. Steinau approached with their Army, within feven Leagues of Thorn, to put in Execution the Project which they had formed, to fave, if possible, the fine Garrison inclosed in that City. But, as they had learned his Majesty had thrown yet another Bridge over the Vistula, to render the Communication more easy with the Troops encamped on the other Side, they had not the Courage to attack us. Their Parties however approached frequently fo near our advanced Guards, that they were obliged to fire upon them. The Saxons in Thorn on their Parts likewise made a Sally; but, in passing over the Boats, to see if the Succours promised them were arrived. and also to conduct certain Head of Cattle into the City, were repulsed and compelled to give over their Defign.

Prince Wisniowiski seeing then the Impossibility of saving that City, wheel'd all at once towards Great Poland, in Order to dissipate the Confederates, who increased in Numbers every Day; and had not only elected a Marshal, but even assembled publickly in the little City of Skroda, deliberating on the State of the Republick, protesting against all the pernicious Decrees of the Diet of Lublin, and entreating the Cardinal to place himself at their Head.

General Rheinschild, who had marched from Konari to Ruski, June the 3d, from thence to Scarzino the 15th, the 17th to Colo, and the 1st of July to the City of Camia; from whence he turned towards Great Poland to procure Intelligence of the Confederates; proceeding the 13th to Jagorow, and the 16th to Zirkzew, an Estate belonging to the General of Great Poland, a Partizan of King Augustus; where having rested 'till the 13th of August, he marched on to the little Town of Pizdri; and, being here inform'd of the March and Approach of Prince Wisniowiski, he decamped the next Morning, and marched strait on to Wrezna, a small Town two Leagues from Skroda, in Order to protect the Consederates: Some Days after which he detached Lieutenant-Colonel Konigspeim to observe the Motions of the Enemy.

Who, having had Advice about five Leagues from thence, that Wifniowiski was yet thirteen Leagues off, and that a Party of 500 Valoches had passed within half a League of him to reconnoitre the Army of Rheinschild, belived it his Duty to attack them. Accordingly he marched after them, encounter'd and defeated them, taking a Pair of Kettle-Drums, and certain Prisoners; after which he posted himself in the Village of Mielezun, and intrenched himself in the best Manner he could.

But as Misfortune would have it, a famous Lithuanian Leader, called Bandonir, who, by the Order of Wifniowiski, had lain concealed in an adjoining Wood with twelve Companies of Valoches, fix Troops of Pancernes, two Companies of Tartars, 280 Ger-Horse, 400 Dragoons, and 600 Saxons, rushed out suddenly on Mr. Konigsbeim, and attacked him so briskly, that, finding himself surrounded on all Sides, and oppressed with Numbers, he was obliged to surrender himself Prisoner, together with Mr. Funk, Captain of Dragoons, having first feen an hundred of his Men killed. General Reinschild, who was foon apprized of this Incident, flew thither with two Regiments of Dragoons to sustain his Party, and repulse the Enemy, but arrived too late, they being already retired to the little Town of Slupsie, and, tho' he pursued them even thither, found it impossible to overtake them, they having thought proper to make the best of their Way, to avoid a fecond Combat. Days after the General made another Visit to the same Place, in Hopes they would venture to return; but, finding the Town deserted, he marched on to Mislezun, and the 29th to Meroflaw, a League and a half from Skroda, to be nearer the Confederates, who, in the Interval, had fent Deputies to Wilniowiski, to befeech him not to treat them as Enemies.

Rheinschild, being obliged to decamp for Want of Forage, marched the 2d of September to Kurnitz, the House of a Nobleman, near the Town of Buny, two Leagues from Posnania. In passing by the Camp of the Confederates, they fent to defire he would not remain in that Palatinate; which Message was owing to their Chiefs, who, having fair Estates in those Parts, were fearful those Troops would prove but bad Neighbours: But as Mr. Rheinschild gave them to understand, it was absolutely necessary for their Safety that he should continue there, the Enemy waiting only 'till his Back was turned to waste all before them with Fire and Sword, they readily consented, and were afterwards highly pleafed to be under his Protection.

The Count de Stenbock had left Oliva, where he had been some Time with his Recruits, which amounted to some thousands of Horse and Foot, and a little after arrived happily in the Camp before Tharn. His Majesty immediately distributed the Infantry among the distributed Regiments, and detached the Cavalry under the Command of Ransford, Adjutant of the Drabans, beyond Dribentz towards Plockzco, to oblige the Nobility to pay the Contributions imposed upon them.

Some Days after, the Artillery and Ammunition arrived on the Vessels , used in going up the Vistula, but could not reach Thorn by three Leagues, because the Water was then so extremely shallow; which obliged the King to transport the whole in Waggons the - rest of the Way, not without infinite Difficulty and Labour; his Majesty himself attending to give the necessary -: O:ders, and exposing his Person all the while to the Fire of the Enemy's Cannon, one of which they actually I levelled at him, and with for good an Aim, that the Ball grazed him in its · Passage, and imminently endangered his Life. In the mean while a new Reinforcement of Troops arrived in the Road of Puisik, a Place seven . Leagues from Danizick, in the Posses. fion of the King, who had caused it to be fortified, that he might have the Command of a Sea-port to serve him on all Emergencies.

As foon as the Artillery was in a Condition for Service, the King proceeded to attack the City with greater Vigour than ever; and, not content with holding it blocked up, ordered a Battery to be erected in a Garden near the Culm-Gate of four Mortars and eight Pieces of Cannon, and, upon an adjoining Eminence, another of fix.

His Majesty order'd the Trenches to be opened the 916 of September, between the Hours of nine and ten at Night, in two different Places; viz. on the Side of the Vikula, where a Major was posted, and at the Foot of a Hillock called Bekersberg; and, placing himself at the Head of 800 Infantry, who covered the Pioneers, defeated the advanced Guard of the Enemy, taking a Lieutenant and six Soldiers Prisoners, and having six of his own wounded.

The Works were carried on all Night in profound Silence, but being - perceived at Day-break by the Saxons. they made a terrible and continual Fire upon us, both from the Ramparts and a Tower, where the Citizens had , mounted fome Cannon: Notwithstanding which the King was always foremost to encourage the Pioneers with his Presence and forward the Works. It happened the fame Day, that while he leaned with his Elbow on a Paraper of Fascines, and talked to the Colonel upon Duty, a Bullet passed between his Arm and the Parapet without doing him any Harm; he barely smiling at the Incident, without betraying the least Emotion beside. As he every Day visited the Trenches, for the most Part on Horseback, it drew upon him a Hail of Musquet Balls from the Enemy, which made every Body tremble round him; but he always preserved the same Tranquillity even in the midst of the greatest Dangers.

On the Side of the Vistula the Trenches were carried on with the like Industry. But the Saxons believing they should meet with fainter Opposition there than at Bekersberg, made a Sally with 200 of their best Grenadiers.

falling upon the Peasants, who were cleaning the Trench along the Visula, and obliging them to retire. But the Baron Erich Sparr, who commanded that Day, coming up, soon put these Adventurers to Flight, after having killed ten of their Men, wounded a great many more, and pursued the rest to the very Glacis of the Counterscarp, the Garrison looking coolly on from the Top of the Ramparts, without taking a Step to sustain or relieve their Fellow-Soldiers. We had four Men killed in this Rencounter, and near upon twenty wounded.

We were never troubled with Frolick of this Kind on the Side of Bekerfberg, but the Garrison continued a dreadful Fire from their Cannons and Mortars, discharging from the last such a Quantity of Stones, that we were obliged to build certain little Out-works for our better Security

We had now a third Battery erected near the Vifula, which was mounted with twelve Pieces of Cannon; a fourth on the other Side of the River with lix 12 Pounders; and a fifth close under the City upon the Hill of Bekerfberg.

As foon as these were in a Condition to play, the King order'd them to fire from all at once. This began between sour and five Hours after it was dark, and continued without Intermission till Break of Day; and with success, that we had scarce fired two Hours before we saw the Flames break out in three different Places. One Cannoneer in particular fired so exactly on the Town-house with a red-hot Ball, that the Steeple blazed out immediately like a Flambeau, and set fire to that whole sine Building. All the Merchandizes laid up there were consumed, as was likewise the Corner of the Market-Place, where King Augustus had lodged; a Magazine and several other Houses shared in the same Fate.

This terrible Fire continued all the following Day till Night, because of the great Number of Bombs which we discharged incessantly. The Damage which the poor City suffer'd, by the Ruin of its Churches and other fine Buildings, was irreparable; and the Mischief spread the farther, as the Inhabitants dare not stir out to extinguish the Flames.

In this Distress, as they had several Times already in wain solicited the commanding Officer for Leave to send Deputies to the Camp, they resolved to expose themselves to no more Resusals; but, crowding in great Numbers to the Sceeple nearest the Walls, they sounded a trumpet, to express the Extremity to which they were reduced. But this Scep so exceedingly incensed Mr. de Camizz, that he put them all into Prison, and treated them with great Severity.

The same Day the King caused certain Mortars to be transported from the Battery before the Culm-Gate to that neat the Vistula, which was commanded by Mr. de Bunaw, Lieutenant-Colonel of the Artillery; because the Magazines of Powder, which the Saxwas preferred in the Cloisters of the Dominicans, and in their Neighbourhood, were more remarkably exposed on that Side; after which we began again to bombard the City with great Violence, and fired it in several Places; but the Flames were almost as foon extinguished as they broke out, by the indefatigable Endeavours of the Governor, who had now learned more Experience, by having suffer'd so greatly from the first Bombs that were thrown.

It was during this Siege, that by Order of General Rheinschild the Baron de Mardfeld took Possession of the City of Possasia, by whom the Fact was related in the following Manner.

" After the Arrival of General Rhein-" schild the 2d of September with his Army at Kurnik, situated about two Leagues from Posnania, he detached the fame Evening Lieutenant-Colonel Wrangel, of the Regiment of de 'Horn, with 200 Horse, to escort * Captain Funk of the Regiment of ' Dragoon Guards, who in Quality of 'Commissary, was to make certain ' Propositions to the City of Posnania; because no Question was made of its being disposed to submit on any rea-' sonable Terms that should be offer'd. "The Detachment being arrived; and Mr. Funk with two other Perfons admitted and heard by the Magistrates, they told him, They would consider of it, without any farther Explanation. The Captain having waited several Days without bringing them to Reason, or obtaining any opolitive Determination, fent Advice to the General of all which had pasfed, that he might take fuch farther · Measures as he thought proper; who, feeing there was no longer any Hope of obtaining any thing by fair Means of the Inhabitants; resolved on the 6 6th of September, towards Noon, to dispatch thither Colonel Lillieboeck and Lieutenant-Colonel Waidenbeim with 200 Smolanders and 200 of the Regiment de Sudermanlande, all Infantry, and four Field pieces, with Orders to be there towards Evening, and endeavour to carry the Place by Surprize; adding by Way of Reinforcement 100 of the Dragoon-Guards, commanded by Captain Ornstedt.

'The next Morning, when it was broad Day light, an Officer of the ' Party returned to the General, to acquaint him that there was more Difficulty than he could foresee to execute his Orders; upon which I was commanded to repair thither forthwith with certain Horse for an Escort, to deliberate on the Affair, and act as Occasion offered. I got there by Noon, and found Messieurs * de Lillieboeck, de Waidenbeim, Wranrel, and Funk, meditating how to execute the Orders they had received. They told me they had Ladders, ' together with Boats and little Prames. 'all ready to pass the Warta, which washed the Walls of the Town, but believed it necessary to wait the Return of the Night before the Attack was made. Captain Funk likewise Islaid before me a Plan of the City and its Works, which I found sufficient-' ly exact, as near as I could guess, by furrounding the Place.

While I was yet employed in making this Tour, I received a Letter from General Rheinschild, fignifying, that the Magistrates had solicited some Days Respite to consider more maturely what was to be done: But having received Intelligence that they had sent to Wisniewiski for Succours at the same Time, he had thought proper to allow them but one Hour.

When this Term was expired, without waiting for the 200 Men, which the General purposed to send to me towards Night, I determin'd to make two Attacks on the Place; one under the Command of Colonel Lillieboeck with 200 Men, on the Gerber Schantz, and the other with 200 more, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Waidenbeim, on the Work of Breflau. Having regulated the Order of the March, Lieutenant-Colonel Wrangel, at the Head of 100 Horse, posted himself before one of the Gates, Ornstedt with a like Number before a fecond, and a Captain, who had 100 more under his Command, was order'd to observe all that passed round the whole City, to prevent all Surprize from the Enemy. I made this Arragement behind the Bernardine-Cloisters, whence we could march under Cover within forty Paces of the Fortifica-tions, which were all filled with People with Pikes and other Arms, who seemed to threaten us with an obstinate Defence, then gave Order, in case of Resistance, to spare one who were found in Arms; but at the same Time expressly forbid the firing on the wretched Out-works of the City, or on a Party of Beggars, ' about 60, which the Citizens had for Soldiers, neither of which were worth Powder and Shot.

About four a Clock in the Afternoon I gave Order for the Affault;
but, when I was arrived at the Townditch, I faw issuing out of Breslau a Person with a Flag of Truce, who blew a Trumpet, and cried out, The City would surrender. To which I answer'd, the Magistrates should then immediately bring me the Keys:
But as they demurred to this Reply too long, I ordered the Scaling-

Ladders to be fixed, and the Ramparts to be mounted Sword in Hand.
The Consternation of the Citizens was then so great, that, being likewise at Variance among themselves, they knew not what they did; some inclining to fire, and others forbidding it; and one among the rest attempting to discharge a Cannon, a fecond caught him round the Middle, and threw him off the Walls.

'While all this was transacting I was before the Gates, and forced them open without Delay. 'Horse being enter'd, drew up, together with the Infantry, in the Mar-' ket-Place; after which having posted fufficient Guards on the Gates, I ordered the Magistrates to attend me, who immediately obeyed; and prefenting me with the Keys of the City, I reprimanded them severely for not having fent them at my first Approach, and for their having behaved in so stubborn a Manner. I then put them all under arrest in the Town house, and order'd the Citizens to furrender their Arms, as likewife to pay instantly 1000 Crowns to the Soldiers to redeem the City from Plunder.

After having given the necessary Orders for the Defence of the Place in case of an Attack, I sent back in the Morning to the Camp at the Kurnyk the Reinforcement of 200 Insantry, which came in the Night with Mr. de Wrangel, the 200 Horse, and the sour Field-pieces; and some Days after repaired thither myself.

ARWID AXEL MARDEFELDT.

In this Manner, without losing a Man, or striking a Blow, we became Masters of a City well furnished with Cannon and other Arms, and populous enough to have made a brave Defence, if the Burghers had been united among themselves.

Some Days after the Reduction of the Place, a Letter from King Augu-, Aus to the Magistrates was intercepted, in which he exhorted them to hold out as long as possible, promising them immediate Succour if they behaved as valiantly as might be reasonably expected from them. But this Encou--ragement came too late, and the City was obliged, for having to long delay'd opening her Gates, to pay a considerable Sum of Money, and furnish large Contributions to the Army. This Conquest was fo much the more, important, as it enabled us to cover the Assembly of the Confederates, and, at the same Time keep them both in Respect and Awe, in Case they took any Measures contrary to the Interest of his Swedish Majesty; and as it aftorded us beside a safe Retreat both for our Baggage and wounded Men.

But Care was taken to render it more, defensible; and the Works, that were most debilitated, were put in Repair, forthwith. Colonel Lilliebock had the Command of it; and the General, Rheinschild, to take away all Suspicion from the Confederates, immediately imparted to them his Success; which was received even better than there was room to hope; they not only declaring themselves satisfied, but intreating the General to continue a strong Garrison there, in Case he himself should be obliged to march at a greater Distance from it.

He likewise concluded, very reafonably, that the King of Sweden's Manifesto, which he communicated to them at the same Time, and by which he affured the Confederates of his Protection, had contributed to render them so tractable; and so much the more, as his Majesty threatened to use with the utmost Rigour all such who declared themselves in favour of the Diet of Lublin. This extremely rais'd. their Courage, and animated them to pursue their Design with Vigour; which they declared was chiefly to maintain Religion, preserve their Libercies, and the publick Peace, without any Prejudice to the Duty they owed King Au, They likewise proposed to mediate a stable and folid Peace between the Kings of Sweden and Poland: in which View they had already fent a Deputation, as well to King Augustus to affure him of their Fidelity, to the Cardinal, to the Army of the Crown. as to the King of Sweden, to acquaint them all with their genuine Sentiments.

Tho' it was with Regret King Augustus gave these Deputies Audience. he submitted to it notwithstanding: But the Concession had not Force enough to soften the Resentments of the Poles; on the contrary, as tho' it was by Contagion, many other Palatinates joined with Great Poland, till the Confederacy insensibly became universal, and tended finally to declare the Throne vacant.

At the same Time the Palatine of Posnania, whom the Confederates had sent to Prince Wisniowiski, so effectually persuaded him that his Principals had no other End in View but the publick Good, and consequently very ill deserved to be treated as publick Enemies, that, all at once, he took a Resolution to return into Liibuania with his whole Army. According the Crown Troops immediately divided from the Saxons, taking their Rout to Lemberg, and the Saxons theirs to Cracow by the Way of Pierekow.

While the Enemy's Forces in Poland were thus dispersing, the Czar prepared to make an Irruption into Livonia and Esthonia, and actually effected it in the Beginning of September, when he departed from Nyen with considerable Forces and twenty-four Pieces of Cannon; and in his Way passing over the River near Narva to Wesenberg, he reduced that Place to Ashes, and laid all its Appendage in Ruins.

Major-General Schlippenbach was posted at Summershausen near Wesenberg, and immediately dispatched Lieutenant-Colonel Freiman at the Head of a Party to reconneitre the Enemy. Freiman, having rencontred their Advanced Guard while preparing a Bridgo, destroyed it; but, as Schlippenbach sound himself too weak to hinder the repairing it, much less resist such formidable Forces, he settred under the Cannon of Revel, to throw himself into that City in Case the Enemy threatened him with an Attack.

The Rushans, not thinking themfelves obliged to run their Heads against Stone Walls, and aiming at nothing but to ravage the open Country, marched with all their Forces from Wesenberg to Kolka, from thence to Wittenstein and other Places, where they committed great Disorders, and haid all waste with Fire and Sword.

Another Body of these Troops have ing enter'd Livonia, on the Side of Pinschur, behaved there in the same dreadful Manner, carrying away all the young People, and massacring all the old. After having spent the whole Campaign in destroying the Districts of Gerven and Wirlande, which make full half of Esthenia, and reduced to Ashes the Suburbs of Dorpt, with the Towns of Wolmar, Wenden, Walk, Kalkus, Felin, Oberpablen, and halfburnt Ruygen, with Mentlen and Sagnitz, they repassed the Frontier with Threats to return very speedily to Nar. va, which they proposed to befiege in Form, having held it in a Manner blocked up ever fince the taking of Jama; from whence they made continual Inroads, and hinder'd all Provisions from being thrown in for the Support of the Garrison.

It is true, the Dutch greatly contributed to these Devastations of the Russians, by having furnished them with all Sorts of Arms and Ammunition. Mr. Schlippenhach having himself seen no less than nine large Ships of that Nation under Sail near Assoriem. Very lively Complaints were made to the Minister of the States at Stockholm on this Proceeding; but he threw all the Blame on private Adventurers, whose Conduct was highly disapproved by the Republick.

The Siege of Thorn still continued, and the King (Sept. 27.) growing impatient of wasting so much Time in reducing it, resolved to make a third Attack near the new Ravelin of the Saxons, and the Garden which led to the Tile-kiln. Having possess'd himself of the last during the Night, he order'd a Line to be drawn towards the Tile-kiln, which, in the Morning so greatly surprised the Saxons, that they thought fit to capitulate, and accordingly beat a Parley forthwith. But the King, who was then in the Trench, would give no Ear to it; but pushing on the Work with Vigour, caused a new Battery to be raised, mounted with 48 Pounders, which were soon in a Condition to play.

The next Morning a Drum from the Besieged presented a Letter from the commanding Officer, but was answer'd, that his Majesty accepted no other Terms but that of surrendering at Discretion. But though the Garrison were extremely weakened by Sickness and Scarcity of Provisions, they thought those Conditions so severe, that they resolved to desend themselves to the last Extremity.

A new Battery on the Vistula being now compleated, the whole fix at once began a most terrible Fire upon the City, which was returned by the Enemy with wonderful Ardour. The same Day his Majesty resolved to attack an Island over-against the City, which the Samons had fortissed both from the Vistula and the opposite Shore, ordering the Infantry for this Purpose to march down to the Side of the River, and embark themselves near the Bridge of Boats.

The Governor, perceiving all these Movements, as likewise that the Trench was advanced within a Stone's Cast of the Counterscarp, thought it high Time to submit to the King's Pleasure; for which End he desired a Conference with certain Officers of Distinction. The King then countermanded his Troops which were preparing for the Assault, and sent Mr. Ducker, his Aid de-Camp-General, into the City to confer with the Saxon Generals, who at last agreed to surrender at Discretion.

Mr. Ducker returned with this News to the King, who complimented both the Generals and Officers of the Enemy with their Swords and Baggage. In the Morning his Majesty order'd Count Gasper Sperling to take Possession of the City Gates with one Battalion of the Guards, and disarm the Garrifon at the same Time. Towards Noon the Generals Robel and Canitz, with the Counts de Reuss and Goltz, Colonels, and many other Officers, came out to pay their Compliments to the King. His Majesty kept the Generals and Colonels to dine with him, and received Mr. de Conitz in particular in the most gracious Manner. Count Sperling also magnificently regaled in the City all the Officers of the Garrifon, the King having order'd 50 Dishes out of his own Kitchen for that Purpole. At the same Time a great Number of Sheep and Cattle were drove into the City for the Relief of the poor Soldiers and Citizens, who were almost famished.

In this Manner King Aggustus lost his best Infantry, who could make no farther Resistance, as having scarce any Bread remaining; the rest of their Provisions being likewise consumed, the Garrison were reduced to live upon rotten Herrings, which spread so introcerate a Scurvy among the Troops, that no more than 1583 Men were capable of Service, the remaining 2495 being disabled by the Disease, and it their Beds. roo of their Dragoons out of 188, were in the same Condition, as were 282 Artillery-Men out of 500.

Among the Prisoners were 2 Generals, 2 Colonels, 6 Lieutenant-Colonels, 9 Majors, 46 Captains, and 113 Lieutenants and Ensigns, all which had the Compliment of their Swords on their Parole.

A great Quantity of Ammunition was yet remaining in the City, but the Cannons and Mortars were near worn out by the continual Fire which had been made from the 16th of May, when the Place was first blocked up, to the 3d of Ottober, when it surrendered; towards the Evening of which Day, the whole Army being under Arms, his Majesty order'd a double Discharge to be made, both from the Cannons of the Ramparts and those of the Batteries.

At the Instances of the Saxon Generals, the King afterwards permitted Colonel Goltz to repair to King Augustus at Warsaw, to acquaint him with all the Particulars of the Siege.

'Tis easy to judge how ill that Prince must have relished such disagreeable News, and above all the Loss of his best Infantry, which he regretted extremely. Some Days after he departed from Ottfok, where he had been during that whole Interval, and took the Road to Leopold, to assemble the Senators and hold a Council at Favarow.

In the mean Time the King ordered the Fortifications of Thorn, which the Saxons had newly raised, at a great Expence and much Labour, to be totally demolished, as likewise the Towers, from whence the Citizens had annoy'd our Troops; no more than the Wall being lest, just to defend the Inhabitants from the Inroads of the Cosfacks and other military Thieves. The Magistrates and Burghers were likewise obliged to lay down their Arms, and likewise pay a large Contribution to the King *.

The happy Success of his Majesty's Arms, made so much the greater Impression on the Confederates, as their Deputies, being in the Camp, were Eye-witnesses of the Glory which the King had acquir'd. They departed soon after, on the Hopes he had given them of sending a Person with certain Proposals regarding the Measures he expected them to pursue; and Mr. de Wachslager was accordingly appointed that Service.

A great Number of Deputies from the neighbouring Palatinates, as of Dobrzin, Cujavia, Plotzko, and of Polish Prussia, came to compliment his Majesty, and intreat they might be admitted into the Number of the Con-

It may have been thought, that there was some Truth in the Narration: but there is not the least Authority for it in the Journal of my Father, who would not have fail'd, according to his

During the Siege of Thorn, it was confidently affirmed in the publick News, that a Saxon Officer, naned Muhlbeim, having quitted the City, and repaired to the Swedift Camp, pretending to be a Deferter, and offering his Service to the King to discover the weakest Places of the Fortiscations, the King had twice walked out, accompany'd by him only, to be let into those Discoveries and that the third Time the counterfeit Fugitive threw himself at his Majesty's Feet, declaring, that he was employed by General Robel to assaffinate him, producing at the same Instant, a Poniard from underneath his Clothes, prepared for that Purpose; and adding, he was ready to die, as believing himself unworthy to live, after having embarked in so execrable a Design.

federates. His Majesty received them all very graciously, tho' it was easy to perceive, that nothing but Fear, and a Desire to be soon discharged from the Contribution exacted by our Troops, had prevailed with them to act in this Manner. Nevertheless they deceived themselves in this Particular, the King resulting to remit those Levies, to keep them within the Bounds of Respect and Obedience.

It was about this Time that his Swedish Majesty publickly acknowledged the Elector of Brandenburg as King of Prussia, which gave immediate Rise to a Report, that an important Alliance was formed between the two Monarchs; a Circumstance by no Means favourable to the Republick, in case she resused to enter chearfully into a general Confederacy.

The Swedish Troops in Courland had frequent Skirmishes with those of Oginski, which, though always worsted, appeared nevertheless desirons of new Trials. They for some Time harrassed Colonel Banneer, who was then ordered, together with Lieutenant-Colonel Glasenay and 300 Horse, to pass the Frontiers and attack them, which he did Odober the 30th near Janiska, and gave them an entire De-Deseat.

The same Night Lieutenant-Colonel Lorentzen marched from Seelburg with a Detachment of Infantry and 25 Granadiers, and, passing the Duna, proceeded to Slaboda, where he carried off the Advanced Guard, composed of certain Companies of Valoches; after which he surprized the rest, 50 of whom were put to the Sword, and 20 taken Prisoners, together with a great Number of Horses, without the Loss of a single Man on our Side.

Some Days after, Colonel Pols order'd Captain Frommerie, with 60. Foot, to depart from Banfke to levyl Contributions. In his Return he fell, in with 500 Polanders, conducting 20. Waggons laden with Provisions from Courland towards Birsen, who attacked him immediately, but were so warmly received, and so many of them killed, that they thought proper to retire, abandoning their Convoy, which the Captain happily conducted into Bauske!

About the fame Time eight Com! panies of Dragoons and Polanders. commanded by a Major named Broms, carried off a Party of ours posted at Polangen; which induced Colonel Skytt, who commanded at Libau, to detach 300 Foot and Horse, under the Conduct of Major Patkul, with 100 of the Troops of Sapieba, to give them Chace. Captain Metz, who conducted the Van with 50 Horse and the Polanders of Sapieba, having fell in with them at Cretingen, attacked them immediately, killed 40, took 19 Prisoners, and all their Horses and Baggage. Major Patkul being come up, they pursued the Enemy, who, having been likewise reinforced, met us half way, and attacked Patkul in a certain Village, but were repulled with the Loss of 40 Men.

In the Morning, the Sweder, being on their Return to Lahau, the Enemy followed; and, overtaking them in a level Field, near a Bridge which they had already passed over, and where they drew up in Order of Battle, be gan their Attack forthwith, but were repulsed and put to Flight; returning over the Bridge in Confusion, and leaving above 50 Men dead upon the Spot. Patkul then continued his Rout, but was again harassed by the Enemy, who charged his Rear, and were once more defeated with the Loss of ten or a dozen Men; after which they gave over the Pursuit, and Patkul arrived happily at Libau.

After the Reduction of Thorn, the Count de Steinback had been sent to Dantzick, to take the necessary Measures for transporting into Sweden the Saxon Prisoners, and all the Trophies atchieved in Poland; for which Service several Men of War were already arrived from Carelscroon in the Road of that City.

At the same Time his Majesty ordered one Regiment after another to file off into the Quarters prepared for them on the Side of Dantzick; he himself still continuing before Thorn, 'till the fick Saxons were embarked, together with the Artillery, to go down the Viftula, under the Command of Col. Rank, who was to escort them by Water with his Regiment. The Other Prisoners, with the three Generals Beuft, Robel, and Canitz, and all the Officers, followed some Time after, guarded by a large Detachment of Dragoons. Some few were exchanged against the Swedes, who were taken at Warfaw. The Count de St. Paul, Colonel, who had been made Prisoner in the Affair at Pullowsk, and was permitted to repair to Warfaw on his Parole, for the Cure of his Wounds, Obtained his Liberty in Exchange for Lieutenant-Colonel Konigsbeim and Captain Funk, who returned to the Army.

When the City of Thorn had paid the Sum agreed upon, the King, Nov. 11, fet out at the Head of his Drabans, and crossed the Vistula near d'Althusen and the Town of Culm, after having distributed his Army along the Borders of the River. His Majesty chose for his Lodging the Cloister of Topolno, five Leagues from Thorn; the Drabans took up their Quarters in the nearest Villages on the Side of the River, and the Regiments of Foot-Guards in the Towns of Culm and Schwetz.

In the Morning the King repaired to Dirschow, about four Leagues from Dantzick, to have an Interview with the Count de Steinbeck on the Subject of the Winter Quarters, when it was resolved upon to dispose the Troops as well in the Neighbourhood of Dantzick, Marienburg, and Elbing, as in the Bishoprick of Warnice. After which his Majesty returned on Horseback, accompanied by the Prince of Wartemburg and certain Officers, having rode 32 Leagues in two Days.

The Czar returned to Moscow at the End of the Campaign, after having sufficiently provided for the Security of the Frontiers, especially on the Side of Narva, thinking of nothing now but how to render his Entry into his Capital more splendid, and like a Conqueror; for this End four triumphal Arches were erected, under which he passed in a Sledge, Nov. 22, followed by a superbe Train of Generals, and other grand Lords. paor Peasants of Livonia and Ingria being led as in Triumph between the Ranks of the Regiment of Guards Preubasinski, to induce the People to believe that it was a glorious Campaign, which entertained them with the Sight of fach a Number of Prisoners.

King Augustus, on his Sides being fet out for Jawarow, as before mentioned, affembled there all the Senators of his Party, to whom he Arongly. represented, that, having been author rised by the Diet of Lublin to contract Alliances with foreign Princes, he could not believe they would dispute with him the Privilege of fending a folemn Embassy to the Gzar, for the good of the Republick, who, being & Prince of great Power and their near Neighbour, and one who interested himself in the Welfare of the Republick, might, by that Means, be induced to exert himself in procuring her a safe and advantageous Peace with Swiden.

He concluded with proposing the Palatine of Culm to negotiate this Affair, and declaring that he was already on the Road to Moscow. But Prince Lubomirski, with 12 other Senators, protested to vehemently against this Measure, alledging, with great Reason, it would be the Means not only to retard the Peace, but set the whole Kingdom in a Flame, that the King was obliged to withdraw his Motion, and recal immediately the Palatine of Culm, by a folemn Declaration made in Council at Jawarow, Nov. 24. Upon which Occasion he extremely flattered the Nation on the Liberty he left in their Hands, and added, that he would never violate it in the like Circumstance. He was, however, so offended at the Opposition that he had met, that, under the Pretence of the Incommodiousness of fo small a Place to lodge so numerous an Assembly, and of the Court itself's being greatly Praitened in Conveniencies, he adjourned the Council, and retreated nearer Sanony, but without giving over his Defign of fending his Ambassador to the Cour, as will presently be made appear.

As many Gentlemon had refused to join themselves with the Confederaces. under the Pretence of being obliged to reside at Home to raise their Quota of the Contributions imposed upon them. General Ribeinschild, who had Orders to humour them as much as possible. removed the 19th of September from Kurnik to Krotschin, from thence the 241b to the little Town of Bibigecofki, the 25th to Klaskow, the 1st of Oslober to Zornick, and on the 3d gave his Troops a few Days Rest at Leknow, two Leagues from Gnefnen, being then out of the Palatinate of Posnania, arriving the 22d at Gorkidombski, where he began to canton out his Troops a and, having fent Advices of his march to his Majesty, he proceeded the 2d of November to the Lordship of Sizrelte, and on the 24th to that of Lubin, where he was greatly surprised to see the King arrive the same Day.

His Majesty departed from Topolno, accompanied only with his Drabans and his Aid-de-Camp General, all whose Horses he so effectually jaded in so long a march, that only one Page Klinkowsfrom, accompanied him into Lubin.

Mr. Rbeinsebild trembled, when he came to reflect on the Danger to which the King his Master had exposed himself, the Country being filled both with the Enemies Parties and Robbers. To prevent therefore all Accidents and Misfortunes, when he saw his Majesty fixed to return the next Morning, he deteched certain Proops for his Guard, by which means his Majesty returned happily, Nov. 25, so Topolno, after having travelled 34 Leagues in two Days; neither did he condescend even then to allow himself any Repose, but set out the very next Day for Dirschow, many Regiments being stready in full March to their Winter Quarters?

In Great Poland (everal riotous Parties embodied themselves to raise certain military Contributions called Hyl bernes, and Smitelfki, Staroft of Gnefnen; at the Head of a great many Gentlemen, made continual Inroads into the Lands of the Confederates; who complained bitterly to General Rheinschild of these Outrages, and demanded Succours; upon which level tal Detachments were disparched im mediately to give the Enemy Chace? and one of these, under the Command of Lieutenant-Colonel Zulig, had the good Fortune to surprize a large Number, of whom the greatest Part were made Prifoners.

Soon after this the General let out himself from Lubin, to be the better able to take the Confederates, under his Protection; the Army marching in two Columns, first to Ziernewo, a Gentleman's Seat, December 11, to Bkodra, where the Confederates had their Rendezvous; the 12th to the little City of Zzin, the 14th to Ziondz, the 15th to Zarodzin, the 17th to Plesko, the 19th to Kalis, and Jan. 1, 1704, to Blasice, and from thence to Siradia, where the General seized upon the Castle, that nothing might be omitted that could beget a Confidence in the Confederates, and at the fame Time convince the Palatinate of Pofnania how nearly he regarded their Welfare.

He was scarce arrived at the lastmentioned Place, before the Province to which it belongs sent their Deputies to beseech him to lessen the Contributions with which they were charged, in Consequence of their acceeding to the Consederacy. Those of Lencize and the Territory of Vielane demanded likewise the same Favour; and Part of their Demand was complied with, to encourage them to unite and continue firm to the Article of deposing King Augustus, which was on the Point of taking Place.

All being ready at Dantzick for transporting the Saxons Prisoners, Trophies, and Artillery, the Squadron, under the Command of Baron Class Sparr, Vice Admiral, which was come from Carelferoon to escort them, set Sail from the Road of Putzig, with fo fair a Wind, that they foon came in Sight of the Coast of Sweden: But the Joy on that Occasion was but shortdived; a dreadful Tempest the next. Day, Nov. 28, coming on, which difperfed the Fleet, and every Ship was glad to make away for the nearest Port. However, after they had long contended with the Winds and Waves, Mr. Sparr made a Shift to re-assemble the greater Part of them, and thought it most expedient to steer for Danizick.

One of these Vessels, with 500 Saxons on Board, arrived at Pilkaw; but they all made their Escape as soon as the Captain had set them ashore at the Entreaties of his Crew. There was but one Ship wrecked, which was on the Coast of Courland, and which was freighted with Powder and Ball.

Many Saxons, who, by the Situation of their Country, are little used to Sea-Voyages, lost their Lives upon the Occasion, testifying great Apprehensions of Death, and atoning, after a Rate, by their incessant Prayers, for the horrible Oaths they had uttered to the very Moment of their Embarkation.

A little while after the Fleet set sail again, and arrived in Sweden without any farther Loss. As to the Saxon Generals and Officers of Distinction, they were permitted to repair thither by Land, as they thought proper, provided they arrived at the Time prefix'd by his Majesty.

Count Steinbock having demanded of the Magistrates of Elbing free Pasfage for the Swedish Troops, who were upon their March to their Winter-Quarters in the Bishoprick of Vermia, and, likewise, that they should immediately throw a Bridge over the River near that City for that Purpose; they did not presume to resule it openly, but nevertheless made no Preparations to put it in Execution, alledging in Excuse a great many false Pretences, and, among the rest, that the Brandenburg Troops, quartered in their Suburbs, had forbid their Compliance with that Demand. Count Steinbock immediately resolved to advise his Maiesty of this Incident; to which he was the more moved, as he easily perceived that the fole Reason of this Delay was the Fear of being punished for having refused some Months before to pay the Contributions imposed upon them.

The King, provoked with all those Delays, but more especially that they should call in foreign Troops to their Succour, dispatched thither Lieutenant-Colonel Von Scheven and Major Morner, with a Letter from Count Steinbock to the Magistrates in his Majesty's Name, enjoining them to anfwer categorically, whether they were instantly disposed to receive a Swedish Garison, or not; who, on their Return to the Count, informed him, that they behaved as haughtily, as if Pride and Insolence had turned their Brain. Of which the King being advised, he gave fecret Orders to Major-General Stromberg to furnish his Regiment of Infantry with Horses, and conduct them forthwith to a Place called Rufchow, situated between Marienbourg and Elbing, whither the Regiment of Horse-guards, with that of Major-General Morner, Horse likewise, had Orders to repair at the same Time. On the other Hand Lieutenant-Colonel Schewen, at the Head of an hundred Men, was commanded under Covert of the Night, and by marching a long Way about to feize upon two Sluices a League and a half from Elbing, by the Help of which that City might lay all the Adjacencies under Water.

When all these Preparations were made, we began to march at 11 o'Clock at Night, having first given Notice to the Prussian Commander at Elbing of his Majesty's Design to pass through that City.

The King was accompanied by the Prince of Wirtemberg, General Morner, Count Steinbock, and Colonel Lagerskrona. As to Major-General Stromberg, he had pushed on before with some Horse to take Possession of certain Prames, by the Help of which he proposed to pass the River in the Dark, Dark, and post himself on the other Side. But, when he came to the Place, all these Prames were already. on the other Side; upon which he called to the Prushan Guards to send them over; and being answered, that they durst not without express Orders from their Officers; he fent a Captain of Horse, with some few Troopers, to cross the River in a little Shallop with all possible Silence, who, after some warm Language on both Sides, returned with the Prames at the Instant that the King arrived with the Horse-Guards. His Majesty, the Prince of Wirtemberg, the Generals, and about 30 Horse, passed over immediately, and advanced towards the City to examine the Avenues, as far as the Ditch, without being suspected: But the Guard at one of the Gates at last taking the Alarm, demanded the Word; and receiving no Answer, fired several Shot, by which one Horse was killed.

The King, to avoid a Discovery, then retired full Speed to the Suburbs, where he lay as close as possible; but soon after sent Colonel Lagerskrona with a Trumpet to the Magistrates, to demand once more whether they perlisted in their Refusal to satisfy his Majesty, by admitting a Swedish Garrison. In this Interval the King, who had passed over all his Cavalry, posted them in all the Avenues round the City; and, about 9 o'Clock in the Morning, Mr. Lagerskrona returned, and fignified to his Majesty, that the City defired three Hours Time to deliberate on the Proposal, when they would fend Deputies with the Resolution they had taken. King took Advantage of this Opportunity to advance his Troops as near the Walls as possible, which were so concealed behind the Houses. Gardens, and Hedges, that the City perceived nothing of the Matter. Which done, the Term demanded expired. and no Deputies appearing, his Majefty, growing impatient, fent Count Steinbook into the City, with express Orders to stay but one Quarter of an Hour, and to demand absolutely, and in few Words their final Resolution. The Count found the Senate still assem bled, and, having made a lively Representation of the extreme Peril which their Obstinacy would expose them to, if they exasperated his Majesty any tarther, and that in such Case the utter Ruin of the City would be unavoidable, he induced them at last, partly by Arguments, and partly by Menaces, to open their Gates, and fubmit themselves to the King's Clemency; with which Resolution the Count returned to his Majesty, whom he found furrounding the City, and examining the Fortifications.

As foon as the Gates were opened, the King made his Entrance, and immediately visited the Ramparts, &c, giving Orders for the three Regiments to march in at the same Time. His Majesty then made Choice of his own Quarters, and, by mere Chance, pitched upon a House where his illustrated upon a House Gustavus, of glorious Memory, had formerly lodged with his Spoule Hedwige-Eleonora, born Princess of Helssein-Gottorp.

After the King had given what farther Orders he thought proper, the Magistrates, terrify'd for the Mistake they had committed, in exposing themselves hemselves so rashly to the Resentment of so formidable a Conqueror, befought the Honour of throwing themfelves at his Majesty's Feet, together with their Fellow-Citizens, to implore his Forgiveness. To this they received an Answer in Writing, which exemplified all the Provocations they had given, and thence infinuated how unworthy they had rendered themselves of his Majesty's Clemency: In Conclusion it condemned them to pay 200,000 Crowns Contribution-Money. besides the 50,000 imposed at first, and 10,000 more for not having fent, last Summer, the hundred Waggons which had been demanded of them, for transporting to the Camp before Thorn, the Ammunition fent from Sweden.

This Writing spread a general Consternation through the Inhabitants of Elbing; but, as they knew their Collusion, with Respect to the Brandenburg Troops, was discovered to the King, they durst not alledge the least Thing in their own Excuse, and, at the End of two Days, offered to pay the whole Money required of them; after which they were admitted to kils his Majesty's Hand.

When we were thus Matters of the City, we visited the Arsenals, where we found 180 Pieces of Cannon, great and small, (what belonged to the Republick and the Saxons included) Abundance of Ammunition, and 160 Quintals of Powder's all which was put under a strong Guard of Swedes. We then disarmed 500 Soldiers in the City pay, and made 400 Poles, who were Part of the Troops of General Taube, Prifoners of War, together with the military Commander of the City. The next Step we took was to demand of the Prussians in the Suburbs to surrender their Quarters to the Swedes, who wanted Room in the City, and were besides to be reinforced by a Regiment of Foot, then in full March to the Place; which arriving a few Days after, the King ordered two Regiments of Cavalry to march to their Winter Quarters in the Bishoprick of Warmia.

Count Schlippenback, Major-General of Proffia, repaired about this Time to Elving, and had an immediate Audience of the King; after which, and certain Conferences had passed between him and Count Steinbock, he order'd his Master's Troops to retire, excepting only a few Men, who, for the Sake of certain Pretensions of his Praffan Majesty on the Territory of Elbing, were permitted to remain.

The Court, the Drabans, the Regiment of Foot-Guards, and that of Dubl-Carlia, having quitted their Quarters at the fame Time, which were in the Neighbourhood of Topolna, marched through Neuberg, Meve, and Marienbourg, towards Elbing. Some Troops were left at Grandenia to levy Contributions. Colonel Axel Sparr continued at Strafburg, and Lieutenant-Colonel Class Bond joined him with certain Cavalry, to lay all the Country above Dribentz under Contribution.

As to the King of Poland, ill satisfied with what had passed in Council at Jawarow, Decemb. 10. he set out for Cracow, where he kept his Christmas, and afterwards repaired to Saxony to convene the Estates of that Country, and demand of them a free Gift and Succours.

The ill State of his Affairs, however, did not hinder him from passing his Time agreeably at Leighick, where he did not seem to regard much what happened in Poland; having only order'd 5000 of his Troops to assemble themselves in the best Manner they could in the Neighbourhood of Crasow, there to wait his Return.

The King of Sweden, on his Side, having waited only at Elbing the Arrival of his Court and the Drabans, fet out the next Morning (Dec. 15) for the Village of Neukirchen (3 Leagues) proceeding thence to the Village of Braunsberg (2 Leagues,) where the Prussan Troops then were, but decamped at our Arrival. From Braunsberg we marched on through Tolders and Lichtenau to Hielsberg, the Residence of the Bishop of Warmia; where the King took up his Quarters, Decemb. 22. and continued all the Winter.

The Troops attending his Majesty were lodged in the Houses of the Gentry and Peasants, where they were quite at Ease, and fared well. The rest of the Army extended from Warmia as far as the Country of the Cassiubes, and from thence along the Vistula as far as Thorn.

The Morning after his Arrival at Hielsberg, his Majesty, who never lost Sight of his Design to dethrone King Augustus, proposed to the Consederates, who were more and more exasperated every Day, Prince James Sobieski to be Head of the Republick, by a publick Declaration, dated Decemb. 23.

The Cardinal had already publish'd his Universalia to convene all the Nobility of the Kingdom at Warfaw, Tan. 14. But as he found there only a few Deputies, he deferred the Opening of the Diet to the 30th; when the Deputies of the Confederates being there assembled from all Parts, and feeming disposed to deliberate seriously on the Means to procure a folid Peace. and give all imaginable Satisfaction to the King of Sweden; he, who faw well enough their Inclinations, but, to all Appearance, did not believe they had taken the necessary Measures to dethrone King Augustus, or for some other Reasons, so well concealed his Sentiments, that the Assembly did not intend at first to declare the Throne vacant, though some Persons proposed it.

This Prelate, to keep up the strict-est Decorum, did yet more; and even sent King Augustus Advice of all that passed. The Intention of the Diet, as has been said, was only to establish a sirm Peace with the King of Sweden; and, as the Cardinal had intreated his Majesty to send thither his Commissaries to begin the Treaty, Baron Arwid Horn, Major General, had a Commission for that Purpose, together with the Resident Wachslager, who arrived at Warsaw sirst, and had immediate Audience of the Cardinal.

[•] All our Troops in Poland and Pruffia, at the End of this Campaign, amounted to 17,700 Foot, 9,500 Horfe, and 4,000 Dragoons, without reckoning the four new Regiments which the King had raifed

the Cardinal affished at the Head of the Deputies, with a Taper in his Hand. To this Ceremony succeeded a solemn Mass and Sermon, at the Conclusion of which his Eminence repaired to the Place of holding the Assembly, where he expressed himself to this Purpose:

That though the Councils of Thorn, Marienbourg, and Jawarow, as well as the Diet of Lublin, were not able to effest the Peace so much desired; but, on the contrary, had produced nothing but Afflictions and Disappointments, be bad nevertheless made it his Study to remove the Obstructions; that, for this End, he presented bimself, as one bearing bis Cross, and called upon to contend for that Liberty, which was the sole Support of the Republick: That he thank'd the illustrious Confederates of Great Poland for baving united themselves to him, as the Children of Peace, and exhorted them to persevere: That, the bis Majesty was retired, be would not bowever abandon the Throne, desiring to represent, if not Majesty, at least the Idea of M jesty, as baving always bad the Good of his Country at Heart, even to the Prejudice both of his Health and Interest.

After he had finished, the Marshal of Great Poland complained, that that Part of the Republick had been treated as if in Rebellion, both by the Contempt thrown upon it by the Diet of Lublin, and the Excesses committed there by the Saxons; and that, for these Reasons, the Confederates had thought proper to put themselves under the Protection of his Eminence.

On December 31, in the Morning, they proceeded to the Election of a Marshal of the Confederacy; and the Choice fell upon Mr. Bronitz, Starost of Pisariski, and Marshal of Great Poland, the same who had before declaimed with such Vivacity and Courage; who immediately took the Oath, and received his Staff of Office. Some Days after they enter'd into Conference with Major General Horn, who was now arrived at Warsaw, and produced his Credentials in Quality of Commissary, authorising him to negotiate a Peace with Poland, and receive Proposals for that Purpose.

During these Transactions, King levied new Contributions, as well in the Bishoprick of Warmia, as in the Werders of Dantzick and Marienbourg, which were to defray the Expences of a new Regiment of Foot and four of Dragoons. Count Steinbock raised one of these Regiments, Colonel Meyerfelt the second, and the Aid de Camp-Generals, Messieurs the Barons Taube and Duker, in Compliment to their distinguish'd Merit, the other two. Lieutenant-Colonel Ekeblad had the Regiment of Foot, which confifted of 1200 Men.

At the same Time a Promotion was was made of Colonels and General-Officers. Baron de Spens, Lieutenant-General, and Colonel of the Horfe-Guards, was made General of the Horse, and Inspector of the Fortresses and Reviews in the Realm of Sweden. Baron Frolich, Lieutenant - General, was created General of Foot, and Governor of Riga. Baron Charles Morner, Major-General, was made Lieutenant-General, and Inspector of the Reviews and Fortresses of Sweden. Alexander Stromberg, Major General, was promoted to be a Lieutenant-General, and Gover of the Province of Geole in Sweden. Major General Ridderbielm was appointed Lieutenant-General and Governor of Wismar, in the Room of the late General Lieuen, killed at the Siege of Thorn. The Majors-General Nieroth and Horn were made Lieutenants-General; the last being continued notwithstanding in his Post of Captain-Lieutenant of the Drabans.

Baron Charles Creutz was made Colonel of the Horse-Guards in the Room of General Spens. Lieutenant-Colonel Burenscholt had the Regiment of Ostrogothia, Cavalry, before commanded by General Morner. Baron Gustavus Horn, Quarter-Master of the Drabans, succeeded Mr. Ridderhielmin the Regiment of Norder-Scania, Cavalry; and Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Ornstedt to that of Suder-Scania, after General Stromberg.

Some little Time after this, by a new Promotion, the Colonels Lager-skrond, Hummerbielm, and Meyerfeldt, were declared Major-Generals. As for Mr. Hummerbielm he had been detained Prisoner all this while in the Hands of Wisniowiski, after the Affair of Dorfuiki, nor was exchanged till March, against Mr. de Goltz, a Saxon Colonel.

King Augustus, after having dispached the Palatine of Culm, Jan. 6. as his Embassador to the Czar, in Spite of all the Remonstrances of Numbers of Senators and Generals of the Crown to the contrary, had still continued in his hereditary Dominions, as hath been already said, to assist at the Opening of the Assembly of the States; which, at length, taking Place, he demanded of them, among other Aids, 500,000 Crowns and 16,000 new Levies, all which was cheerfully granted. Having then received by several Couriers a melancholy Account of the general Confederacy of the Nobles at Warfaw, he repaired forthwith to Cracow, where he had the Shadow of an Army, both to cover that Place, and expect the Issue of a Crisis which held all Europe in Suspense, the' not believed to be so near a Decision: Nor had he been there long before it reached him in the most forbidding Shape, signifying, that the Confederacy, with the Countenance and Support of the Cardinal, were on the Point of declaring the Throne vacant: That the Marshal had proposed to reduce it into an Act: that the Swedish Commissaries absolutely refused to treat before the Article of the Deposal of Augustus was confirmed; and that at last, Feb. 6. after fome flight Debates, the following Refolution had been taken.

Since the most serene King Augustus. Duke of Saxony, bas neither observed. our Laws, nor regarded our Rights. and that, by the Tenor of the Pacta. Conventa, we are absolved from our Allegiance, we now renounce it, and take the Exercise of Justice into our own Hands. We likewise discharge bis Senators and Ministers, and will no longer adhere to him. We declare all those to be Enemies to their Country who affift in bis Councils; and we intreat the most eminent Primate to publish the Interregnum, to officiate in the Distribution of Justice and the Care of the Finances. and to prepare the Conditions. of a new Election.

1. That two Forms of an Oath should be agreed upon, one for the Senators and Officers, and the other for the Nobles, which all, who joined the Confederacy, should be obliged to take.

2. That the said Oath should be taken before the Marshal and Deputies of each Palatine, of which they should give a Certificate.

3. That, when they had provided for their Safety at home, they should proceed to guard against what might happen from ahroad; and that the Marshal should convene the Commissaries of the Republick to assist at the Treaty, the Project of which shall be framed by Men of Experience and Capacity, and afterwards referred to the Marshal.

4. That, during the Inter-regnum, bis Eminence should convene the Russian Pospolite.

5. That, as the Dietines of Little Poland approached, the Instrument of the general Confederacy should be signed, and deliver'd into the Hands of the Cardinal Primate, the Marshal, and the Deputies, to be sent to each of the said Dietines respectively.

Agreeable to these Resolutions, the Oath was forthwith taken by the Senators and Deputies, and instant Advice of all was given to his Majesty by the Starost Wiouski, to whom it was sent to Hielberg. King Augustus now seeing Affairs take so malicious a Turn, preconceiving beside his Enemies would not stop here, but proceed to the Choice of a new King, resolved, with the Council of those Senators, who still attended him, to consider the Assembly at Warsaw as illegal, and consequently both to treat them as Rebels, and declare all their Resolutions bull and yold.

The Czar, at the same Time, writ to the Cardinal, the Senators, and the Orders of the Republick in the most pressing Terms, and even menaced them with the utmost Rigour, if they persisted in their Design of dethroning King Augustus.

As Augustus suspected that Prince James Sobieski, Son of the late King of Poland, would cabal for the Crown, and likewise knew he was both greatly favour'd by the Nobles, and esteemed by the King of Sweden, he thought it expedient to find out Ways and Means to arrest him.

Prince James received Notice in Time; but, whether he did not believe it, or despised the Danger, asnot imagining they would dare to feize upon the Emperor's Brother-inlaw in Silefia, the Dominions of the Emperor, he continued quite at Ease as before, and took no one Measure to avoid the Snare: So that one Day, being in the Road from Breslaw to his Castle at Wolaw, 30 Saxon Horse, with certain Officers under the Command of Mr. Wrangel, who had lain perdue, arrested him, and, without Loss of Time, conducted him to Leipfick, together with his youngest Brother Prince Conftantine, who would not leave him. They were both lodged in the Castle, and were treated with all the Honours due to their Rank.

King Augustus did not fail to send the News to the Emperor, and ordered a Memorial, at the same Time, to be laid before the Diet at Ratisson, containing the Reasons which induced him to proceed to this Extremity:

What.

What Effect it produced in Poland

we shall see presently.

The King of Sweden now faw himfelf folicited on all Hands not to drive his Enemy to Extremities. The Queen of England, in particular, writ to him in the most obliging Terms, to perfuade him to a Reconciliation: Count Zinzenderf likewise presented him a Memorial on the same Subject some Time after. But neither had any Effect: his Majesty sending Orders notwithstanding to General Rheinschild to march towards Cracow in Order to furprize Augustus, who, after having persuaded the Palatines of Siradia and Lencizi to accede to the Confederacy, advanced with his Troops, 7an. 11. from the City of Siradia to Zlezow, the 13th to the little City of Wielun, the 21st to Irzebutzow, a Gentleman's Seat near the City of Jalupu, and from thence to Czenstakowa, a very rich and potent Monastery, where Rheinschild posted Colonel Horn with his Regiment; marching with the rest of the Army from the other Side of Czenflakowa to Redziny, where he learn'd Augustus was still at Cracow, and that his Troops were encamped round the City. In order to surprize them before: he push'd on to the Lordship of Krusnia, and, the next Morning to Radomfki, where two Companies of the Starost Bobrowski, belonging to Sapieba, and commanded by Grufinski, joined the Army.

The Valoches here likewise made certain Saxons Prisoners, who confirmed the Intelligence from Cracow, which induced Rheinschild to hasten thither with the greater Speed. Accordingly, Feb. 22. he decamped from Radomski, and marched to Zitna, thence to Koniespoli, the 24th to Siekuzewo, and the 26th to Wolbrun, where our Van surprized a Saxon Enfign with certain Soldiers, whom General Venediger had detached to ob-. ferve our Motions. But whatever Diligence Rheinschild used, he could not hinder the Enemy from being informed of his Approach; and, being arrived the 27th at Jangorad, he learned King Augustus was already retired from Cracow, having first broke down the Bridge of Communication. The General however marched on a little farther, but finding it to no Purpose, he returned to Jangorad, from whence he detached in the Morning Lieutenant-Colonel Funk with 300 Horse towards Cracow for a Supply of Provisions for the Army. March the 1st, he advanced himself to Zierkovice. within two Leagues, where he learn'd that King Augustus had taken the Rout. of Sendomir to throw a Bridge over the Vifula, as well to keep the Communication free with certain Nobles, who had affembled by his Orders at Oficz was confirmed; upon which; (the 7th) he hastened his March towards Slota, and from thence (the 10th) to Piestritz, the 12th to Shieditz, and the 14th to Klimentow, where he had Advice, that, after the Bridge near Sendomir was broke down, King Augustus, not caring to wait the Arrival of the Swedes, had posted on to Zavigest. Rheinschild then instantly detached a Captain with forty Horse to observe the Enemy, who took a Saxon Corporal and four Soldiers Prisoners, by whom he was informed, that King Augustus was marching on toward Pietrovin, to throw a Bridge at that Place over the Viftula.

In this Interval Prince Alexander Sobieski had writ from Breslau to the Cardinal, to complain of the King of Poland's seizing his two Brothers; at the same Time aggravating the Action, as being committed in the Dominions of the Empire, and imploring the Protection of the Republick both for them and himself.

This Incident did not a little contribute to irritate the Resentment and inflame the Animosities of the Assembly at Warsaw, where the Letter was several Times read, and the Arrest canvassed.

They regarded this Step of King Augustus as an Outrage; and the Cardinal writing a very poignant Letter to the Pope on the Designs of King Augustus on the Liberties of the Republick, concluded with the Scizure of the Princes; Children, said he, of a great King, who had delivered Vienna and guarded Italy from the Turk; who was the Idol of his Country, the Admiration of Strangers, and the Terror of the Barbarians.

Prince Alexander, on his Side, not believing himself safe at Breslau, and, hearing on all Hands the Sentiments. of the King of Sweden in his Favour, thought it necessary to throw himself into the Arms of a Prince, from whose. Friendship every Thing was to be expacted, as he had once already made manifest. But, at his Intreaty, to avoid running any Risk on the Road, a Detachment of 100 Horse and 150 Foot, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Weidenbeim, was sent from the Garrison of Posten to be his Guard; who, after having left the Foot at Ranitz, on the Frontiers of Silesia, marched on to Breslau, and thence conducted the Prince to Pojnania, without incurring any Accident by the Way.

Smigelski was extremely desirous of making an Attempt, but was too timerous to undertake it, and the Prince with a second Escort arrived happily at Warsaw.

If the Seizure of the Princes Sobiefki caused such violent Agitations among the Confederates, the Treaty, lately concluded with the Czar by the Palatine of Culm, exasperated them yet much more. It contained in Substance, That there should be an Alliance offensive and defensive between the Czar, King Augustus, and the Republick of Poland: That the first should furnish the Republick with 12,000 Men at his own Expence, together with two Millions of Florins per Annum; and that the Cities of Poland, of which he was Master, should be ceded to Poland.

Unquestionable Intelligence however was received, that the Treaty contained secret Articles, contrary to the last Stipulation, the Czar having referved to himself the Sea ports; all which augmented their Jealousies and Resentments to such a Height, that they no longer spared King Augustus, but proceeded at last to a new Election.

In Litbuania Count Lowenbaupt disperied every where a Manifesto, dated at Mittau, March 1. which was addressed to the Nobles of that Province, and invited them to join the general Confederacy at Warsaw. Lowenbaupt then repaired to Samogitia, having first received a Reinforcement of 400 Foot from the Garrison of Riga, commanded by Colonel Stakelberg. The Count led with him all his Troops, which amounted amounted to about 3000, Horse and Foot; his Design being both to supply himself with Provisions, and likewise reduce the Inhabitants to Reason.

To this Purpose he marched thro Samogitia towards Lithuania and the City of Chelm; and, that he might. have nothing to fear from the Garrifon of Bir/en and the Parties of Oginski behind him, he left Col. Stakelberg and Major Appelman at Linkau, which is three Leagues from Bauke, and fix from Birlen, with some hundreds of Infantry and a thousand Horse; who furprized the Regimentary Odakowski, and 600 Poles not far from Birlen, and totally routed them. In the mean while Lowenhaupt, having continued his March from Chelm towards the City of Keydan, so managed it, that all the Nobles of those Parts appeared disposed to declare for the Confederacy; deligning to proceed farther still, if Mr. Stakelberg had not given him Hope, on the Credit of certain Deserters from the Garrison of Birsen, that he might render himself Master of that City only by appearing before it. He refolved therefore to try what; might be done, and returned with all his Troops towards that City, but found the Garrison in so good a State, and so disposed to defend themselves to the last Extremity, that he gave over the Enterprize. It was however attended with this Advantage, that he discovered by it what were the Designs of the Enemy: For he was scarce approached, but the Russians, posted on the Frontier, began to make such Motions, as obliged him to return into Courland, to observe their Measures, and fuit his own accordingly.

The King, who had never yet quitted Heilsberg, about this Time took a Resolution to visit the Quarters of the Army. Setting out therefore the 12th of March, accompanied by the Prince of Wurtemberg, and his ordinary Train, he repaired first to Dantzick, where the Guard in the Suburbs refused him Admittance, as not knowing he was the King; upon which his Majesty put Spurs to his Horse, and rid over the Centinel, passing through the Suburbs without Interruption, and continuing on his Way to Putzig, where Col. Clerk and his Regiment were in Garrison, and where he arrived very late.

The Guard admitting no Body after. it was dark, before they had given Notice to the Commander; and the King growing impatient, found, after a little Search, a Place in the Palisades. where he could pass through; and, taking the Prince of Wurtemberg with him, scaled the Ramparts, and went strait on to the Quarters of Mr. Clerk, whom he found in Bed, and greatly furprized to see his Majesty, without having been advertised of his Arrival. The King made but a short Stay, only visiting the Fortifications, and giving Orders for the Transportation he defigned; after which he returned directly to Heilsberg, where he found Count Stanislaus Lescinski, Palatine of Posnania, who was arrived from Warfaw with several Propositions from the Confederates.

Stanislaus was a young Lord, between 20 and 30 Years of Age, perfectly handsome, well made, and polite. He was the Son of the General: of Great Poland, who was afterwards made Treasurer of the Crown. The famous Count Raphael Lescinski, his great Grandsather by the Mother, was the

the grand General Jablienowski. so loved and honoured by the Republick.

The young Count Lescinski was made Senator of the Realm and Waywode of Posnania at the Age of twenty-one, as well in Compliment to his personal Merit, as his high Birth.

He had Audience of the King the next Morning after his Return, being commissioned to entreat his Majesty to honour the Confederacy with his constant Protection, and to declare himself in Favour of the Person whom the Nobles should proceed to elect; as likewise to represent the Necessity of gaining over the Crown-Army, which was to be done by distributing among them certain Sums of Money.

The King replied to the Count, That he would confirm the Instrument of Security which he had given out the Year. before, without pretending to dismember the Provinces or Lands of the Repub-That, when the Inter-regnum should be declared, and they should elect a new King, be would withdraw bis Troops, and lend the Republick 500,000 Crowns for the Payment of their Army. That, when Poland had joined her Forces to those of Sweden, bis Majesty would leave to the Confederates all the Conquests they should make; and lastly, that he would release all the Prisoners that were yet in the Hands of the Swedes.

The 500,000 Crowns were however never paid to the Army; for Prince Lubomirski, great General, who was now among the Confederates, and had repaired to Warfaw with such Views, as we shall speedily unfold, having changed Sides again after the Election, and declared anew in Favour of King Augustus, his Suedish Majesty look'd.

upon himself as under no Tie, to Persons whose Love or Hatred were equally insignificant, and from whom he had nothing to hope or fear.

This Occasion furnished Count Sianislaus with such Means to infinuate himself into the Affections of the King, that it paved his Way to the Throne, his Majesty being positive for him only, after Prince Alexander Sobieski had refused it.

General Rheinschild, having now quitted Klimentow, March 17th advanced to Loftow, and the 191b to Boffosum. In passing by the City of Opatow, a great Number of Baggage-Boys and Suttlers, being left at some Distance behind, were fallen upon by a Party of Saxons and Valoches, who put the greatest Part to the Sword, and made Prisoners of the rest. The 21/2 we continued our March to Tarlow, where the General learned that King Augustus was at Pietrowin, that his Bridge over the Vistula was completed, and that a great Part of his Troops were already passed over to our Side, with Intention, as it was said, to attack us.

Upon this Intelligence the Army was ranged in Order of Battle; and, after having left the Baggage near a Pass with some Troops for a Guard, we marched to the Village of Solecs, which is fituated opposite to Pietrowin. When we were yet a League off, the General, accompanied with feveral Officers on Horseback, advanced to reconnoitre the Enemy with the Valoches, who having discovered certain Persons on the Side of the Vistula, gallopped thither full Speed, and returnwith a Page of King Augustus's, a Lieutenant of Janissaries, and a Saxon Enfign, Enfign, who had follow that Prince and Marshal Danboff a hunting on this Side the River: which last had been taken Prisoner, if he had not been exceedingly well mounted; and King Augustus himself had run a very great Risque, if he had not passed the Bridge among the foremost, General then ordered the Army to march, and, as there were Abundance of Bushes along the Brink of the Viftula, behind which he could easily conceal his Infantry, he led the Way himfelf, and the Cavalry followed him to the Bridge Foot, where the Enemy had thrown up certain Work, and had posted 300 Foot to defend them.

Rheinschild immediately ordered the Attack to be made Sword in Hand, and after a very slight Resistance, obliged them to retire with great Confusion to their Barks and Prames, which they had collected together, after having first turned adrift above a Third of the Bridge, to hinder us from passing over. On the other Side of the River they had planted 13 Cannon, with which they fired incessantly, but with such poor Success, that we had but a either killed or wounded.

After having lodged the Infantry in the Redoubt, and left Colonel Hamilton with 500 Horse to cover them, the General marched in the same Order towards the nearest Villages, where the Regiments were distributed; but there being a Scarcity of Forage, we removed a League farther off, to an Estate of Danboff's, called Lipkow.

The 27th at Night King Augustus ordered the rest of the Bridge to be broke down, which the Stream lodged on the Enemy's Side: He likewise ordered his Prames to depart at the same Time, the greatest Part of which were laden for Casimir; which gave our General some Reason to fear the Design of that Prince was to break up the Confederacy; more especially, as it was reported he had received a Resinforcement.

To prevent which Misfortune, he decamped from Lipkow, drew towards Warka, and marched on to Kazzanow; from whence he repaired the 2d of April to Godow, thence to Jedlinka and Gußa, and arrived the 8th at Warka, where he distributed his Regiments along the other Side of the River of Pilfa, which passes near that City, and discharges itself a little below into the Visula.

He threw at the same Time some Infantry of the Regiment of Sudermanland into the City of Novamiasto. which was at the other Extremity of our Quarters on the same River, for our Security on that Side; and on the 22d of April advanced half a League with his whole Army: But, being informed, that King Augustus was returned to Sendomir, where he had thrown over a Bridge, and posted a strong Garrison in the City to intrench himself there, and resolving not to lose Sight of him, he passed the Pilla at Novamiasto, arriving May 4th at Przitalowije, and the next Morning at Sporzina, near the City of Srinna.

The Palatine of Posnania, at his Return to Warsaw, did not fail to inform the Cardinal and the Confederates of the good Intentions of his Swedish Majesty with respect to the Republick, and the Resolution he had taken to pay the Crown-Army, in case they joined their Forces to his; which Prince Lubomirski the Grand General agreed to do, and was already arrived at Warlaw, where so favourable a Declaration from the King of Sweden spread an universal Joy. In the Beginning of May they proceeded to declare the Throne vacant, and to invite the Dietines to repair to Warfaw by the 10th of June, in order to elect a new King; and, at the same Time, notified the Resolution they had taken on that Head to his Swedish Majesty; who, as foon as the Inter-regnum was published, gave Orders to his Commissaries to enter into Treaty with the Republick. On which Occasion they were conducted with great Pomp to the Place of Assembly, where General Horn read a Paper, which contained in Substance. That the Intentions of the King bis Master, tending only to maintain the Treaty of Oliva, to confirm the Alliance, and re establish Peace, bis Majesty bad sent bim as bis Embassador: That he was ready to begin the Conferences whenever they pleased; and that be desired them to name the Commissaries with whom he was to open his Negotia-Some Days after he presented to those Commissaries the Instrument which the King had promised them: and the Cardinal, on his Side, sent forth circular Letters to all the Cities of Poland to invite them into the Confederacy.

Tho' several Pretenders appeared for the Throne, the greatest Part of the Confederates declared for Prince Alexander Sobieski, a Nobleman of great Merit, and as greatly esteemed. But as his Brothers were Prisoners, whom he tenderly loved, and as he thought their Sasety would be endangered if he accepted the Crown, he gallantly resuled it, and intreated the Confederates to think of him no more. Many have believed, however, that the Queen his Mother and the Imperial Court had greatly contributed to this Resolution of his, by representing it as a Crown of Thorns, and what would ruin him to support it. But, whatever was the Motive of his Refufal, he persisted in it with Firmness and Grandeur; and, at the same Time, that his Conduct might not irritate the King of Sweden, he repaired to Hielsberg, April 29. to explain the Reasons on which it was founded: thanking his Majesty at the same Time for the Honour of his Friendship and Protection, which he had extended both to him and his whole House. He staid some Days at Hielsberg, where he was lodged in the Castle near the King; and, May 5. returned to Warsaw, greatly satisfied with the gracious Reception which his Majesty had even been affiduous to give him, but immoveable to the most lively Remonstrances that were made to induce him to mount the Throne.

When it appeared there was no longer any Hope of him, several soreign Princes were put in Nomination; among whom were the Elector of Bavaria, the Prince of Conti, Prince Ragotski, Prince Odeskalchi, and some others. But the Confederates refused them all, tho' nominated by the Cardinal, and demanded for their King a Piaste, born in their own Country; and, as the King of Sweden likewise inclined the same Way, there was no more Mention made of bestowing the Crown to a Foreigner.

On an Examination then of what Poles were qualified to be Candidates, much Talk at first occurred of the Princes Princes Labemirski and Radzivil, the Palatine of Posnania, and, above all, Mr. Opalinski, a Lord, not only extremely rich and in great Esteem, but who had likewise been upon the List boore; nevertheless, as he was exceedingly covetous, he was soon set aside and died soon after.

The Majority then agreed upon Count Lescinski, Palatine of Posnania, both as he was a Piaste, and agreeable to his Majesty, whose Esteem he had entirely gained; and also, as that Choice seemed to be the most plausible Expedient to re-establish forthwith the Peace and Tranquility of the Realm.

Our Commissaries having Orders to exert themselves to the utmost in the young Count's Favour, the Cardinal at first testified no Sort of Displeasure to him, nay, even promifed not to oppole his Election. But the Event will foon manifest the contrary, and that he had quite other Views. He dissembled nevertheless till the Marriage was celebrated between the young Towianski, Son of the Waywode of Lencici, with the Daughter of Prince Lubomirski, when it was imagined this Alliance would have contributed greatly to bring the Cardinal over to the Side of the Palatine of Posnania; insomuch as he was effeemed entirely in the Interest of the last, and became nearly allied by this Match to Lubomirski; Towianski being his Kinsman.

Our Embassadors, whose Business was to stickle strongly for the Palatine, were highly pleased to see their Affairs in so good a Train; not being able to think the Cardinal, after such positive Assurances, had any Thought of electing the Grand General; for whom nevertheless he laboured with all possible Ardour, as we shall see by and by.

All being ready in Sweden for a fresh Transport of Recruits for the Army, those Troops arrived in Parties in the Road of Dantzick. Four new Regiments of Dragoons were likewise raised, those of Stenbock, Meyerfelt, Taube, and Ducker, who were all in Prussia, and ready to march at the Word of Command.

The King had no Reason to be over and above content with the City of Dantzick, and that Misunderstanding might have been attended with dangerous Consequences, if the Magistrates had not thought it expedient to conform forthwith to his Majesty's Pleasure. Count Stenbock had sent to dispose them to accede to the Confederacy of Warsaw; and they, looking upon it as a very critical Step, had several Times evaded a positive Answer.

The King, piqued with these Delays, ordered some Regiments to march thither, whom he conducted himself; and, May the 20th, sent a Lettter to the Magistrates by General Stenbock, wherein he presized a Time for the City to declare itself, and imposed a Fine of 1000 Crowns, to be paid within an Hour after, in case they suffered it to elapse.

As it was dangerous to perfift in their Obstinacy, or fall into Disgrace with a Prince so potent and successful, they accepted the Conditions proposed by Count Stenbock; and gave it in Writing, 'That they not only re'nounced their Oath made to King' Augustus, but likewise solemnly e'spoused the Confederacy of Warsaw; 'declaring, at the same Time, King 'Augustus and his whole Party EneKings 'Augustus and his whole Party EneKings 'Augustus and his whole Party Ene-directly or indirectly, the Enemies Sweden, and, on all Occasions, to testify their Zeal for his Majesty's Service.

The Dantzickers likewise paid, upon this Occasion, an old Debt contracted in 1500, during the Reign of Charles Canution, who, being compelled by Christiern, King of Denmark, to retire to Dantzick, resided there some Years, and at his Return to Sweden, lest behind him twenty odd thoufand Crowns, for which they gave a Bond, fince found in the Archives of the Kingdom. As the Families of Gyllenstierna, Stenbock, and some others, who had allied themselves with the Descendants of King Canutson, were interested in this Money, the Danszickers were held accountable for it. and obliged to pay it. After his Majesty being which, fied with the Conduct of that City, returned to Hielsberg, where he made all the necessary Preparations to decamp forthwith, and open the Campaign.

We left General Rheinschild at Sporzina, near the City of Srinno, upon the Road to Sendomir, where King Augustus was encamped on the other Side the Vistula. That General there received Intelligence that 18 Companies of the Crown Army, commanded by Baranof, and which had been detached to harrass him in his March, had surprized the Quarter-master of the Regiment of Crassau, named Korff, with 30 Troopers, and put them all to the Sword (except Korff himself, who was taken Prisoner) after a long and obstinate Defence, which lasted till their Ammunition sailed.

The Army, having decamped from Sporzina, marched to Ziedlovice, and from thence in the Morning to Illse, proceeding afterwards to Grabovice, which is but fix Leagues from Sendomir, and arrived June the 3d at Bodzekoff, having passed near Ostrovice in its Way.

It was here we learned that the Saxons had repassed the Visula; that they had lest none but their Infantry in the City of Sendomir; and that they had even pulled down that Part of the Bridge which was near the City. Upon which the General detached, some Days after, two Parties of 300 Horse each, the first of which was commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Wolffrath, with Orders to take different Roads, and both levy Contributions and search for Provisions; the Nobles of all these Parts having abandoned their Estates and retired elsewhere.

The same Day, (June 7.) the Poles, to the Number of 4000 Horse, together with 600 Saxon Troopers, were dispatched by King Angustus to make an Attempt upon our Camp; which accordingly they did at ten o'Clock at Night, attacking the advanced Guard, and killing a Captain-Lieutenant of the Pomeranian Horse, commanded by General Mellin; but, finding more Resistance than they expected, retired full Speed in Quest of our Detachments, to whom Mr. Rheinschild had sent, to warn them to be upon their Guard: But, as Mr. Wolffrath did not receive the the Advice, he was surprized at sour o'Clock in the Morning, when returning in full March to the Camp.

The Enemy fell in first with Captain Lowisen, in the Van, and began the Attack at the same Instant; but Wolffrath coming up almost as soon to his Assistance, the Poles, who, till then, had hid the Saxons behind them, opened themselves to the Right and Lest, and, while the last advanced to the Front, surrounded the Swedes on all Sides, and obliged them to make Head every where at once.

Wolffrath, at first, made his principal Push against the Saxons, charging them no less than five Times, and having, in the Beginning, the good Fortune to repulse them; but, as the Poles fell every Time upon his Flank and Rear, and cut to Pieces Abundance of his Men, he saw no other Way to escape, but to fight his Way through Sword in Hand: Turning then all at once upon the Poles, he broke, routed them, and, rushing through the Midst, at last made a Shift to reach the Camp, with a Captain of Horse, a Cornet, and 140 Troopers, the greatest Part of whom, as well as himself, being wounded.

Mr. Rheinschild, searing the same Missortune would befal the other Detachment, ordered out immediately 300 Horse and 200 Foot to sustain Lieutenant-Colonel Rentes in Case of Need. But he had regulated his March so well, according to the Notice he had received, that the Enemy could never find an Opportunity to attack him.

These little Advantages obtained over the Swedes mightily pussed up the Confederates, who were assembled at sendemir, in favour of King Augustus; and so much the more, as Mr. Rheinschild was not strong enough to molest them. These the Nobles of Poland, who, up the Direction of Marshal Danboff, declared all those to be Rebels and Traitors to recontry, who had signed the confederacy of Warsaw, allowing them a Month's Time to return to their Duty, and declaring whoever should be proclaimed King an Usurper.

'Tis easy to imagine they did not spare the Cardinal any more than the rest; on the contrary, they sent to the Pope's Nuncio to intreat him to induce his Holiness to degrade both him and the Bishop of Pasnania, and to sequester their ecclesiastic Revenues for the Payment of the Crown-Army.

King Augustus, accompanied by fixteen Senators, being repaired to the Assembly, made a long Harangue, in which he declared himself ready to take the new Oath they demanded of him, professed an Abhorrence of all absolute Power, and promised to maintain the Laws and Liberties of the Realm. This was executed May the 23d, and was received with loud Acclamations both from the Nobles and People. The Senators and the Nobles then fwore to and figned the Confederacy, by which they all engaged to attend his Person, and then adjourned to July 1, having first sung Te Deum in the Church of Sendomir, under the Discharge of the Artillery.

The Czar likewise, on his Side, contributed greatly to keep them in Spirit by the Success of his Arms in Ingria and Livonia, which gave them Reason to hope every Thing.

Lieutenant - Colonel Maidel, who X 2 com-commanded our Troops in Finland, had frequent Bickerings, during the Winter, with the Russians, which the Czar had quartet'd Ingria at the End of the last Campaign; though our Forces, who were posted in the City. of Wibe. I the Adjacencies, were for some Time in perfect Tranquility: But this continued only till the Sea was frozen over, when (Jan. 14.) a Party of about 2000 Russians passed over an Arm of the Sea between Ingria and Finland, and fell upon an advanced Post, guarded by 60 Horse, which they several Times attacked with all imaginable Fury, but were always bravely repulsed, till they had quite furrounded our Troops; and, even then, the Officer who commanded them broke his Way through the Midst of them Sword in Hand, and happily reached Wiberg, 8 Men only being killed, and 20 wounded and taken Prisoners. The Enemy bought this Advantage very dear, and retired without attempting any Thing farther.

Some Days after, Mr. Maidel detached a Party over the Ice, who, in spite of the deep Snows, penetrated into Russia, surprized two Posts, killed Abundance of the Enemy, and returned safely with a great Number of Prisoners.

A little Time again after this, in the Month of February, 1000 Russian Horse and some Foot likewise took their Turn to cross the Sea, and, tho vigorously resisted, obliged our advanced Guard to retire: Who, being reinforced with 100 Horse from Waberg, returned to the Charge, and obliged the Enemy to repass the Ice with all possible Expedition.

The Czar now proposed to enter with confiderable Forces into Livonia. and lay liege to Narva and Dorpe and especially as Mr. Schlippenbach. being too weak to keep the Field, was obliged to withdraw under the Cannon of Revel. Accordingly he order'd all the Regiments in the Neighbourhood of Petersburg to defile towards Narva: He even enlifted the fifth Man of all the Vaffals of his Boyars. and fent out Parties continually on all Sides to reconnoitre our Troops; one of which was attacked by a little Detachment of Swedes, less in Number, but much more brave, who preffed them so vigorously, that, after losing 20 Prisoners, they were obliged to take Shelter in certain Houses, which, being immediately fet on fire, they perished in the Flames.

From the Beginning of April the Enemy had held Narva blocked up on that Side next the Sea; whence it was not without extreme Difficulty that Major General Horn threw into the City one Regiment of Foot to reinforce the Garrison: But, to prevent our doing the like again, they raised certain Batteries upon the River, which, thenceforward, cut off all Communication.

About the same Time our Vice-Admiral Prou arrived with his Squadron on the Coasts of Wiberg, and took on board 1200 Men, which General Maidel designed for Narva, together with a vast Quantity of Provisions: But, as the Russians were Marsers of the Entrance of the River, which they had beset with Batteries on both Sides, they found it impossible to reach the City; upon which they steer'd towards Revel, where they disembarked the Troops, to join those under under the Command of Schlippenbach.

In June, when there was Forage for the Horse, Mr. Maidel took the Field in Finland, with-about 4000 Foot and Cavalry; and, at the same Time, the Russians marched towards Wiborg with numerous Forces, as if they designed to undertake the Siege. But this was apparently no more than a Feint; for all at once, they wheeled about, and, having fill'd their whole Frontier with Troops, sat down before Narva, which was now totally blocked up both by Sea and Land.

In the Absence of the Czar, General Schonbek had, at first, the Direction of the Siege, but it was, afterwards, committed to Field-Marshal Ogilvi, who had been formerly in the Service of the Emperor.

As to Field-Marshal Scheremetof, the Czar had detached him towards Dorpt with another Army to render himself Master of that Place; where Colonel Charles Skytte had done his utmost to strengthen the Fortifications, and prepare for a vigorous Resistance.

As this last Siege could hardly ever fucceed, while the Swedes were Masters of the Lake Leipus, where they had 14 or 15 good Vessels, the Czar had prepared, in the Spring, a Number of armed Barks to back his Design, and attack those of ours, which, during the Winter, had been laid up in the River under the Cannon of Dorpt; but, as soon as the Season permitted, the Commander Loscher sell down the River to cruize upon the Lake, as usual; which the Russass being apprized of, they advanced with their Flotilla to the Isle of Porkazari, which is the Mouth of the Embach; from whence they advanced yet farther up the Stream, and, where it was narrowest, lined both the Shores with Infantry, through which Loscher must neceffarily pass: Who accordingly pushed on, without regarding the Preparations made for his Reception, though his Vessels could afford no Assistance to each other, nor make any Use of their Artillery against the Enemy, who were posted on very high Ground on both Sides, and from whence they killed every Man who made his Appearance upon the Deck, It became thus a very easy Task to seize them all one after another in a very little Time: When therefore the Commander was convinced of his Rashness, he blew up himfelf. together with his Vessel, which was called the Charles, that he might not be a Witness of the fatal Consequences *. Not above 200 Men of all that were on board this Fleet escaped, and even the greatest Part of them were dangerously wounded.

The Russians obtained this Victory May 4, and by it became Masters both of the Lake Peipus and the River Embach, by which they transported 8 or 9000 Men within three Leagues of Dorpt.

About the Beginning of June they made their Approaches to that Place, blocking it up on all Sides, and even ordering their Vessels up the River to distress it soom thence.

The Governor immediately fet fire to the Suburbs; and the Enemy, on the other hand, threw a great Number of Bombs and red hot Bullets into the City, to favour the Opening of the Trenches, which was done in three Places at one Time. We shall see by and by, an ample Detail of this Siege, sent to his Majesty by the Governor Colonel Skytte. The Czar repaired thither in Person; and, that nothing might be neglected at Narva, he pass'd and repass'd continually, in order to hasten both Sieges at one.

Major-General Horn was extremely folicitous to convey a Letter to Mr. Schlippenhach, to let him know how greatly he stood in need of Relief, the Siege of that City (Narva) being open'd May the 24th in Form; the Bearer of it sell into the Hands of the Enemy, which gave the Czar an Opportunity to try a Stratagem, which in part succeeded. As the Besieged were considered to ensure them into an Opinion that they were really come, in order to draw the Garrison from behind their Walls.

Accordingly, one dark Night, he detached some thousands of Men out of his Camp, whom he habited in blue like the Swedes, and ordered them to appear the next Day about two o'Clock in the Afternoon, at a certain Distance from the City, from whence they made certain Vollies by Way of Signal, as directed in the Letter. In Answer to which, Mr. Horn, not doubing but that they were the Reinforcement he expected, discharged two Pieces of Cannon; upon which they advanced towards the City, and feigned an Engagement with the advanced Guards of the Besiegers; who, feeming to be greatly alarmed, struck their Tents, and withdrew the advanced Guard, which they had posted on that Side next the City. In short, they did all that was necessary to convince the Besieged that they were preparing for an Action. The two Armies then advanced towards each other, first discharging their Cannon, and then their small Arms; and, aster continuing a brisk Fire for some Time, the Russians seem'd to give way, and tend towards the Bridge, which was over the River, for their Preservation.

Mr. Horn, being then convinced of the Arrival of the Swedes, detached, in the Heat of the Combat, Colonel Morat with 150 Horse, and Colonel Loode with 800 Foot, to sustain the Troops which he thought were come to his Assistance, and concluded to be already victorious. Certain Citizens, who believed they were rather going to reap the Fruits of a Conquest, than a Battle, likewise followed the Detachment, which soon fell into an Ambuscade, that lay in wait to receive them.

The Cavalry, being foremost, saved the Infantry, and were all cut to Pieces, or taken Prisoners; in the Number of which were a Lieutenant-Colonel, two Captains, and some other Officers. But Colonel Loode, who commanded the Infantry, having discovered the Snare betimes, retired with all Speed to the City with his 800 Men, without losing one by the Way; where he gave the Governor to understand what had happened, and that he had no Succours to expect.

This Disappointment, however, did not abate his Courage; he resolved to defend himself to the last Extremity, often making vigorous Sallies to incommode commode the Besiegers, and burning, at Times, all the Houses in the Suburbs, as well as all the Trees and Bushes that could afford them any Cover.

This Affair having thus answer'd the Expectation of the Czar; and that Prince being inform'd, on the other Side, that Major-General Schlippenbach was posted between Revel and Narus, in a Place called Lesna in Weyerland, with three Regiments of Horse and Dragoons, which amounted in all but to 1400, he commanded Colonel Renne with 8000 to dislodge them from that Post. The Swedes at first retired; but the Russian Commander having overtaken them (June 16th) between Wittens and Tillejogi, they were obliged to face about and come to an Engagement.

Schlippenbach defended himself with Abundance of Bravery; but, as the Rushans were greatly superior in Number, and he perceived they began to furround him, in order to cut off his Retreat, he thought it necessary to prevent them, and retire without Loss of Time: But, whatever Efforts he made, he could not avoid being totally defeated: not above 200 Horse making their Escape, and the rest being all dispersed, killed, or taken Prisoners, among which last was Colonel Fritz. Wachsmeister. Renne returned strait to Narva, the Journal of which Siege we shall see hereaster.

The King of Sweden, having now formed the Plan of the Campaign, prepared to open it forthwith. His Troops quitted their Winter-Quarters which they had held in the Bishoprick of Warnia and Polish Prussia; and, for the better Regulation of his March, his Majesty took his Rout from Hielf-berg, thro' the City of Melsach, where the Regiments of Guards was posted, in order to make Elbing and the other Quarters in his Way. The Princes of Saxe Gotha and Wirtemberg accompanied him, and, finding all the Regiments in good Condition, he ordered the whole Army to decamp forthwith.

Count Piper, together with the Court and the Drabans, commanded by Count Charles Wrangel, Colonel, during the Absence of Lieutenant-General Arwid Horn received Orders to proceed strait on to Polond, thro' the Territories of Brandenbourg. These Troops marched the first Day (June she 12th, 4 Leagues,) as far as Ottendorf, the 13th through the City of Wirtemberg to Schavaden, the 14th to Butrin, a Village on the Frontiers of Brandenbourg, the 15th, traversing the said Fontier, through the City of Janowa, towards the Village of Schembrofski, where they rested one Day, the 16th; proceeding the 17th to Krzyvanowa, and from thence the 18th to Prasnicz.

The Regiment of Foot-Guards and that of Horse took the same Road, but the other Troops different ones, which hindered them from joining all on the same Side of the Vistula.

The King repaired to the Head-Quarters at Prasnicz, after having ordered the March of the whole Army, and rid above an hundred Leagues in a few Days. From hence his Majesty (June 20th) advanced to Cziecanowa, the 21st to Novamiasto, whence he led the Way the 22d to Zalkroizin, a Village upon the Visula, in order to chuse a commodious Place for passing over his Troops. The same Day the Court and the Drabans marched to the Village of Muttelin, where the Bug discharges itself into the Vistula. At this Place the King halted for some Days, and, after all the Baggage had passed over in Prames, his Majesty (June 25.) followed with the Drabans, and marched to Tratzowa, sour Leagues from Warsaw.

When General Horn had received Advice of the King's Approach, he fet out to meet him, and communicate the present Posture of Affairs, with whom his Majesty repaired to Warsaw, where he gave Audience to the Cardinal-Primate, to Prince Lubomirski, Grand General, and many other Senators: With the Primate, in particular, he had a long Conference on the Perfon he recommended to be elected King.

All Things were already ripe for that august Ceremony. The Deputies of the Provinces and Palatinates of the Confederacy arrived at Warsaw the last Month. The Assembly was open'd June the 9th with a solemn Mass and a Sermon, after which they repaired to the Field of Election, where were present the Cardinal-Primate, Grand General Lubomirski, the Grand Treafurer Sapieba, the Palatines of Posnania, Siradia, and Lancicia, together with his Son; the Crown Cup-Bearer, and the Grand Marshal of the Confederacy, with the Deputies.

The Starost Bronitz, Marshal of the Confederacy, had been unanimously declared Marshal of the Diet of Election, and the Session, after some Debates, put off to the 16th, when several foreign Princes, already mention'd, were proposed, but all as soon rejected; the Confederates being resolved to give no Ear to any but a Piaße; and the greatest Part of them declaring in Behalf of the young Palatine of Posnania, whose Election our Commissaries had Orders to support to the utmost.

The Cardinal had feigned, till then, that he would not oppose him, waiting the Conclusion of the Marriage of young Towianski, with the Daughter of Prince Lubomirski, and which the Palatine of Posnania labour'd to accomplish, in hope, by that Means, to win Lubomirski over to his Party, as believing himself already secure of the Cardinal.

But, notwithstanding all this, as soon as these Nuptials were solemnized at Warsaw, his Eminence pulled off the Mask, and declared openly he had never any Intentions of contributing any Way to the Elevation of the Palatine to the Throne; though he had before proposed him to Mr. Horn; who was so shocked at this Dealing of the Cardinal's, that he expressed himself upon the Occasion, at a Conserence held some Days after, in the most pointed Terms, which put an End to all farther Harmony between them.

This, however, did not hinder the Cardinal from labouring openly for Prince Lubomirski; nor could the Inflances of Prince Sobieski, who interested himself vigorously for the Palatine, nor the considerable Offers made by the last to Madam Towianski, Cousin and intimate Friend to the Prelate, nor, in short, all the Endeavours of others, engage him to alter his Sentiments.

As, moreover, the Marshal of the Diet greatly inclined to fide with Labonirski and the Cardinal, he knew so well how to manage Matters with the Adherents of that Party, that they flarted continual Difficulties, and spun out several Sessions, without coming to any Conclusion at all.

It was at this Juncture the King of Sweden arrived, and demanded inflantly their proceeding to the Choice of a new King, recommending, at the same Time, the Palatine of Posnazia to be exalted to the Throne. Some Days after which (June 29) his Majesty having drawn the Army to Blonia, nearer Warsaw, that Neighbourhood, and his peremptory Declaration for the Palatine, struck a Terror into the contrary Party.

The Cardinal then applied himself, by all imaginable Means, to defer the Election till the Arrival of Lubomirski, Brother of the Great General, and Chamberlain to the Crown, who was on the Road with some thousands of Poles; in hope that, if he was present at the Election, he might be able to carry his Point by a Plurality of Voices.

On the other hand, the Palatine's Party, perceiving the Intention of the Cardinal, made such lively and effectual Remonstrances, that the 2d of July was fixed for the Election, without admitting the least Mention of any farther Delay. In the Interval, however, the Cardinal and Grand General was importuned incessantly to give up their Pretensions, and repair to the Field of Election, but without effect; they pretended Indisposition, to excuse themselves, and demanded continually to have the Nomination postponed to the 4th, because, by that Time, they expected the Arrival of the Chamberlain.

On Saturday, the Day appointed for the Election, the Bishop of Posnania, the Constables of Bresz, Cujava, Radzious, Czer/k, and Inowlodaw, with all the Nobility, repair'd to Kolo, the Field appointed for that Ceremony, about 3 o'Clock in the Afternoon. which, the first Step that was taken was to fend Deputies yet once more to the Cardinal, the Grand General, the Palatines of Posnania, Siradia, Lancicia, and Podlachia, with an Invitation to join them. But the Cardinal continued stedfast to his first Proposal of deferring the Election to the Day following; Prince Lubomirski, who was with the Cardinal, did the same, and both promised, on that Condition, to be present at the Assembly.

The Palatine of Lancicia and the Constable of Plosko declared to the like Purpose. Those of Siradia and Podlachia excused themselves on Account of their Instrmities, and added, they would approve of all that should be done. The Palatine of Posnania alone repaired to the Assembly, followed by the Gentlemen of his Party.

After the Deputies had made their Report, the Marshal of the Election, in Support of the Party of Lubomirski, did not fail to represent how much Precipitation was to be feared in a Choice of such Importance; that there was yet much remaining of the Term prefixed for that Ceremony; that it was not usual to proceed to the 'Election till towards the Close of that Term; that, by waiting a little longer, the Deputies of the Palatinates of the Realm might yet arrive, and, by their Presence, render the Election more legitimate; and finally that, to render it in all Respects authentick, it Y would would be unpardonable, for a few Days, more or less, to overlook the Representations of the Primate and the principal Lords of the Realm.

On the contrary, those, who sided with the Palatine of Posnania, easily perceiving the Drift of their Antagonists, refuted, in the amplest Manner, the Reasons which had been alledged; and made it appear with great Force, that, in the present Situation of the Republick, they had not a Moment to hesitate; that all Delay was to be extremely feared; that Customs, perhaps very dubious in their Natures, were not to be deemed Laws; especially in Poland, where the Republick had Power over the Laws themselves, and could change them at Pleasure; that they did not conceive what End these Demurs could answer, unless to fet the whole Realm in a Flame; that, as to his Eminence and Prince Lubomirski, they had nothing to reproach themselves with, having used all honest and fair Means to reduce them to Reafon; and lastly, that they knew not what to make of their Conduct, which appeared so much the more extraordinary to the Confederates, as it was vifibly contrary to their good Intentions.

Upon this the Debate grew more and more vehement, and lasted even to Sun-set. As the Swedish Commissaries had great Reason to sear they would again postpone the Election till another Time, they made their utmost Efforts to win over their Opponents, as well by the Arguments they urged, as by their Entreaties and Exhortations.

They were well supported by the Bishop of Posnania, who belought the Assembly to have no Regard to the Absent, nor to the Sentiments of the Senators, who were for electing Prince James Sobieski, because his Confinement put it out of his Power to accept of the Crown. Upon which certain Persons threw up their Bonnets into the Air, and cried out, Vivat STANISLAUS Rex! But almost at the same Instant certain others, who were the Deputies from Podlachia, put in their Protests to that Election, by as loudly interposing a Nieposvolem.

Mr. Jeralski, in particular, one of these Opponents, took Occasion to fay he would never confent to that Election, at least till the Treaty was figned and concluded with Sweden: to which he added many other Reasons to justify his Dissent: But all this ferv'd only to excite great Clamours against him, and to renew the Acclamations in favour of the Palatine of Posnania. At last the Bishop of that Place, having first signified, that those who would not give their Voices had nothing to do but to withdraw, proclaimed Stanislaus King of Poland acaccording to the following Form: In nomine Domini nomino Regem Poloniæ & Magnum Ducem Lilbuanie, STA-NISLAUM LESCINSKI, & precor, &c.

The new King, at the same Instant mounting on Horseback, during the incessant Discharge of Muskets and Pistols, and while their Bonnets slew into the Air, was conducted about 9 o'Clock at Night towards the Cathedral, where the Bishop of Posnania confirmed him before the Altar, as was customary, by repeating the Vivat three Times; after which the Te Deum was song, and a predigious Multiude of People shouted forth their

Digitized by Goog Acclama-

Acclamations, as common upon such Occasions.

'Tis easy to judge how deafening these were to the Ears of the Cardinal and Lubomirski; who, feeing it would he fruitless now to oppose the Election any longer, came immediately to acknowledge the true King. A little after which the Chamberlain Lubomirski arrived at Pragg with 60 Polish Companies. He had already fent, when some Leagues off, an Express to Lieutenant-Colonel Claes Bonde, who was posted in that Place with an hundred Horse, to demand an Escort of some hundreds of Men to guard him fafe to Warfaw, a Saxon Party being continually at his Heels. Bonde immediately repaired to him with the few he had, and conducted him in Security to his Journey's End; where he had the Mortification to be informed the Election was over, and that he had nothing to do but make his Submission, according to the Example of others; which he did immediately, and paid his Compliments to the new King; as the Ladies, on the other hand, did to the new Queen.

The King of Sweden, who had not flirred out of Blonia, was, that Night, about 11 o'Clock, agreeably furprized, by his Page Klinkowstrom, with the News of the Election of King Staniflaus, who did not fail to notify it in Form to his Swedish Majesty the next Morning, and instantly received in Return a Letter of Felicitation, equally polite and affectionate: After which both the Kings mounted on Horseback to meet each other half way, where, having embraced with all the Tokens of the most perfect Friendship, they entered into close Conference for feveral Hours, none but Count Piper being present, to deliberate on the most effectual Means to re establish the Peace of Poland, and for ever remove their common Enemy, King Augustus.

The Confederates had importunately demanded, a long Time before, and during the Election, that the King of Sweden should enter into Alliance with them; and his Majesty had not only promised it, but had already entered into a Negotiation with them, with Assurance that, when the Election should be made, he would put the last Hand to it. As, therefore, he was always tender of his Word, he did not fail to nominate three Embassadors immediately to treat with the new King and the Republick; which were Lieutenant. General Arwid Horn, as first ... the Embassy, the Secretary of Wachslager, who had been long and dent in the Court of Poland, and war, de Palmberg, Vice-Prefident of the Tribunal of Dorpt.

The necessary Instructions were likewise dispatched as fast as possible, for their Conduct to the new King, and for concluding a firm Alliance with Poland.

It will not perhaps be disagreeable to insert here the following Piece, writ by Mr. Wachslager some Days after the Election,

An Extract from a French Letter from Mr. Wachslager, Secretary of State, to Mr. Adlerfelt, who was then at Blonia, and who had put several Questions to him on the Situation of Affairs at the Eection.

HEN it was thought proper to put a Period to the Interregnum, and proceed to the Election of a new King, the royal House of Sodieski was at first preferred to all others. But, after the Confinement of Prince James, and the obstinate Refusal of Prince Alexander to accept a Crown, which he thought would be of Thorns, and might perhaps be purchased with the Loss of his Brothers, many foreign Princes were talked of at Warsaw, as I acquainted you yesterday; but to no Purpose; the Confederates being resolved to have none but a Piaste, and having the King to support them in it.

The first of which upon the List was Opalinski, on whom they had already cast their Eyes. He was extremely rich, but, at the same Time, odious to all the World for his Avarice; over and above which, he died when he was talked of most.

The Cardinal then proposed several other Piastes; and, in a Conversation with General Horn, particularized Prince Lubomirski and the Palatine of Poinania; of which the General having informed his Majesty, he received Instructions to support the latter, as the most worthy and best inclined. Eminency afterwards seemed disposed to retract what he had faid, not denying, 'tis true, that ever be named him, but asserting be nominated bim as the last and youngest of the two. But he was given to understand, that be was the most agreeable to the King, as well for his Capacity, as for his Birth and eminent Qualities, and likewise that he was favoured by the Deputies of Great Poland.

The Alliance between the Houses of Radzieowski and Lubomirski, by the Marriage of Towianski with the Daughter of the last, had induced the Cardinal to espouse the same Interest; and it was even believed, that, if his Eminency had facceeded, the Office of Crown-General had fallen to the Share of Towianski.

As to the rest, the Election was made July the 2d; and it was endeavour'd even to have brought it on sooner, but without Effect. The Deputies of Podlachia only dissented; who neverthelessdeclared openly, they did not disapprove the Choice of Stanislaus, but could not agree to an Election on that Day, especially as the Cardinal and several other Senators had promised to assist at the Assembly the Monday following; maintaining, that, as those Persons were absent, the Action was both deprived of its Lustre, and was deficient in Form. Nevertheless, they afterwards came over unanimously, and by their solemn Accession gave as much Force to the Election, as if all those Lords had assisted in Person.

After all was fettled entirely to his Majesty's Satisfaction, he took Leave of King Stanislaus, in the same Place where they had their first Interview.

July 9. Charles decamped from Blonin, and gave Orders to all his Regiments to march towards Javigoft, where General Rheinschild was likewise to post himself the 14th with his Army, which which set out in the Evening from Bozekow, and marched through Bidzini.

But first General Rheinschild detached Lieutenant Colonel Zulich with the Cavalry towards Sendomir, from whence King Augustus had retired so precipitately towards Jaroslaw, that he lest behind him a Magazine well surnished, of which Mr. de Zulich render'd himself Master.

His Majesty's first Day's March was from from Blonia to Mezanow, where the Army rested one Day; after which (June 11.) they proceeded to Bialla, the 12th to Novamiasto on the River of Putze, where they again rested one Day. The 14th they marched on to Przystik, from thence the 15th and 16th through the City of Radom to Cobillani, the 18th to Zerwona, the 19th to Borrga, then to Wilnutow, and lastly to Sendomir the 23d, where his Majesty order'd a Bridge to be immediately thrown over the Vistula, in order to join the Army under General Rheinschild at Javigost, which had been in that City ever fince the 14th, as before mentioned.

During these Transactions, our Embassadors at Warsaw made the necesfary Preparations for receiving their publick Audience of King Stanislaus; and, after all was agreed upon with respect to the Ceremonial, which was observed on that Occasion, the 19th of July was fixed for the publick Entry, which was made in the following Manner.

The Ambassadors, being repair'd to the Cloister of the Carmelites in the Suburbs of Leczna, on the Side of the new City, were there received and complimented by three Senators, which were the Palatine of Siradia. and the Constables of Inowladislau and Plesko. They were attended thither by the King's Equipages, and a great Number of the Coaches of the Nobility, that were fent to accompany the Ambassadors; which last were seated in the King's Coach of State, together with the Senators, who fat in the Boot: And Mr. Albedbyl, Marshal of the Embassy, being mounted on Horseback, before the Coach, the Procession began towards the Palace, accompanied by a great Number of the Nobility, both in Coaches and on Horseback. Before the Gates of the City. a Party of Cavalry, belonging to the Crown-army, were ranged in one Line, and those of the Grand General in another, between which the Embasfadors passed to the Sound of Drums. Trumpets, and other martial Musick. The Streets of the City were linea by the Grand General's Infantry. In the outer Court of the Palace the Cardinal's Guard was drawn up. In the inner Court 200 Swedes appeared under Arms: and the Balconies of the Palace were filled with Musicians.

When the Embassadors had quitted the Coach, they were complimented at the Foot of the Stair-case by Mr. Poninski. Master of the Horse and Marshal to his Majesty. The Senators before named waited upon them up Stairs, and at the same Time gave them the upper hand. At the first Entrance above, Prince. Lubomirski. the Grand Chamberlain, received them, and conducted them through the Guard-chamber of the Drabans, as far as his Majesty's Apartment, where the Great Treasurer of Lithuania and Count Sapieba, who officiated as Chancellor, received them; and when the King, who was under a Canopy of Crimson Velvet, observed them entering, he advanced some Paces towards them, and immediately after returned to his Place. The Embassadors then ranged themselves abreast opposite to his Majesty, and put on their Hats; after which General Horn. the first in the Commission, began his Speech in Latin, and, at the Conclusion, presented his Letters of Credence to his Majesty. Count Sapieba replied in Latin likewise to the General in Behalf of the King.

After the Audience was over, the Embassadors repaired, with the Senators, to the Queen's Apartment, to whom Mr. de Horn made likewise a Compliment in Latin, it being the Language used in Poland, even to their Queens, upon a first Audience. At their Entrance their Excellencies were covered; but, when the General began his Speech, they put off their Hats in Complaisance to the Sex. The Suffragan of Gnesna, Chancellor to the Queen, returned her Majesty's Reply, which was in Latin, as well as the former.

The Embassadors then waited on Madam Royal, the Mother of the King, but unattended by the Senators, who received them at the Entrance of her third Apartment, the Treasurer Sapieba leading her by the Hand; they were then conducted to three Elbow Chairs, where being seated, they conversed for some Time in French; and, when they took their Leave, were received by the same Senators in the Hall, which leads to the King's Apartment, and conducted to the Stair-soot, from whence they returned with the same Train as before.

Immediately after this Audience the Conferences began in the Place appointed, and the Foundations were laid of a folid and lasting Peace and strict Alliance between the Realms of Sweden and Poland. The Polish Commissaries being the Bishop of Posnania, Prince Lubomirski Grand General, the Palatines of Siradia and Podlachia, the Constable of Inowladishau, Mr. Poninski, Deputy-Master of the Horse, and feveral others, who laboured in carnest to put the last Hand to the Treaty.

It was before remarked, that Major-General Lowenbaupt had marched with fome thoulands of Men into Lithuania to support the Confederacy, and to render it agreeable to the Nobility, and after what Manner he afterwards returned towards the Frontiers of Courland.

Count Sapieba, Grand General of Lithuania, then judged it necessary for his Interests, instead of following his Majesty, as he had done till then, to march with his Troops into that Province, in order to join Lowenbaupt. Accordingly he fet out, while the King was yet in his Winter-quarters at Heilsberg, and pass'd through Prussia in his Way to Courland. But Prince Wisniowiski had no sooner received Intelligence of his Motion, but he affembled all his Troops to hinder his Junction with the Swedes; and, marching Night and Day with all posfible Diligence through Roads little frequented, he came within two Leagues of Sapieba before he had the least Notice of his March.

Notwithstanding which, as Count Lowenbaupt, who was well served by his Spies, had received Information of it Time enough to reinforce Sapieba with 600 Horse, Wisniowiski, though above 4000 strong, had not Courage enough to make the Attack, but returned the Way he came towards Birsen, to be within Reach of Oginski and the Muscovites. By which Means Count Lowenbaupt had Opportunity to join Sapieba at his Leisure, in a Place called Wobotnicki; and, having afterwards received a Reinforcement of certain Infantry from Riga, resolved to go in Quest of the Enemy.

But Wisniowiski and Oginski apprehending his Approach, kept themfelves carefully on their Guard, and retired into Lithuania towards the City of Cauna. We pursued them however for feveral Days, tho' to no Purpose; except that our Fore-runners, now and then, fell in with their Rear, of whom they killed feveral, made 50 or 60 Prisoners, and seized certain Carriages, in which were fome thoufands of Polish Florins, with the Chancery of Oginski, by which we discovered his Correspondence with the Muscovites; as will appear from the following Letter, dated at Poniewies, from Count Lowenbaupt to Secretary Diepenbrook, who was then at Mittau.

SIR. CINCE our March from Wobotnicki, it bas been impossible for me to write to you, baving been ever fince in Pursuit of the Enemy's Army, under the Command of Messieurs Wisniowiski and Oginski: And never did Hare make more Speed to escape the Hounds, than these Gentlemen have done, through Marshes and Roads almost impracticable, to avoid being forced into an Enregement with our Troops, though greatly inferior in Number. Certain of our Fore-runners bave nevertheless made above 50 of them Prisoners, together with almost as many Horses, some Carriages, and a Sum of about 10,000 Polish Franks in Money: Besides which, we bave seized the Papers of Oginfki, among which are some of great Confequence, especially the Copy of a private Treaty between Lithuania and the Czar against our Sovereign; and certain Muscovite Letters, of which we understand nothing, as having no hody here to interpret them.

At present the Enemy is near Birsen. endeavouring to persuade the Muscovites, their only Hope, to join them, which last were the Day before Yesterday making their Terms with them, first scrutinizing into the Number and Goodness of Wisniowiski's Infantry, and then insisting on an Oath from all the Generals, Officers, and even Soldiers of the Army, not to defert them on any Emergency whatever; as if Fear would not break through all the Oaths that could be invented, or God bad not Power to render them fruitless. We are obliged to wait their Resolves; and, if they venture to attack us, I hope, through the divine Assistance, we shall be able to give a good Account of them. I am, &c.

P. S. Great Numbers of Deserters flock to us daily; and the last Comers give us to understand, that the Enemy expett every Hour a new Reinforcement of Muscovites: But that gives us no Apdrehensions; for the good God, in whom we conside, will be our Saseguard. If Major-General Schlippenbach could make a Diversion in Livonia, it would be a very great Assistance; for then we might be almost certain, with the Help of Heaven, to master both Wisniowiski and the Muscovites of Birsen. You would do well in sending a Copy of this Letter to the King's Chancery.

Mr. de Lowenbaupt, believing it no longer of any Importance to follow an Enemy, who fled with such Precipitation to avoid the Encounter, halted; to fee if it would give them Spirit to make the Attack themselves. But

Digitized by Goog Painski

Oginski had only made this Tour from Cauno to Birsen to solicit Succours from the Czar. Provoked at the Triumph of the Sapiebas his Enemies, he never once hesitated to draw into his Country, already ruined by his private Quarrels, the Forces of a Prince, which he would be obliged to subsist; tho the Reslection was so natural, that the Province must suffer more from the Muscovites than the Swedes, because the last were so much sewer in Number.

During this Interval, Count'Sapieba convened an Assembly of the Nobles at Poniewies, to induce them to accept the Confederacy of Warsaw; and he had the Pleasure to see many of them give their Affent accordingly.

Wisniowiski, on the other hand, did the same in one of the Cities of Lithuania, where he assembled the Nobles to accede to the Decree of the Diet of Lublin; having it principally in View to enseeble the first Assembly by this Division of the Nobility: And his Design had such fatal Success, that, from this Time, their Animosities arose even to a dreadful Pitch of Inhumanity; each Party in turn treating the other with all imaginable Cruelty, as often as Opportunity offer'd, as will appear by the following Example.

Count Zawiska, Starost of Minsko, having been detached by Count Sapieba with 900 Men, marched about the Middle of June, with great Secresy, through vast Woods and Places little known, towards Druga, to ruin a Magazine which the Muscovites had established there; which he succeeded in, and at the same Time surprized 500 Horse and 200 Dragoons, the greatest Part of whom were put to the Sword.

Wisniewiski and Oginiki had, at last, sinished their Bargain with the Muscovites, after using all manner of Expedients to induce them to it; the last not caring to have any Thing to do with a Nation, which abandoned its Allies in the greatest Extremities, nay even in the Heat of Battle, as was evident from all their past Conduct. The Lithuanians therefore were obliged upon Oath to combat like Men, and trust to their Heels for Sasety no more.

After having thus united their Forces, they resolved to lay Siege to Seelburg, an old Castle in the Country of Semigaile, upon the Frontiers of Courland, in which was a Garrison of Swedes; where being arrived to the Number of 14 or 15 thousand Men of both Nations, they continued before it ten Days, and then prepared for an Assault.

In the mean while the Counts Sapieba and Lowenbaupt advanced to raise the Siege with all their Troops; and those of Sapieba had the good Fortune to take 300 Carriages on the March, which had been sent under a strong Escort from Birsen to the Lithuanian Camp before Seelburg; the Plunder consisting of an entire Service of Plate, a Sum of Silver Coin, and a large Quantity of Powder and Ball.

The Enemies were no sooner advertised of the Approach of our little Army, and the Advantage which we had obtained upon the Road, but they raised the Siege, and retired in Haste beyond the Frontier; insomuch that, when our Troops came before the

Place,

Place, they found no Signs of them, but the Ladders and other Necessaries of a Siege, which they had left behind, Sepieba and Lowenbaups however followed the Chace immediately, and, at a Place called Jacobs-stadt, two Leagues from Seelburg, obliged them to face about, and come to Action.

Mr. de Lowenbaupt attacked them first, after having ranged the Troops of Sapieba behind them to cover his Rear; when the Lithuanians, without once recollecting their Oath, made off instantly with the utmost Precipitation, leaving the Muscovitas to shift for themselves as well as they could; who, having been joined that very Day by a considerable Reinforcement of Dragoons, and amounting in all to about 5000 Men, stood their Ground for some Time with Abundance of Obstinacy, but were at last obliged to give way, and abandon the Field of Battle. The Troops of Sapisba then did Wonders, in flaughtering those who could not defend themselves, which they continued to do till Night put a Stop to the Execution; in which Time the Enemy lost about 3000 Men.

Mr. de Lowenbaupt took all their Baggage, their Cannon, together with their Trophies, and a great Number of Prisoners, among which were several Swedes, whom the Enemy had carried into Slavery, and for some Time led about with them. Oginski, after this Deseat, which he could not recover for a long Time, repaired to the Czar, who was still wholly taken up with the Siege of Narva, which advanced every Day, tho' the Enemy had not yet begun to bombard that City.

In the mean while Vice-Admiral de Prow, whose Fleet consisted of one Ship of the Line, five Frigates, five Brigantines, and a Fire-ship, undertook to ruin the Works which the Enemy had raised in an Island called Rutifari, situated between Ingria and Finland, about four Leagues from Petersburg.

The Czar, finding the Situation of that Island very advantageous for covering his new Residence (of which this might be consider'd as the Outwork and Barrier, because it lock'd up. as one may fay, the Entrance of the Neva, leaving open but one single Passage for Ships to the South, that to the North being impracticable for want of Depth) had already erected there certain Batteries; and, preparing to build, on a Bank of Sand, separated from the Passage above-mentioned, a Castle, known since by the Name of Cranflet, he had posted there all his Fleet, confisting of 42 Gallies, 7 Frigates, and many other Vessels, to cover the Works as they went on.

Advice of this new Enterprize of the Czar being foun conveyed to Sweden, and it being aiready foreseen of what dangerous Censequence this Fortress would prove to us, if an early Attempt was not made to take Possession both of the Streight and the Island itself: but, which is hardly to be accounted for, no Supply of Forces was fent to the Vice-Admiral, to enable him the more effectually to execute a Design of fuch vast Importance. This however did not deter him from making the Experiment with his little Squadron in the Month of June, but without Success, because of the strong Batteries \mathbf{Z} which which the Enemy had raised, and the great Fire which was made upon him from all the Russian Vessels.

Not discouraged with this Disappointment, he embark'd on board his Ships a thousand Men, which were under the Command of Lieutenant-General Maidel at Systerbeck, again set Sail, July the 15th, towards Rutisari; and at his Arrival finding but 1500 Men left to defend the new Works, the Castle not yet finished, and the Rushan Fleet absent, landed his Troops, and attacked the Enemy so briskly, that he first dislodged them, and then routed them entirely, feizing upon all their Cannon, and taking Prisoners all that had escaped the Edge of the Sword. The Attack was begun by Lieutenant General Rose and Major Leyen.

Some time after this, the Czar having fent out his Parties on the Side of Wyberg to observe Mr. de Maidel, one of them confishing of 2000 Horse and 200 Horse Grenadiers, made an Attempt on that General's Camp at Prayer-time, in Hope to take his Troops unprovided. But they greatly deceived themselves; Mr. de Maidel giving them fo warm a Reception, that, after a short Contest, tho' sufficiently bloody, he put them entirely to Flight, and held them in Chace with the Sword over their Heads almost as far as Nyen; but, before they reached that Place, they faced about within a little Quarter of a League of a Defile. and made a Stand to dispute the Pas-Sage, but were again so vigorously attacked, that they retired in great Confusion under the Cannon of one of their Men of War, which lay near the Fortreis.

Mr. de Maidel then saw himself obliged to give over the Pursuit, greatly chagrined that he could make no Attempt on the Fort of Nyen, for Want of Vessels to pass the River; but, before he returned, set Fire to several little Magazines, as well on the Side of Noteburg, as on the River towards Petersburg.

The City of Dorpt now faw itselfunder a Necessity of surrendering to the Czar. As the Besiegers had kept their Cannons and Mortars continually in play, both Houses and Churches were laid in Ruins, and two large Breaches appeared in the Walls. The Besieged, on the other hand, had neglected nothing that could preserve the Place, and give his Majesty Time to send them Succours, having even made some Sallies, tho with little Success,

July 13th the Ruffians made their Assault, and met with a Resistance as vigorous as the Attack: But, in the End, the Besieged being overpowered by Numbers, and the Enemy ledged under the very Gates of the City, the Governor, Colonel Charles Gustavus Skytte, was obliged to capitulate, as we shall see more amply in the Detail of the Siege, written by himself.

April 16th, Commodore Loscher de Hertzselt received Orders from Major-General Schlippenbach to fit out his Squadron, and be ready to enter the Peipus to observe the Enemy.

May 3. the Commodore, being now εquipt, sailed out of the Road of Dorpt. The Russians were two Leagues from the Mouth of the River of Embach, near an Island called Porkazari, by which the Commodore was obliged to pass in his Way to the Lake Peipus. As that Officer then entertained his Friends

Friends on board his Ship, and at every Bumper discharged his Cannon, the Enemy, who heard the Report, advanced to engage him; and he, on the other hand, having been advised of it, made as much Haste to meet them; but, being intoxicated with Wine, began the Action with all the Rashness imaginable, in a narrow Part of the River, three Leagues from Dorpt, where the Ships could be of no Assistance to each other; by which Means the Enemy, who had lined the high Shores on both Sides with Infantry, made themselves Masters of the whole Fleet, Ship after Ship.

The 4th, between fix and seven in the Morning, the Russans had taken 14 Vessels; upon which the Commodore, determined not to survive his Missortune, set Fire to the Powder, and blew himself and his Ship up into the Air: After which the Enemy landed 9000 Men three Leagues from Dorpt.

June 2d, the Enemy advanced to Kirimpal, where they began to throw a Bridge over the River: This I endeavour'd to prevent, by fending thither feveral Detachments to harrass them; which not being strong enough to compel them to desist, were obliged to return to the City.

The 5th, the Enemy sat down before Dorpt, and invested it from the Lands of Kopkoja to those of Tannenbof and Mublenbof, and across the River as far as those of Hasselau.

The 6th, the Fleet advanced up the Embach, and I order'd the Suburbs to be burnt.

The 11th, the Enemy compleated a Battery on the other Side of the Em-bach, near the Gallows, and pushed the Trench with Vigour.

The 14th, the Enemy began, towards the Evening, to throw their Bombs from a Battery of eight Mortars, making thirty-four single Discharges in all.

The 15th, they threw twenty seven Bombs, and opened their Trenches before the German and Russian Gates.

The 16th, they threw but eighteen Bombs.

The 17th, a Day of Fasting and Prayer, they threw but few Bombs.

The 18th, the like.

The 19th, they began to fire with great Violence, throwing no less than 200 Bombs, which damaged Abundance of Houses, and more especially the Swedish Church.

The same Day the Enemy finished their Bridge over the Embach, near Quistendabl, and pushed the Attack vigorously in several Places at once: that is to say, from the Camp near Rathshof on the Road of Narva, to the East of the City from the Embach, where they carried on their Approaches towards that Side of the City, which extends from the Pinoterne to that of Ruffia, and from thence to the German Gate; 2. Behind the Lands of Kopkoja, and on the Road to Riga to the South of the City from the Embach; from whence they drew a Line towards: a Place called Mistberg, battering continually the fecond, third, and fourth Bistions, and endeavouring to advance under the new Counterscarp; 2. To the North of the Ciry, near the Village of Jebelfer, proceeding on to the West of the Embeck, and pushing the Z 2 · Trench Trench on the Side of the fifth Bastion and St. James's Gate.

The 20th and 21st, the Enemy, threw above five hundred Bombs.

The 22d, they threw three hundred eighty two more, which damaged the Magazine and the German Church.

From the 23d to the 24th, towards Noon, they threw one hundred fixty feven Bombs, beside red-hot Bullets.

The 24th, they had carried on their Approaches from the Quarter of Tekelfer to within thirty Paces of St. James's Gate, where they erected a Battery.

The 25th, they cannonaded the fifth Bastion furiously, and threw eighty four Bombs, and the next Day two hundred and forty more.

The 27th, we fired with great Violence on both Sides.

By the 28th we had eighty Soldiers and about an hundred Burghers and Peafants killed, and were almost buried among the ruined Houses; which afforded a dreadful Spectacle, and became yet more calamitous, as I had no other Lodgings ready even for the Reception of the poor wounded. This did not however prevent my giving Orders for a Sally from St. James's Gate, which was made at Midnight, the 28th or 29th, under the Conduct of Lieutenant-Colonel Brandt.

We at first killed near 200 of the Enemy, and made them give Ground; but, as my Orders were not punctually obeyed, it was not possible either to dislodge them, or ruin their Approaches, as I had imagined. Brands there lost his Life, with two Captains, two Captain-Lieutenants, three Enfigns, and thirty Soldiers; and two Captains were taken Prisoners.

The 29th, we buried the Dead of both Sides; but they pour'd in their Bombs all Night long.

The 30th, they discharged one hundred and thirty Bombs.

The 2d, they threw eighty four.

The 3d, they threw a great Number of red-hot Balls, which burned feveral Houses.

The 4th, 5th, and 6th, they continued quiet.

The 7th, they began to make a Breach with twenty-five great Pieces of Cannon, on the Gate of Ruffia, and on the Wall which led to Pinotorn. They fired likewife with fix more on the Gate of St. James, and on the fifth Baftion; throwing at the fame Time a great Number of Bombs, from fifteen Mortars, planted in different Places. All which the Enemy continued without Intermission till the 13th; and it was my Care, in the mean while, to repair the Breaches incessantly, which was incessantly made.

The 12th, the Enemy drew out a Ditch from the Approaches of Tekelfer, as far as the Embach, by the Help of which they advanced under a Halfmoon, which had been raised before the Gate of Russia, and which was wholly ruined by their Batteries.

The 13th, they fired with incredible Fury, and threw a great Number of Bombs. At half an Hour after fix in the Evening, I observed the Enemy prepared to make an Assault on the Half-moon, which, as mentioned before, lay in Ruins, and gave proper Orders to give them a warm Reception. The Combat was obstinate and bloody, and the Enemy had already made one Entrance through the Pallifades; but a Lieutenant, who was possed posted there, and who had scarce any Powder left, was so well seconded by certain Infantry which I fent to his Affistance, that the Enemy was repulsed, and thrown beneath the Ramparts: nevertheless, as they remounted continually with fresh Troops, and continued the Assault all Night, till fix o'Clock next Morning (the 14th) we were not able to make any farther Resistance, especially as we were worn out with Fatigue; and consequently they penetrated as far as the Gates of the City, under which they made a Lodgment. Finding myself then in no Condition to hold out any longer, and struck with Compassion for the poor Inhabitants, who had all been put to the Sword, if I had perfifted in an Obstinacy which would have been deemed unpardonable, I order'd a Drum to beat a Parley; but he was killed on the Spot, and a second met with the same Fate; which obliged me to employ a Trumpet next; on which they forbore firing, and I made use of the Opportunity to fend a Major to General Scheremetoff, who returned me likewise another, with whom I concluded the Capitulation following.

r. To march out, Drum beating, Colours flying, and Pieces loaded; with fix Pieces of Brass Cannon, and twenty four Cartridges for each, with all our Arms and Baggage, and one Month's Provisions.

Granted for three Companies only, with Arms; all the Officers to keep their Swords, but the rest of the Garrison to march out entirely disarmed.

2. Carriages for Sick and Wounded.

Agreed, for as many as can be procured.

3. To march towards Revel, by the nearest Road.

Granted.

4. That the Officers shall have 'Leave to sell their Goods, or at least to leave them, till they have Opportunity to setch them away.

Granted.

5. That no Soldier of the Garrison shall, either by Menaces, or any other Expedient, be seduced from the Service of his Majesty.

Granted.

6. That all the Subjects of his Majesty, of whatever Rank, shall have free Leave to withdraw themselves and their Goods under safe Conduct to whatever Place they please.

'Granted.

7. That the Clergy and Citizens shall be confirmed in their Privileges.

Granted.

8. That if any of them should incline to retire elsewhere, they shall not be withheld by Force.

Granted.

9. That those who should remove their Goods to some other Place, might have Leave to bring them back without Molestation.

Granted.

10. That the Fortress should be restored in statu quo to his Majesty.

R. Casu existente.

After all Things were thus regulated, I marched out with the Garrison: But the Capitulation was not observed in all Points; they obliged the Garrison to divide into three Parties; one of which repaired to Riga with Colonel Tisenhausen, the second to Wiborg, and the third to Revel. They likewise deprived the three Companies of their their best Arms, and distributed others tered himself to have soon under his among them that were very indifferent. Command: At the same Time he pub-

The 25th, all the Russian Army decamped from Dorpt, and began their March towards that City.

August 7th, they obliged me to appear in the Approaches and parly with the Besieged.

'Tis reckoned they threw five thoufand Bombs into the City of Dorpt during the Siege.

CHARLES GUSTAVUS SKYTTE.

The Garrison was conducted under a strong Escorte to the Places abovementioned, and were furnished with Horses and Carriages necessary for the Journey. The Czar, who to animate his Troops had been present at the Assaults, took Possession of the Gates himself the 15th in the Evening, and received the Oath of Fidelity from the Inhabitants; and, to engage that People to submit with a good Grace, he fent back to their Houses all the Peafants who had taken Sanctuary in Dorpt, allowing them Safeguards, exhorting them to cultivate their Grounds as usual, and, by Way of Encouragement, granting them certain Privileges for eight Years.

As the greatest Part of the Inhabitants of the open Country had retired to the Woods, and were dispersed on all Sides, the Czar promised one hundred Crowns for every Gentleman, fifty for every Priest, and twenty-five for every Civil Officer that should be brought in to him; it being his Desire to win over a People, whom he flattered himself to have soon under his Command: At the same Time he published a Declaration in favour of the Livonians, to whom he promised very great Advantages, in case they would submit peaceably to his Government.

The Czar came now with Scheremetoff, to reinforce the Army at the Siege of Narva, and immediately fent Governor Skytte into the Trenches, to inform Major General Horn, who commanded in the Town, of the Particulars of the taking of Dorpt, and of Schlippenbach's Defeat.

The Batteries, which were made ready against his Czarish Majesty's Arrival, began now to play; forty Pieces of heavy Cannon, and 24 Mortars were kept in continual Employment, and with such Success, that the latter soon destroyed the Communication between Narva and Ivanogrod; whilst the former made two large Breaches in different Parts of the Bassion called Vistoria.

The following minute and authentick Relation of this Siege was presented to his Majesty by an Officer of the Garrison of Ivanogrod.

A Journal of what passed at the Siege of Narva, from the first of April, to the twenty-fourth of August, 1704.

April 1, the Enemy marched from Jama over the Ice to Katterkybla, where they entered Livonia, killing a great Number of Peasants, and taking others Prisoners.

The 12th, at two in the Morning, a Party of Russians attacked the Hakel-werk * at Ivanogrod, where they killed a Trooper, with feveral Peasants and Women, and made fome Prisoners; but were foon drove back by the Guard posted at the Bastion of Horn, which hastened thither on the first Notice.

The 27th and 28th, some of their Horse shewed themselves at the Mouth of the River.

The 29th, they posted themselves there, and raised a Battery, in Designation of the Fire from two of our Brigantines, which did their utmost to prevent them. One of these Vessels received a Shot in her Side from the Enemy, who, on their Part, fired so briskly at them, that they were both obliged to retire farther out to Sea. Baron Henning Rudolph Horn, the Governor, went without the Walls to observe the Motions of the Enemy, who, elated with their Success, gave him some ineffectual Salutes from their Cannon.

The 30th, the Enemy continued their Works, and advanced so near, that as the Vessels in the Road could no longer come into the Port, so neither could those which lay at Anchor under the Cannon of the Town venture to sail out, so that all Hopes of conveying any fresh Supplies of Provisions into the Town were entirely cut off.

The 1st and 2d of May, the Enemy carried on their Trenches with great Vigour on the Road leading to Kybla, to prevent our Ships from coming up to the Town. In the Middle of the Night they pass'd over on Prames from Livonia, and surprized some small Vessels which endeavoured to throw us in Provisions. When they passed the River, they daily continued to incommode us, and made their utmost Efforts to carry off our Horses and Cattle.

The 10th, we detached Colonel Lood with three hundred Foot, and Colonel Morath with two hundred and fifty Horse, to support Colonel Rebbinder, who had advanced with his Regiment of Foot, consisting of six hundred Men, to the Mouth of the River opposite the Enemy's Batteries.

At our Arrival, we found no Enemy on our Side; but they had no fooner perceived us from the other, than they threw a Bridge cross the River with the utmost Expedition, over which they immediately passed to give us Battle. Our Colonels now consulted together what Measures were proper to be taken: They agreed, that it was too hazardous to engage the Enemy with fo superior a Force, and without Cannon; besides which Rebbinder's Regiment was very ill provided with Muskers, and we had no Tools to raise a Breastwork to cover us in case of the last Necessity; they therefore resolved on a Retreat, which was performed in the following good Order. Rebbinder's Regiment marched first; Lood's Foot followed, and the Horse with thirty Grenadiers fecured the Rear.

The Enemy advanced in a large Body, and seemed to have an Intention of attacking us; but as we had the good Fortune to break down the Bridge at Tarvajegi, before they could reach it, we put a Stop to their March, and returned into the Town with the Loss of very sew Men. Hara was so dissatisfied with the Conduct of this Expedition, that he summoned a Council of War to animadvert upon it.

The 11th and 12th, we saw a very large large Body of the Enemy's Horse scouring the Country on the Livonian Side.

The 13th, we heard a great firing towards the Road and the Mouth of the Port.

The 21st, the Enemy with great Boldness approached under the Cannon of the Town, and carried off some Cattle and several Prisoners.

The 29th, the Enemy shewed themfelves on the Javal Side, and took fome Horses; at the same Time their own Horse suffered a little from our Ordnance. The same Day, at half an Hour past three in the Asternoon, the Enemy attacked the Workhouse, and traversed the Gardens belonging to it with a large Detachment of Horse, cutting to Pieces all they met. Captain Hochmuth, who was here posted with no more than fifteen Horse. made all possible Defence, and gave them a Diversion for a long Time; but when he found they were attempting to cut off his Retreat, he thought proper to retire under the Counterfcarp: The Enemy followed him; but were so well faluted by the Guns from our Bastions, that they were soon put to Flight, leaving behind them some Horses, and a Russian Officer well drest, who was taken Prisoner; their Dead they carried off according to their Custom.

Captain Hochmath lost very few of his Men and Horses: He received himself several Wounds, and had his own Horse shot under him. The Enemy advanced their Posts as far as Rothenham, and encamped their Foot near the Town.

The 30th, we withdrew our advanced Sentries on that Side. The same Day we saw a large Body of Troop arrive in the Enemy's Camp, whon we saluted from our Guns in the bes Manner we could.

The 31st, they approached from Ivanogrod Side, with a Design of carrying off our Cattle and Horses; bu on the brisk Fire from our Ramparts they retreated behind the Hill of Ratsfooff, where they pitched their Tentssending their forlorn Hope to the Tor of the Hill. We afterwards learns that this was Major General Tschammer who had drawn his Regiment of Dragoons, cloathed in green, from the Mouth of the River to this Hill.

The first of June, the Enemy affected to brave us, parading up and down with a strong Body of Horse, which we attacked several Times with some Advanage.

The 2d, at Break of Day, Lieutenant-Colonel Marquard was attacked in his Return from the Castle of Ivanogrod, whither he had been detached with a Party of Horse to escort some Prisoners; but the Bravery of our Troops repulsed the Enemy, and forced them to retreat behind a Hill, whither they were purfued by an hundred and fifty of our Horse, who with extraor dinary Valour drove them as far as the next Wood, where having drawn up in Order of Battle, and receiving considerable Reinforcement of Horse they obliged us to retreat in our Turn This Retreat however we executed in the most gallant Manner, with our Faces and Piftols presented to the Ene my, till we had drawn back under the Castle of Ivanogrod, where Major Funk was posted to support us. Funk perceiving that we were purfued, advanced haftily with such of his Party as were on the Right to our Affistance, on which the Enemy immediately retreated behind the Hill, and abandoned all Thoughts of renewing the Engagement.

Marquard would have engaged Funk to advance jointly with their Troops to the Enemy's Camp, (which was at a very little Distance) that they might, . if possible, make themselves Masters thereof and plunder it. Funk alledged that he had no Orders to march any farther, nor to second the Horse, so that all the Advantage we gained over the Enemy confisted in their Loss of Men and Horses, which was considerable. A Dragoon, who was taken Prisoner by us, reported, that they had no more than fix thousand Men, but expected the Czar every Moment with forty thousand more. In this Action we lost Lieutenant Appoloss, Enfign Sparkuk, and eight Troopers. The same Day General Horn having observed the Enemy marching with a confiderable Body of Troops towards Livonia, detached the Colonels Rebbinder and Fersen with twelve hundred Foot, and Lieutenant Marquard with two hundred Foot on Ivangorod Side, to attack them and take Possession of their Camp. Rebbinder was at the same Time ordered to return into the Town on the throwing a Bomb, which was to be his Signal, and which the General afterwards ordered to be given him, as foon as he perceived from the Top of a House, that the Enemy were returning in great Numbers. Lieutenant-Colonel Bloman, who at this Time performed the Office of Aid-de-Camp General, was likewise ient out to recal the Troops, and found our Horse engaged with the Enemy; but on the Orders which he brought them, they immediately returned from the Fight, in which feveral were killed on both Sides, and on the Enemy's an Officer of Distinction.

The 4th, we faw a Body of Horse and Foot on the Livenian Side; and in the Evening heard a violent Fire from that which looks towards the Road.

The 5th, a Drum arrived from the Enemy with a Letter from Captain Staal, who had been made Prisoner on the 2d of May, informing us, that Lieutenant Maidel, with seventy Men of Rebbinder's Regiment, were taken on board a Transport-Vessel, which had been Shipwrack'd. The Drum was instantly sent back, with Permission to return the next Day for an Answer.

The 6th, the Drum returned at Noon, and received the Answer we had promised him. The same Day the Enemy made different Motions.

The 7th, we heard several Vollies of small Arms towards the Road, between the Hours of one and three, and saw the Smoak ascend to a great Height in the Air. The Enemy made several Attempts to carry off our Cattle, but were always prevented by our Cannon.

The 9th, at two in the Afternoon, we heard the Report of two Cannons on the Livonian Side, and afterwards of two more at a less Distance; which made the Major-General believe, that Schlippenbach was arrived with those Succours we so impatiently expected, and they were accordingly answered by the usual Swedish Signal. Soon after we discover'd a little Smoke at a vast Distance, which confirmed us in our Opinion of the Arrival of the Succours, whose Van-guard we imagined to be engaged with that of the Enemy.

We afterwards faw the Enemy (having first struck their Tents, and withdrawn those advanced Guard's which they had posted nearest the Town) march out of their Camp, and draw up in two very long Lines, to oppose an Army which we saw approaching from a Wood on the Left. These Bodies now began to cannonade each other, which was foon tollowed by feveral Vollies from their small Arms; after which, they fell together in such a Manner, that by all Appearances it was impossible to suspect but that it was an Engagement between Major-General Horn two Armies. therefore immediately dispatch'd Colonel Lood with eight hundred Foot, and Lieutenant-Colonel Morath with a hundred and fifty Horse, to second those Troops which we thought were in Reality coming to our Assistance.

In the Heat of the Battle, we perceived those whom we mistook for Rushans retreating towards the Bridge, as they had done at the former Siege, which persuaded our Horse that the Enemy was beaten. But Morath advancing nearer to discover the Truth of the Fact, was presently undeceived, and with all his Men surrounded by the Enemy. He was himself taken Prisoner, as were Mr. Kons, Captain of Horse; and the Cornets Hult, Dunkert, and Pipenstok. Captain Lindkrantz, with fifty Troopers, were cut to Pieces.

The same Day, Lieutenant Wilbrant having made a Sally of that Side of the Town where the Hakelwerk stood with 40 Men, with an Intent to throw down the Chimneys, ventured imprudently too far, and was furrounded, when the greater Part of his Men were flain, and himself very narrowly escaped. A great Crowd of Citizens, Peasants and Women, who went out with Lood and Morath in Hopes of a rich Booty, lost their Lives; but Lood himself and his Foot, being somewhat backward, were fortunately preserved.

The 10th, a Drum arrived from the Enemy with a Letter for the Governor, and was bid to return the next Day for his Answer.

Te 11th, the Drum returned and received his Answer. This Day the Enemy made several Motions, which obliged the Governor to fend Colonel Rebbinder, with some Foot, into the Counterscarp to observe them. Peasant, who under the Favour of very hazy Weather, had flipt as far as the Counterscarp, reported, that the Enemy had received a confiderable Reinforcement, and that they had carried many of the Inhabitants of Walk-Narva and the adjacent Parts into At Midnight they fer about their Intrenchments at Wippekbyla, Goldenboff, and the Road leading to Joala, which are almost the same Places. where they had carried on their Intrenchments at the last Siege.

The 13th, we fent a Trumpet to the Enemy, to ask Permission to bury such of our Men as had been killed in the last Action; but as their General was then absent, we could not obtain it. They carried on their Works with great Diligence both Night and Day.

The 14th, they began a Line of Countervallation. We fent again the same Frumpet; but he was not suffered to come within their Camp, because we had not admitted their Drum into the Town.

The 15th, we received an Answer by a Russian Drum, that we might bury our Dead; to attend which Ceremony, an Officer with eight Men were appointed on each Side. Mr. Kalantin, Captain of Horse, was the Officer on our Side.

The 16th, the Enemy extended their Works, and at one in the Morning began a Lodgment near Rothenbahn, in Defiance of our Bombs. That Night they advanced twenty Toises on the Hill near the River.

The 17th, Colonel Fersen was detached with eight hundred Foot to demolish the Houses and Gardens belonging to the Hakelwerk, that they might not serve for a Shelter to the Enemy. This was executed with Success, no more than four Men being wounded.

The 18th, the Enemy continued to push on their Works with Vigour. We saw near Joala several Boats bringing them Cannon.

The 20th, the Enemy made repeated Efforts all Day long, to carry off our Cattle, as well from Narva Side as that of Ivanogrod; but our Cannon always prevented them.

This Day, the Major-General ordered some Foot to fally with two Field-pieces before the Bastion Gloria; for the Enemy advanced directly towards Segelberg Hill. As soon as we had pointed our Cannon, (which we did without the Enemy's perceiving us) we gave them such a Salute, that we saw several fall, and the rest run out of their Trenches. This whole Day we continued a brisk Fire from our Mortars as well as our great Guns.

The 21st, the Enemy advanced under the Hill near the Bridge of Boats, to prevent our Men from demolishing the Chimneys. We incommoded them incessantly with our small Arms, and a great Quantity of Grenades. They returned the Compliment to our new Work, where having killed feveral Men, the Major-General gave Orders in the Evening that no one should shew himself on the Ramparts. The fame Day, a Russian Drum arrived with Letters from Colonel Morath and other Officers, who had been taken Prisoners on the 9th Instant.

The 23d, the Enemy extended their Trenches under Segelberg Hill, near Lysvenkylla, between the Sides of two Hills, pointing their Line towards the Bastion Victoria.

The 24th, they continued them Trenches down the Side of the River. In the Evening we saw a large Body of Foot marching near Rudbofsberg, with a great Number of Waggons loaded with Baggage, which they brought from the Mouth of the River.

The 15th, we faw another large Quantity of Baggage arrive in their Camp. The Enemy now carried on their Works before the Polygon of the Bastion Fama.

The 26th and 27th, they pushed on their Trenches on Ivanogrod Side, and at the same Time did their utmost to carry off our Cattle, which however the Cannon on our Ramparts secured.

The 28th, they worked by Night at their Trenches behind the Rathshof; whilft the Castle of Ivanogrod made a very brisk Fire at them.

The 29th, the Enemy carried on their Works by Night down the Hill towards the Road of Jama, where they raised a Breast work, notwithstanding our Fire from the Town and the Castle of Ivanogrod. During the Day they lay still.

The 30th, they pushed their Trenches as far as the Road of Jama.

The 1st of July, the Major-general ordered the Citizens to bring all their Horses to the Castle of Ivanogrod, where all those Officers who would take them, were to come and wait for fresh Orders. The General, observing that the Russians ventured out of their Trenches to a Spring of Water near Ivanogrod, sent to these Officers who were now waiting on Horseback, to come down into a Valley below the Castle, where they were to expect a Signal from a great Gun on one of the Bastions. On this Signal they were with the utmost Speed to mount the Hill Sword in Hand, and cut off the Retreat of the Russians into their Trenches. But on their Arrival on the Hill, they found no more than a fingle Russian, who threw himself on the Ground, and chose rather to die than furrender. The Enemy fired feveral Times on us without wounding a fingle Man, though we were not above thirty Paces from them.

As this Attempt was unsuccessful, Captain Hochmuth proposed with some Dragoons in the Disguise of Fishermen, who were to pretend to be fishing in three small Vessels, to draw the Russians nearer the Bastion Victoria. He had advanced but a very little Way on the River before they detached thirty Men with Fuzees to interrupt the Fishers; which when the Governor observed, he sent Lieutenant Eschener with fifty Men to cut off their Retreat. This Attempt proving successful, the Russians took the Water. Eight of them were made Prisoners by Captain Hochmuth, who immediately put to land, and the rest drowned.

The Lieutenant set fire to some Houses, and stood several Discharges from sour hundred Russians, who were posted thereabouts. These, as soon as the Lieutenant-Colonel who commanded them was killed, retreated; so that our Detachment returned into the Town without the Loss of one Man, and no more than one non-commission Officer and one Soldier wounded. We learnt from some Russian Prisoners, that Schlippenbach was beaten, and Colonel Fritz Wachtmeister taken Prisoner.

The 3d, a Russian Drum arrived with some Letters. The Enemy drew a Line from the Spot where the little Skirmish had happened on the 1st Instant, ascending toward the Counterscarp of the Bastion Gloria. Captain Frolich was hereupon detached with eighty Men to molest them; but they paid very little Regard to his Fire, and seemed resolved to carry on their Works, however great the Loss might be on that Occasion.

The 4th, we saw a considerable Reinforcement arrive in the Enemy's Camp between Waperkybla and Joala, near the former of which Places they had prepared a great many Boats.

The

The 5th, the Enemy, having carried their Lines before the * Caponiere from four to five Toiles distance from the River, made a continual Discharge of their small Arms upon the Ramparts. We saw fresh Troops arrive every Day in their Camp, and observed that the Enemy had thrown over a new Bridge at Waperkybla, and that their Tents now increased near Sacronia.

On the 6th, the Enemy brought their Trenches down to the River on that Side where the Mill of Axel stood. On the other, they extended their Line as far as the Road of Bleeking. They fired three Pounders from their Battery of Rathefsherg, on our Workmen who were employed on the Horn-Bastion, and afterwards on the Town; with very little Execution on either.

The 7th, they lessened the Guard on the Counterscarp: For whereas a Captain with eighty Men had hitherto constantly mounted there, a Lieutenant with thirty Men only was henceforth ordered for that Service; but every one of these had thirty Cartridges each, all which they were daily to discharge.

The Enemy now extended their Trenches beyond the Road of Bleeking, and fortified them with Gabions from one End to the other. At two in the Morning they were alarmed on Ivanograd Side, when some Soldiers, who were sent to reconnoitre the Enemy, fell in with one of these Parties, with whom they exchanged several Shot.

The 8th, the Enemy pushed their Trenches on Ivanogrod Side as far as a Place called Katterumpan, whense they

In this Skirmish we had three Men afterwards made an heavy Fire from their small Arms. On Narva Side they raised a Redoubt upon Goldenboff Hill. In the Asternoon, thirteen Vessels arrived in their Camp from the Lake Peipus.

The 9th, they reinforced their Guards in the Night on Bleeking Road, and drew a Line behind their Trenches, which they fortified with a great Quantity of Gabions.

The 11th, the Enemy drew very near the Ditch on the Lest of the Bastion Honor, and the Fire was incessant on both Sides, in which they had some Advantage from their Grenade-Mortars. Several Men were every Day killed and wounded on our Part as well as of the Besiegers.

The 12th, the Enemy approached the Bastion Vistoria. The Governor mounted the Ramparts each Day with a great Number of Officers to direct the firing. He this Day lost one of his Fingers by a Fuzee Shot.

The 14th, the Besiegers worked very hard on Ivanogrod Side. They raised a Battery on the Right of Bieeking Road, with twelve Port-holes against the Bastion Vistoria, and that Part of the Rampart which is called Sandwall. Some of our Troopers this Day took six Sheep and nine Horses on Ivanogrod Side.

The 15th, the Enemy in the Night joined their two Lines before the Glacis of the Ravelin of the Royal-Gate; nor could the violent Fire of the Cannon from our Ramparts, and the small Arms from the Counterscarp, prevent them from making a Lodgment on the Counterscarp. On Katterumpam Side, they extended their Line, and fortified it with Gabions. We this Day faw a great Number of Troops marching on all Parts.

The 16th, they worked very hard by Night at the Battery which we have just now mentioned, and added eight new Port-holes to the twelve. This Night they brought a large Quantity of Fascines towards Katterumpan, where they began another grand Battery.

The same Day they began to molest our Workmen at the Bastion Victoria with several Vollies from their small Arms above the River. They drew their Lines every Day nearer that Part of the Counterscarp which was between the Bastions Gloria, Honor, and Victoria.

The 17th, they continued to work on their Batteries, and raised one of Mortars on Segelberg Hill. The same Day a great Body of Horse arrived from Livenia.

The 19th, several Pieces of Ordnance were brought to the Camp, and the Enemy placed a great Quantity of Gabions on their two Lines, which they had drawn round the Castle of Ivanogrod, and worked at their new Batteries. The same Night, we first heard the distinct Report of two Fuzees, and presently afterwards a very brisk Firing both of Cannon and small Arms from Livonia Side. At Noon, the Enemy saluted us with a triple Discharge of an hundred and three Pieces of Ordnance of different Sizes. which were accompanied each Time by a Volley of small Arms, that served them for a Signal. They likewise hoisted fourteen small Colours on their Trenches at these Discharges. same Day they fired for the last Time on Ivanogrod Side.

The 21st, the Enemy drew a new Line towards the Hill of Garafemsberg, fo as to command the whole Valley under the Castle of Ivanogrod. same Evening at eight, a very extraordinary Meteor was feen in the Sky, which at first appeared in the East, presenting the Form of a Star, where drawing towards the West, it assumed the Figure of a Fuzee. As it descended on the Horizon, its extreme Part displayed a Resemblance of the Sun, which, as it burst, cast forth many Rays or Flashes of Light, that were at last changed into a very dark Cloud, which was feen all Night in the Air, and entirely dispersed itself at Break of Dav.

The 23d, one of our Captains, whose Name was Drentel, was killed on the Ramparts. The Enemy now carried on their Works in open Day, without concerning themselves at the Loss they suffered.

The 25th, they began to raise a new Battery near Bleeking Road, between those two before mentioned.

The 27th, they began another a little lower.

The 28th, they laid Planks on their Batteries, and mounted them with their Cannons and Mortars.

The 31st, being Sunday, at Noon, just as the People were coming out of Church, the Besiegers began for the first Time to batter the Bastion Vistoria, with forty-six heavy Cannons, which they fired all at once. At the same Time, they bombarded the Town with sisteen Mortars which they had placed on the Bleeksberg. They had three heavy Cannon near Garasemsberg Hill; sourteen Guns on a Battery adjoining to the Bridge of Communication tion between the Town and the Castle; nine on the Battery at Onnekylla; twenty on the Hill called Postmeisterberg, behind which they placed two Mortars; two others behind that of Garasim, and two near Onnekylla; besides which there were two other Batteries with four Mortars each, and four Mortars near the Bridge of Boats.

From all this Artillery, which was afterwards increased by fifty great Guns and twenty-four Mortars, the Enemy fired incessantly on us; from their Guns all Day, and from their Mortars both Day and Night.

The 1st of August, in the Night a Bomb fell into the Arsenal; which it reduced, with all therein, to Ashes; but did us however no other Mischief. This Day we saw large Bodies of Horse and Foot marching on the Road of Livenia towards Joala.

The 2d, the Besiegers drew very near the Bastion Vistoria.

The 3d, they threw many Bombs into the Castle of Ivanogrod with very little Execution. This Disappointment they revenged on the Town, where they barbarously abused the Inhabitants, and burnt several Houses in the new Town.

The 5th, a Rushan Inhabitant of Narva went over to the Besiegers, and acquainted them that the Governor's House was not yet damaged; on this Advice, they aimed a Quantity of Bombs thither, which did it some little Harm, but not the least to the General's Family. The same Night a Soldier of Captain Frolich's Company deserted to the Enemy.

The 6th, Lieutenant Blomann being in the Counterscarp, very narrowly escaped being cut off with his whole Command by fifty only of the Enemy, who now pushed on their Works against the Breaches of the Bastion Vistoria; but he luckily saved himself by the Royal Ravelin, and gave immediate Advice of his Danger to the Governor, who resolved to expose his Men no more in that Manner; henceforth, he only ordered little Sallies from Time to Time, to bring off their Gabions, and set Fire to their Works.

The 7th, at nine in the Morning, the Foundations of the Bastion Honor sunk all at once, by which one entire Face, with the Parapet, the Rampart, and all the Artillery were thrown into the Ditch. The upper Part of the Wall fell on the Inside, and the lower without, so that the Enemy, by the Help of their Ladders, might have mounted a hundred Men abreast. The Governor, on this unfortunate Accident, ordered out all the Peasants, Servants and Women, Servants and Women to work on the salten Bastion; but these Orders were obeyed by very sew.

In the Afternoon, a Russian Drum brought a Letter from the Velt-Marshal Ogilvi to the Governor. He advised him 'to surrender the Place, 'to prevent the Effusion of human 'Blood, and especially of the inno-cent Inhabitants, whom the Soldiers could not be with-held from facrificing, when they carry a Place by Assault. He represented to him, that the Town in which he com-" manded must be infallibly taken, for 'that Heaven had opened a Passage for the Russians; that he had but few Men, and but little Provision, nor 'any Expectation of Succours, of ' which he might be confirmed by the Governor of Dorpt, and a Dragoon, who had been Witnesses of Schlippenbach's Defeat, and could at the fame Time testify to him the Cle-' mency with which his Czarish Ma-'jesty had treated the Garrisons of Nooteburg, Nyen, and Dorpt, which, though they had made a brave Defence, had not however held out to the last Extremity.

+ The French Translation is obscure by ill pointing.

The Governor returned a very rude Answer to this Letter, which was the Reason that the Czar, after he had taken the Place, used him very ill, and committed him to Prison.

That Day, the Enemy shot nine Arrows into the Town with Letters sastened to them. These the Governor ordered to be brought to him, and forbad any from opening them on pain of Death. Whilst the Russian Drum remained in the Town, there was a Truce and Intercourse between both Parties.

Colonel Skytt came now to inform us of the taking of Dorpt, and that he was the next Day to follow his Garrifon, who were on their March for Revel. In the Evening, we heard at a great Distance towards Livonia, the Swedish Signal of Cannon Shot, to which the Governor answered by two large Guns from Ivanogrod.

The Russian Drum remained all Night in the Town; on which Account the Governor flattered himself with the Hopes of a Truce, and a Cessation of the Bombardment; but as soon as the Enemy who had redemanded the Drum, perceived that we would not deliver him, they threw a great Quantity of Bombs and red-hot Bullets into the Town. About Midnight the Enemy gave in a salse Alarm, drawing themselves up in Order of Assault between the Bastions Honor and Vistoria; but at our firing on them they retreated.

The 8th, Lieutenant-Colonel Kinnert exposing himself too much, was killed on the Ramparts, The Besiegers now made a dreadful Fire on our Workmen, who were employed in repairing the Breaches of Honor and Victoria, so that not a Day passed wherein we had less than thirty Men killed, without reckoning those who lost an Arm or a Leg. We had this Evening another salse Alarm from the Bastion Fortuna.

The 9th, the Enemy appeared ready for the Affault. The same Day, a Bomb sell into a Chest of six hundred Grenades, which were all burnt, but luckily without more Mischief. This Night, a salse Alarm was spread near Victoria and Honor.

The 10th, was a Day truly dreadful and fatal to this poor Town; for at two in the Afternoon, the Besiegers at last mounted the Assault with sixteen hundred Men, without including the Troops who were drawn up to support them, in four different Places. Lieutenant-General Schonbeck commanded the Attack on the Vistoria; MajorGeneral Tichammer that of Honor; a third Officer that of the Ravelin between Honor and Gloria; and lastly, General won Werden that of the Ravelin between Gloria and Fama.

They began the Attack by levelling their Cannon at the Breaches, whither they likewise threw their Grenades, and discharged several Volleys of small Arms; so that it was impossible for any of the Belieged to maintain their Posts there one Minute without being shot to Pieces. The Enemy then brought up their Detachments, each carrying green Colours, and mounted the Affault with great Fury; but were constantly beaten back in all Parts. The Ground was now covered with the Dead; and as fresh Bodies of the Beliegers continually succeeded each other in the Attack, our poor Men, who were extremely fatigued with their long Defence, and weakened with their great Loss, especially from the Grenades, which did us incredible Mischief, after a bloody Fight and obstinate Resistance of three Hours, began to give Ground.

The Enemy made their first Lodgment on the sundered Face of the Bastion Honor, where the Succours which were ordered thither, arrived too late for its Defence. The Governor had indeed directed Succours to all Parts; but his excellent Disposition was render'd fruitless by that Spirit of Consustion, which now began to spread itself throughout.

Lieutenant Colonel Freiden sustained this violent Assault. He was seconded by Major Funk, by the Captains Aminbof and Gyllenspang, two Lieutenants, and two Ensigns. All these, (except the Lieutenant-Colonel and Captain Aminbof) and almost all their Men were cut to Pieces. The Enemy thence penetrated into all Parts, both of the New Town and the Old, and put all they met, as well Officers as Soldiers, to the Sword, killing in the whole above fifteen hundred, befides a great Number of Cytizens, Women, Children and Peafants,

The Slaughter continued several Hours, till the Czar himself by his own Presence put an End to it. We may easily imagine the vast Numbers that were flain: For not to mention three thousand Men, which the Russians lost at the Attack, nor the great Slaughter of our own Soldiers, the poor Inhabitants lay butchered in Heaps, Streams of Blood ran through the Streets; and the Enemy were employed for three Days together in drawing out, the Dead, Wounded and Sick (many of them at the Point of Death) on Waggons and Sledges. They carried them all to the Bridge of Ivanogrod, where they threw the Dead and the Living without Mercy one upon another into the River. A Spectacle full of Horror that cannot be express'd! The Enemy penetrated through the River Gate towards the Bastion Honor, where Colonel Fersen defended himself some Time with a hundred Men, but was at last made Prisoner, very few of his Soldiers escaping to the Castle of Ivanograd.

The Russians being now Masters of the Town, a Russian Colonel, whose Name was Ritter, presented himself in the Evening before the Castle of Inanogrod, and desired to speak with Lieutenant Colonel Stiersahl the Governor, who very willingly accepted the Truce which was offered him, but rejected the Proposition of surrendering at Discretion; though he had no more than two hundred Men in his Garrison, which was very weak on the Narva Side, as there had been little little Likelihood conceived of its being ever attacked from that Quarter.

As Colonel Ritter perfifted in offering no better Terms, the Governor fent Lieutenant Blaman to amuse the Muscovite at the Ramparts, whilst he disposed his Garrison in the best Posture of Desence. Ritter pressing very eagerly for an Answer, was at last told, that the Governor was in the Town, that they knew nor whether he was living or dead, and could consent to nothing without his Orders.

Whilst Ritter and his Detachment returned with this Answer to Narva. the Governor drew out his Men, and posted them in the most advantageous Manner he could. Mr. Arnfiedt, who was a Colonel in the Czar's Service, and Envoy from King Augustus, came to the Castle with a Letter which Captain Frolich received without the Walls: it contained a fresh Summons, with Orders from Major-General Horn to surrender at Discretion. Stiernstabl answered, that as the General was in the Enemy's Hands, he could not receive his Orders, and that he resolved to defend the Place to the last Drop of his Blood.

Major-General Horn was actually taken Prisoner at the Enemy's first Entry into the Town, together with five Colonels, two Lieutenant Colonels, five Majors, five Captains of Horse, twenty one Captains of Foot, twenty-nine Lieutenants, thirty Cornets and Ensigns, all the Officers of Artillery and Engineers, with about a thousand Soldiers, all which received Quarter.

The 11th, and the following Days, the Governor laboured very hard at putting the Castle in a Posture of Defence, and resolved, if the Enemy would not accord him those Term which he had desired, or if they are tempted to take the Place by Assault, that rather than surrender he would blow it up with all his Garrison, for which he had no other Provisions than a little Meal and Salt, and that only for a very sew Days.

The Czar was highly incensed when he heard the Governor's Answer, and sent back Mr. Arastedt to tell him, that if we did not immediately accept the Terms which he offered us, he would facrifice all that remained alive, even the Prisoners themselves, at Narva, and would deal with us in the same Manner, without sparing even the Insant at its Mother's Breast.

The Governor replied, That these Threats would not induce him to deliver up a Fortress which his King had intruffed him with the Care of. That his Czarish Majesty might take what Measures he thought proper; that as for himself, he should look on it as a total Loss of his Honour, cowardly to furrender at the Discretion of an Enemy, before he was reduced to the last Extremity; but if he could obtain an honourable Capitulation, he might then perhaps refolve on putting the Castle into his Majesty's Hands. Whereupon Velt-Marshal Ogilvi de-Tired him to fet down the Terms which he infifted on in Writing, and infinuated, that it was not yet too late to lay hold of the Czar's Clemency; telling him, that he was furprized to fee a Governor fo haughty with a starved Garrison, for that they were no Strangers to all the Circumstances of their miscrable Condition; and concluded with adviling him to fend three Officers the next Day (the 16th) to him at Narva, to fettle the Capitulation, and that he would fend back three others of equal Rank to the Castle to remain there as Hostages till the whole was concluded.

The Governor resolved to accept this Condition, though much against his Inclination, and almost with Tears in his Eyes. He presently asked the Consent of his Officers, who reprefented to him, that he had all imaginable Reason to justify his Surrender; for the Enemy might starve us in a very few Days, fince there remained no more than five Bushels of Meal for the whole Garrison, which slender Provision being exhausted, if the Enemy would not do us the Honour of taking us by Assault, we should be reduced to the Alternative of furrendering at last at Discretion, or of blowing ourselves into the Air.

The 16th, when we were desirous of beginning the Treaty, the Enemy pretended to sing Te Deum, after which they made a triple Discharge from the Ramparts, which were yet in good Condition. The Czar then placed a new Mortar before Prince Menzikoff's House, whom he made Governor of the Town, and having filled it with Wine, drank the Health of his Generals on their late Conquest.

The 17th, the Governor sent three Officers, viz. The Captains Frolich and Kors, and Quarter-master Quenfel into the Town, with the Terms of the Capitulation, who were received at the Gates by Putkammer a Russian Major.

At the same Time, the Enemy sent us three other Captains, whom the Lieutenants Blaman and Wilbrant received at the Gates. The Governor demanded to march out Colours flying, and Drum beating, with all their Arms-and Baggage, and four Field-Pieces, and to have Liberty to go to Revel; and that those Officers and Soldiers, who had Wives at Narva, might fetch them thence. To all which, except what concerned the Colours and the Cannon, General Ogilvi agreed.

The 18th, at eight in the Morning, they took Possession of the Castle of Ivanogrod with a Regiment of Foot, where they detained us eight Days, before we were suffered to depart. They accommodated our Sick with four Lodiens or small Vessels, and equipt the General and some others with one of a larger Burthen, for the Transportation of their Baggage to Revel, whither the rest of the Garrison, who were in Health, marched by Land with their Wives and Families.

I observed as we passed through Pibasegi and Silaneggi, that the Enemy had fortified those Passes with so much Industry, that they were very difficult to be forced. They afterwards demanded a Passport for two Officers and fifty Men to Wiborg, of which when Stiernstrabl asked the Reason, they answered it was to carry the News of the taking Narva.

We were escorted ten Leagues by a Captain and thirty Dragoons; when they were reliev'd by another Captain with twenty-four Dragoons, being a Detachment from Colonel Renn, who marched before us with eight Regiments of Dragoons, in Search of Major General Schlippenhach. This Escort stayed with us two Days only, after which we marched by ourselves, without the least Accident.

Bb 2 after

The Loss of the Rushans at this Siege was very confiderable, the only Affault which they made, having cost them Colonel Berner, with two other Colonels, five Majors, several other Officers, and three thousand Men. The Czar found in the Town and Castle sifty-nine Pieces of Cannon, four Mortars, and eleven Aubits, all of Brass; a hundred and seventy-nine Cannons, thirty-one Mortars, and four Aubits of Iron; four thousand Bombs, and forty thousand Grenades; a hundred and fixty thousand Bullets, three hundred seven thousand Balls, more than a thousand Quintals of Lead; fixty-fix thousand Cheveaux de Frise armed with Iron; in a Word, the greatest Part of what the King of Sweden had taken from the Czar at the Battle of Narva four Years before.

Those Citizens and Inhabitants who were spared were obliged presently to take an Oath to their new Master, who now declared Alexander Menzikof to be his chief Favourite. He had already raised him to the Dignity of a Prince, and made him Governor of all Ingria, of which he afterwards gave him the Fief.

As to Major-General Horn, when he was conducted to the Czar, immediately after the taking Narva, he received a very severe Reprimand, and some say a Blow, for his Want of Respect in the Answer which he returned to the Summons sent him to surrender. His Czarish Majesty committed him to the same Prison where Schlippenback, formerly Governor of Roseburg, had been confined by the Order of the same General Horn, who accused him of not having made a sufficient Desence; and the Czar gave Schlippenbach Leave to go to Stockholm to answer the Accusations brought against him.

Dzalinski, the Waiwode of Culm, came to the Czar from King Augustus. at the Time when he sat down before Narva. We have already remarked, that the Diet of Lublin had consented to the King's fending Ambassadors, and entering into Treaties with foreign Powers; and that in Consequence of this Vote, Augustus had fixed on this Waiwode as his Minister to the Czar. We have likewise observed the Oppofition which it met with from Lubomir/ki and several Senators, and that he was stopt on the Road by a Letter from the Senatus-Concilium of Javarow, which forbad him to go any farther. He answered, that as he had been named by the three Orders of the State, he could not be recalled without the express Command of Kings Augustus. And as he did not receive that Order, he continued his Journey through Kiow towards Moscow, where not finding the Czar, he was obliged to go through Pleskow, to his Army before Narva, where he had a folemn Audience, and obtained all the Concessions he was ordered to demand. The following is an Extract of the Articles of the Alliance which was then concluded between these two Princes.

- 1. There shall be an Alliance offenfive and defensive between the King and the Republibk of Poland on the one Part, and his Czarish Majesty on the other.
 - 2. There shall be a perfect good Under-

Understanding between their Majesties and their Generals in Poland, Mus-covy, and Saxony.

3. They shall conclude no separate

Peace.

4. The Town of Bialacerkieff, and all other Places in the Ukrain, possessed by the Paley, shall be restored to the Republick.

5. The Towns and Fortresses which his Czarish Majesty hath taken in Livonia shall be yielded to Poland, as well as all the rest of this Country, without any Reimbursement to the Czar of those Expences which he hath been at in the War.

6. The Czar shall supply the Republick with twelve thousand Men, and shall maintain them during the whole War.

7. The Czar shall allow the Republick yearly two Millions of Polish Florins, besides his particular Allowance to the King of Poland.

8. If the King of Sweden can be driven out of Poland, he shall be followed, and the War carried into his own Country.

The Ambassador demanded farther of the Czar in what Manner he would receive the Pope's Nuntio; and at the same Time requested, that he would permit the Catholicks freely to exercise their Religion in Moscow and Smolensko.

To the first Article, the Czar anfwered, That though he did not recognize the Pope as Head of the Church, he would nevertheless permit his Nuncio to take Place of all other foreign Ministers, if any Occasion should offer; and as to the Article concerning the free Profession of the Catholick Religion, he agreed to it.

It was soon known that there was a secret Article contradictory to the 5th, and by which the Czar reserved tome Forts in Livonia; and it was this which gave Birth to those Animosities, which afterwards encreased at the general Confederacy of Warsovia. This secret Arricle at length entirely alienated the Affections of the Poles, and incensed them even to the declaring the Throne vacant, and the Election of a new King.

Oginski, after his Defeat, came to the Czar at the Siege of Narva, who had promised to send him twelve thoufand Men into Poland; but he earnestly folicited him to march thither himself at the Head of a numerous Army. This the Czar was prevailed on to promise, and he accordingly made all the necessary Disopositions for the next Campaign, in which he was likely to encounter more Difficulties than in those he had already made. Being now resolved to enter Poland with 100,000 Russians, and sixty thousand Collacks, he raised an infinite Number of Men through all his vast Dominions, defigning to attack us in different Places, and being particularly intent on the Conquest of Livonia, where we were always extremely weak; but these Hopes were a little abashed, by an Account of fresh Forces which the King of Sweden designed to pour intothis Country, and of a strong Squadron which he was equipping for the Gulf of Finland, to demolish Retusari. and the new City of Petersburg.

The Czar began by fending Prince Menzikeff into Poland, who came to Wilna, where there was already a Body of fix thousand Museovites. The Prince in his Conferences with the Heads of the Confederacy of Sendomir, promised them all that the Czar had before promised the Palatine of Culm, and to Oginski.

In the End of the Year, the Czar came to Moscow, where he made extraordinary Rejoicings for the successful Issue of his late Campaign. is now Time to return to the Affairs of Poland. Count Lowenbaupt, after he had beaten the Russians and Oginski, resolved to attack the Town of Birsen in Lithuania, whence the Enemy constantly disturbed our Territories of Courland. He invested and blocked it up for some Weeks, and then took it by Composition; razed the Fortifications, and then returned into Courland, leaving Colonel Wennerstedt with fome Horse in Samogitia, to attend the Enemy's Motions.

Augustus, to repair the Loss of his Foot at Thorn and in other Places the last Year, had demanded Subsidies of the Estates of Saxony, which they confented to the Beginning of this Year. By these Means, an Army of between twelve and fourteen thousand Men was raised with great Difficulty; and ordered to march into Poland. King Augustus, having waited for the Arrival of twelve thousand Russians, who were at the same Time on their March for Kiow, came afterwards to his Saxon Army, immediately after they had passed the Oder near Guben. They afterwards marched into Poland through Silesia, and were posted along the Frontiers, where they collected feveral Magazines at Kostyn and other Places.

At the fame Time, Radomiki, General of the Great Poland, with his Brother the Consable of Posnania, at the Starost Smigālski, considerably i creased the Saxon Army by the Addition of their Forces. Which was the most formidable, by having General Scholenburg at its Head, who commande in the Absence of Velt-Marsha Steinau.

All these Circumstances raised the Spirits of the Confederates at Sendomin very high; they thought a happy Revolution was at hand, and that the Face of King Augustus's Affairs would very shortly be changed.

The Swedes remained still Masters of Polnania, where Major-General Mardefeld, and Colonel Lillieboek commanded a very indifferent Garrifon, and had frequent Skirmishes with Smigelski a Partizan of King Augustus. To fecure that Town therefore and the Confederates of the Great Poland from all Infults, it was thought proper to fend Major-General Meyerfeld, with his own and Taub's Dragoons, both new raifed Regiments, and almost entirely composed of Germans, chiefly Silesians. To these was likewise added the Regiment of Horse of North Scania, under the Command of Colonel Gustavus Horn.

Meyerfeld marched from the Neighbourhood of Dantzick with these three Regiments the 14th of June through Wotzlaw, and encamped at Tirschaw on the Vistula. The next Day he marched to Meve, a little Town on the Vistula, where he stayed the 16th, and encamped the 17th at Neuburg on the same River. The 18th, the Regiments passed by Graudulents to Westphalia, where they halted two Days. The 21st, they pass under the Walls of the little Town of Schwetz, where Lieutenant-General Poss had taken up his Winter-Quarters, with Part of the Foot-guards. They halted a little beyond this Place opposite to the Town of Culm, the Quarters of sifteen hundred of the Guards, and afterwards encamped at Krotschen.

The 22d, they marched to Strelitz, where they halted the next Day. The 24th, they marched till after Midnight, and advanced fix Leagues near the Bridge before the Town of Thorn, where they encamped, and remained the next Day, in which the Regiments received fome Provisions from the Town. The 27th, they decamped, and paffing through the little Towns of Putgursche and Gnieskow, which last was the Residence of the Starost Babroniski, Marshal of the Confederacy of Warfovia, they encamped near the Village of Ofrow. The 28th, fixty Horse were detached to raise Contributions.

The 29th, they continued their March through Barkin, Mitelburschitz, and the little Town of Radziwo, where they encamped at the Foot of the Hill. The 30th, they marched three Leagues as far as Zeminen, where Colonel Ducker had a little before encamped with the other Regiments of the King's Army. The 31st, the General halted here, and detached Captain Bennet with fifty Horse to raise Contributions.

The 1st of August, the Dragoons continued their March through the little Town of Irbiza, where Smigelski had been some Days before with three hundred Horse, and encamped near the Village of Swienteslavize. Here they halted the 2d Instant, and on the 3d were joined by Horn's Horse, which had followed behind. The 5th, they all decamped. Meyerfeld's Regiment marching in the Van, the Horse in the Centre, and Taub's Dragoons bringing up the Rear, (which Order they changed every Day,) and marching sive Leagues through very large Woods, where they met no Person but a single Hermit, they encamped near Slesin.

The 7th, they past through the little Town of Kletzewo to Kofruti, a Village near the Town of Slupfia. eight Leagues from Posnania, where they encamped. On the 8th they rested; and the 9th marching by the Walls of Slupfia, they came near the Town of Wresna, where they halted. Here General Meyerfeld, having received Orders in the Evening to haften his March, decamped and marched all Night, and the next Day till Midnight, when they halted a third Time within a League of Posnania, at which Town they arrived early on the 11th, and encamped on a Hill before the Water gate.

King Stanislaus sent to inform Meyer-feld that he was coming to join him with the Crown Army, and great Numbers of the Gentry, who would mount their Horses at his Approach, in order to give Chace to the Saxons, who had imposed very heavy Contributions on all those Countries. But all this Project, as we shall see, came to nothing.

On the first Advice which Schulenbourg received of Meyerfeld's Arrival with his Forces, he reloved to attack him, before he could receive any Reinforcement. But as he thought he should not want his whole Army on this Occasion, he chose out three thousand five hundred of his best Horse and Foot, and marched Night and Div seven Leagues, passing the Warta in his Way, till he came within a League and half of Posnania. withstanding all the Precaution he took to conceal his March from Meyerfeld's Knowledge, this General very luckily received Notice of it at Eleven in the Evening, by a Deferter from Bareuth's 'Regiment. He presently ordered his Men to Horse, and drew out those which were in the Town with four hundred Foot, under the Command of Colonel Weidenbeim, When he had and two Field-pieces. taken these Measures, and made his Disposition, he waited all Night for the Enemy in Order of Battle.

Schulenbourg failed not to pay him a Visit at Break of Day, flattering himfelf that he should surprize the Swedes, but was struck with Astonishment when he found them in so good an Order: Resolving however not to return without making an Attempt, he order'd the Attack to be begun in three different Places.

General Meyerfeld, who himself commanded the right Wing, which consisted of two of Horn's Squadrons, and of four Companies of his own Regiment, viz. his own Company, and those of Wittinghof, Kerstdorf and Krudner, gave them so smart a Reception, that with the Affistance of the two. Field-pieces, which were difcharged continually, after having sustained three Vollies, he fell on them Sword in Hand, broke and routed them, though double his Number, and then fent Taub with fixteen small Squadrons to pursue them. Taub followed the Enemy near two Hours, and drove them as far as a large Wood. In this Pursuit, the Enemy had above a hundred Men killed, and fixty taken Prisoners.

Whilst this past in the Right Wing, the Saxon Foot, being almost two thousand strong, with the rest of their Horse, attacked our left Wing; and as they were infinitely our Superiors in Foot, they forced those on our Side, together with our Squadrons, to retreat, after some Resistance, under the Cannon of Posnania. Our Loss was not very considerable; for the Enemy instead of pursuing us, fell upon our Camp, and began to punder and set Fire to our Tents.

Schulenburg perceiving Taub returning from the Pursuit, made so expeditious a Retreat, and gained so much Ground of us, that we could not overatake him. However, Major Rothusen of Meyerfeld's Regiment was sent after them with three hundred Horse. The Major retook the two Field-pieces, and made several Prisoners, whom he brought back, with sourceen French Deserters, all Grenadiers of Furstenberg's Regiment.

The Saxons, in this Action, lost, near fix hundred Men, including the Wounded and the Prisoners; and among the Wounded, was Majorgeneral Brause, with many other Officers. On our Side were lost three hundred Men, and some Standards.

Meyerfeld now resolved to draw nearer to King Stanislaus, foreseeing that Schulenbourg would certainly return with all his Forces. He left his Wounded in the Town, which he knew the Enemy would not soon attack, because they were without Artillery, and taking Part of his Baggage with him, began his March at One

One in the Morning, and proceeded four Leagues to a small Town called Podvisizea. Here he halted the next Day, and sent back Captain Bennet with a hundred Horse to Posnania for the rest of the Baggage, which he brought to him at Noon the Day sollowing. After a Stay of some Days at Podvisizea, he decamped on the 14th about Midnight, and marching all the next Day, came in the Eevening to Mielzin.

The 15th, he came to Slupsia, where Smigelski attacked the Picket, but was repulsed. In the Evening, the Regiments decamped, and marched all Night through a great Wood, where they lest some Waggons behind them, and came to Klitschow, where they halted some Days.

Thence they marched to Kunitza, where they arrived very late. During their Stay here the Regimentary * Mirzewski, at the Head of a thousand Poles, brought Letters from Stanislaus and General Horn to Meyerfeld, by which he was informed that King Augustus was drawn near Warsovia, with Orders to Meyerfeld to go to Lowitz and escort the Primate, who was come thither from Warsovia in his Way to Danizick and Thorn.

The 20th, they marched to Kolo, a small Town surrounded with Water. The 21st, they marched the whole twenty-four Hours, and came to the little Town of Lancicia, which is a very difficult Pass encompassed with Morasses. The 23d, they arriv'd before Lowitz, the usual Residence of the Primates of Poland, and where the Cardinal then was. The 25th, the Regiments passed though the Town, and drew up on the opposite Side. Then the Cardinal with his Retinue came down from the Castle, and went in his Coach between Meyerfeld's and Horn's Regiments. In which Posture the March was continued, and they came the first Day to Tokaring, a Village on the Vistula.

The 26th, they proceeded to Wladiflaw, where the Lieutenant-Colonel of Meyerfeld's Regiment was ordered the next Day with two hundred Horse to escort the Cardinal to Thorn. 28th, General Meyerfeld followed with the Regiments, and passed through the little Towns of Nizerva and Radzunsek. The 29th, he continued his March to Thorn, and passing thro that City, came to the Village of Mokre, where the King of Sweden took up his head Quarters in the laft The 30th, the Regiments were quartered in Thorn, where we will leave them for some Time, and return to Posnania.

Meyerfeld was no sooner gone than the whole Saxon Army approached, and encamped on the Warta within half a League of the Town, where Schulenhourg halted, till he could throw a Bridge over the River. An Exchange was now made of the Swediffs and Saxon Prisoners taken in the late Action; and the Town and Garrison were kept very closely blocked up.

The King of Sweden being joined by Rheinschild's Army quitted Sendo-

mir, and demolished the Works which the Saxons had lately raised. Thence he marched for Jaroslaw, whither King Augustus was retired. The Army proceeded three Leagues that Day, as far as the Village of Pilkof, where they encamped on two Lines. They then continued their March towards Przydel on the River San, opposite the Town of Ulanaw; thence to Skarzina, and coasting all along the San, encamped the next Day at Wicizewice.

Generals, was detached from the Army to Jaroslaw, with Orders to lay up a Magazine there, and to enquire after King Augustus, who, with his Muscovite Succours just arrived, had departed from that Place at Approach of our Army; leaving behind thim Lieutenant-Colonel Brand, the better to cover his Retreat, and observe and obstruct our March.

The King of Sweden soon followed Stenbock, and encamped near Jaroslaw, whence during his Stay of a few Days, he sent out several Parties for Provision, with Orders likewise to lay the Territories of Oginski and the other Adherents to Augustus, on the Frontiers of Hungary under Contribution.

King Augustus directed his Rout towards Sakal and Zamosc. He sent twelve thousand Muscovites into the Neighbourhood of Breszicia, a Pass on the Frontiers of Poland and Liebuania, whilst himself with eight thousand Cosacks, his Saxon Troops, and those under Brand, drew towards Lublin; for he had got so much the Start of us, that he had a full Liberty, of marching where he pleased.

But all the Care which that Monarch took to conceal his March from the King of Sweden, could not divert the Intelligence which the latter received from the Parties of Poles and Valoches, who were continually at his Heels, and who surprized near Zamosc two Saxon Lieutenant-Colonels, three Captains, two Lieutenants, eight Non-commission'd Officers, and some Soldiers and Servants, who were made Prisoners, as they were returning from the Funeral of a Saxon Colonel. Count Stenbock had, in this Interval. been at Lomberg or Leopol, to exact Contributions of that Town in the Name of his Swedish Majesty; which were very haughtily refused, and the Count not admitted within the Gates. Galeski, the Palatine of Calis, whom Augustus had made Governor of this relying on immediate and powerful Succours from Mazeppa, the Great General of the Cofacks, had encouraged the Magistrates and Citizens to behave in that insolent Manner, for which he was afterwards the chief Sufferer. He had formerly incurred his Majesty's Displeasure by his fraudulent Embally at the Court of Sweden at the Beginning of this War, to which he is accused of having very much contributed.

His Majesty, who was desirous of engaging the Cosacks, did not fail to lay hold of this Opportunity, and leaving Rheinschild behind him near Leopol with twelve Regiments, six of Horse and six of Foot, till farther Orders, he decamped with sisteen Regiments from Jaroslaw, and marched the first Day to Saleskavola, where the King left the Foot and Artillery, and continued his March with the Hotse and Dragoons thro' the Town of Javarow to Noviejezo.

All the Baggage was now committed to the Charge of a Party of Horse, and in the Afternoon, the King advanced with three Regiments of Dragoons only, intending to be early the next Morning before Leapal, in order to surprize the Town, or at least hinder Mazeppa, who was said to be on his March, from throwing any Succours into it.

This was a very laborious March; for they were obliged to cross a thick Wood, where a heavy Rain encreased the Darkness which the Night and the Trees would otherwise have occasioned, and caused the Troops to separate from one another. To prevent any Accident from thence, the King was forced to halt about Midnight and to light Fires, and give a Signal by Sound of Trumpet, to call together his Men. He then wrapt himself up in his Cloak, and lay down on the Ground between a Colonel's Legs. The young Prince of Wurtemberg did the same, and they both had a good Night's Rest, though the Rain wet them to their Skins.

At Break of Day, the King ordered his Trumpets to found, and continuing his March, arrived about Nine within a League of Leopal, where his Majesty halted till his Troops came up. Our March being thus retarded, the Enemy received timely Advice of our Approach, whereupon, feeing the Disappointment of the Project which he had formed to surprize the Town. and the violent Fatigue of his Troops, the King thought proper to let them rest that Day near a Village, and on the next marched towards the Town. Some Polish Troops belonging to Wisniewiski the elder, and the Referendary of the Crown, shewed themselves and fired on us at a great Distance; but on the Approach of our Van-guard, they ran away full Speed, and we saw no more of them.

His Majesty then brought up his Horse in two Columns, and invested the Town on all Sides, approaching in Person almost home to the Walls of the Place, which he went round to discover the properest Quarter for the Attack. Galeski and Camminski the Governor reduced the Suburbs to Ashes, and then made a continual Fire on our Troops both from the Ramparts and from a fortified Cloyster, by which Adjutant General Hielm was wounded in the Thigh, and a Captain, a Lieutenant, and some Horses were killed.

This Town, which the Poles called Luwow, and the Germans Limberg, is the Capital of Red-Ruffia, and is fituated on the River Pettau, fifteen Leagues from the Carpatian Mountains. A very wealthy Place, and in itself of great Importance. It is large and well fortified after the Polish Fashion, but surrounded with nothing but Woods. Here is a Kind of Citadel, or rather a fortified Cloyster. On another Side are the Ruins of an old Castle on a Hill which commands the Town; which the King cast his Eyes on as one of the Places proper to draw out his Men for the Attack.

Leopel had formerly stood a Siege of three Months together by an Army of an hundred thousand Turks and Tartars, without being taken; so that in a vaunting Phrase it called itself a Virgin Fortress, till Charles XII. without Foot, and without Areillery, took it by Storm with two or three Regiments of Dragoons in a few Hours.

Attacks.

The King having affembled the Colonels of his Dragoons in the Evening, declared to them his Intentions of attacking the Town at that Part we have mentioned, without staying either for his Foot or Artillery. The Officers then received their Orders, and the Regiments were drawn out in Order of Battle between the Castle and the Town, where the necessary Ammunition for the Attack was distributed among them.

Early in the Morning, the Attack was begun on the Polygon of the fortified Cloyster, which we were obliged to make outselves absolute Masters of, as we were to pass over it; beyond was a flat-bottomed Ditch, and a Rampart, which between two Bastions presented us a Galerie à meurtrières. Behind this Rampart was a Ditch filled with Water, which was to be crossed before we arrived at the Town Walls. Over this Ditch was a Bridge, but the Enemy could pull it up at their Pleafure.

On this Bridge the King, whose Penetration nothing could escape, had cast his Eye. He past that Night without Sleep, carefully instructing his Officers and Soldiers, and gave them the usual Word: With God's Assistance. The Horse patrolled with great Diligence the whole Night round the Town; and at the Break of Day, the Attack was begun in the following Manner,

A Captain with fifty Men marched first up to the Cloyster, and after a short Resistance made themselves Masters of it. Baron Crassau, leaving the Cloyster on one Side, fell directly on the Gallery between the two Bastions. He had Colonel Buchwald on his Right, and Colonel Dcuker on his Left; before each of whom marched a Lieutenant with twenty-four Men, supported by a Captain with fifty, and several Carpenters with Hatchets, with which they were to demolish the Gallery. Crassau was wounded in the Head as he pass'd by the Cloyster, and was forced to be conveyed out of the Field.

Colonel Buchwald then began the Attack with great Valour and Conduct. He mounted the Ramparts, and with his Grenades drove off the Enemy, who endeavoured to prevent our Carpenters from opening the Gallery, which was very brickly pushed at the other two

The King and Prince of Wartenberg were the first who mounted the Affault. This brave young Prince with his Pistol in his Belt, kept close to the King, who was soon on the Top of the Rampart. The Officers who followed him earnestly intreated his Majesty not to expose himself to such apparent Danger; but they received no other Answer, than, That it could not be avided, and it was his Duty to stay with them.

The Enemy perceiving all was lost there, attempted to escape over the Bridge, which led into the Town; but the King, who, as we have said, had continually kept his Eye on it, hastened thither with his Sword drawn, and pursued them so closely, that he entered the Town with them, and cut all to Pieces who endeavoured to resist.

Our Troops, which were under the exactest Discipline, and taught to behave with Moderation in their Conquest, stopt all at once and drew up the Market-place. There were indeed fome few Houses plundered, of which his Majesty was himself in a Manner the innocent Cause, by detaching at first several Companies under the Command of Count Torstenson, Adjutant-General, with Orders to visit all the Ramparts; on which Occasion some Dragoons quitted their Ranks, and fell to plunder, but this was quickly put an End to.

The Garrison consisting of six or seven hundred Men, besides the Citizens, were made Prisoners. The Governor endeavouring to save himself in his Night-gown in a Cloyster, was taken by the Drabans, together with many other Officers who there lay concealed, in which Number was old Major-general Berentz. Count Stenbock, as foon as he come up, immediately knew Galefki, and accosting him with these Words: Ab, my good old Gentleman, are we met bere at last? he gave him two good Blows, in return for his having formerly spoke ill of him at Dantzick.

In the Arsenal we took a hundred and seventy one Pieces of Cannon, with a Quantity of Arms and Ammunition. The Streets were filled with the joyful Acclamations of a great Number of Turkish and Tartar Slaves, whom his Majesty released out of their Prisons. As to the Inhabitants, Count Stenbock declared to them in his Majesty's Name, that they should pay three hundred thousand Crowns for their Obstinacy. A Sum which they were rich enough to have paid, and had already begun to collect it, when, at the Instances of King Stanislaus, half of it was remitted to them, a Circumstance which greatly contributed to advance that Prince in their : Favour.

The 28th, all the Regiments which had stayed behind with the Artillery and Baggage being come up to Leopol, the King withdrew and encamped his Army at some Distace from the Town, to see whether Mazeppa would have the Courage to attack us; but this General hearing on his March, that Augustus, forgetting his Promise to, wait for him at Sokal, in order to act for the suture in Conjunction with him, had left that Place and was gone towards Lublin, presently turned about and returned into the Ukrain.

As the great Point of Augustus was to drive his Competitor Stanistans out of Warsovia, he let the King of Sweden alone, and endeavoured to join his Saxon Army near Posnania; for which Purpose, taking with him his German Horse and a Party of Cossacks, he past the Vistula at Maziowice, and directed his Rout towards Warsovia, whilst General Brand, who remained on this Side the River, marched towards Praag, the Suburbs of Warsovia.

King Stanislaus, who was now on his Way to Great Poland to join Mr. Meyerfeld, on the first Notice of his March, returned hastily to Warsovia on the 18th of August, to withdraw his Queen, Madam Royal, his Mother and his Children. On his Arrival, he fummoned a Council of War very early in the Morning at the Great General's, Prince Lubomirski, to consider of proper Measures to be taken in the present Conjuncture. Lieutenant-general Horn being present, advised couragiously to face King Augufus with the Crown Army, and what Horse and Foot they had, and force force him to a Battle before he was joined by Brand. This he represented as a Step not more glorious than ne-

This Motion was much relished by Stanislaus and some other of the Grandees of the Kingdom; but Prince Lubomirski, either through Fear, or because he had already resolved to return to King Augustus's Party, or perhaps from both these Motives united, persisted in opposing it, pretending that there were scarce two Polish Companies whose Loyalty was to be depended on.

All this did not prevent General Horn from fending immediate Orders to a Major, who with four hundred Foot had been posted some Time at Latowice, seven Leagues from Warsovia, where he was to raise Contributions, and secure a Quantity of Provisions, to return with great Speed and reinforce him with his Party. But when they heard that Brand had already invested Latowice on all Sides, a Place sufficiently tenable by reason of the Morasses which environ it, a Resolution was taken at Warsovia of marching to the Relief of the Major.

With this View King Stanislaus, attended by Prince Alexander Sobieski, Prince Ludomirski, Great General, by his Brother the Chamberlain, and several other Lords past over the Bridge on the Vistula at the Head of the Crown Army. And, as Stanislaus thought himself in no Security in the Midt of the Poles, Horn gave him all his Horse.

This General flattering himself that King Stanislaus would soon return with Success, did not break down the Bridge on the Visua, but employed which remained with him in making: all the necessary Preparations for al stout Defence, in case of an Attack on the Town-side from King Augustus.

The two Ambassadors Wachsager: and Palmberg, with the Bishop of Pagnania, that themselves up in the Castle. King Stanislaus's Family, namely, the Queen his Spouse, Madam Royal his Mother, and the Princesses Anne and Mary, attended by the Palatines of Siradia, Lancizia, Podlachia, and their Spouses, by the Great Treasurer Sapieba and other Lords, they had already on the 19th of August, in the Evening, set out for Prussa and Elbing.

The Project of relieving the Major did not succeed: For before the Arrival of Staniflans, Brand had already drained the Morass round Latowice, by which Means, our Garrison being unable to defend themselves, were obliged, after they had retreated to the Churchyard, to surrender themselves at Discretion.

After Brand had accorded them this Condition, his Cossacks sell on a Party of them, and cut them to Pieces in the most barbarous Manner. King Stanislaus, who had Advice of all this, continued his March, and in the Evening encamped within a short Quarter of a League of Brand. Majesty was very eagerly defirous of attacking him, but no Argnments or Intreaties were capable of shaking Lubomirski; so that the Enemy's Ges neral had the Happiness to escape that Night; he went directly to Pracy, in order to join King Augustus at Warser via.

Horn was already invested, and had hardly hardly time to break down Part of the Bridge, when King Stanislaus acquainted him with the Impossibility of his receiving any Succours. Brand, on his Arrival, presently repaired the Bridge, and joined the King his Mafter. General Horn, with only the four hundred and eighty Swedes, and fome of King Stanislaus's new Levies, made at first a very stout Desence in the Town; but as he was incapable of maintaining himself here any Time, he retired into the Castle, where being furmoned by King Augustus, he anfwer'd, That he would defend himself to the last Extremity. The Enemy then began to batter the Castle, and to throw red-hot Bullets into it, which set Fire to several Places, but a violent Shower of Rain extinguish'd it every where as foon as kindled, fo that they did but little Damage.

General Brand pass'd the Vistula with fix thousand Men, and summon'd Hern again to surrender: He was obliged to fubmit, for they had now cut off all Supplies of Water, so that he could no longer extinguish the Fires which they made.

He therefore fent some Officers to the Enemy, to fettle the Articles of Capitulation: And demanded to have the Bishop of Posnania and Wachslager comprized therein, though the latter, being born at Thorn, was look'd on as a Rebel.

The following 'Conditions were at ? length agreed on.

1. That the whole Garrison should . Tempin Prisoners of War.

2. That General Horn and his Offieers Thould keep their Arms and all their Effects. Utteit Effects.

3. The Soldiers should be allowed as much Baggage as they could carry.

4. That neither General Horn or his Officers should be insulted, or in the least molested by any of the Cossacks or Poles.

5. That all those who had formerly ferved King Augustus should be pardoned, provided they were not Deferters.

Mr. Horn had caused the 4th Article to be inferted on Account of the Slaughter made by the Coffacks at Latowice, and the Cruelty shewn to eighty Swedes, whom they had met in their Route.

General Horn marched out with his Garrison consisting of eight hundred Men, all, except the Officers, being disarmed. He was himself on Horsebach, but alighted as he pass'd by the King, to pay his Respects to him. The Soldiers were all conveyed into Sanony; but the Bishop of Posnania, whose House and Effects were all plundered, was fent to Rome to receive his Sentence from the Pope, General Horn was fuffered on his Parole to go to the King of Sweden and acquaint him with what had passid, after which he was to return to Leipfick, where he was to remain a Prisoner till he should be exchanged.

King Stanislaus in the mean Time continued his March, and pass'd by Lublin towards Faroslaw, to join General Rheinschild, who, after his Separation from the King of Sweden, decamped with fix Regiments of Florse and fix of Foot the ist of September, and marched to Biala, and thence on the 2d to Cvieffanaw, a little Town, where Staniflants found him, The King, taking an Escort of Horse with him, and being attended by Prince Alexander Sobieski, set out for Leopol, where he fafely arriv'd on the 8th of that Month, and whither Mr. Honn came likewise under a Saxon Escort on the 12th.

Digitized by GOGICKing,

As to what concerns Lubomirski, the Great General, he retreated on the 16th with the Crown-Army towards Reschow, where he had a Castle belonging to him, and distributed his Troops in the adjacent Parts, pretending that the Season was so far advanced that he could no longer keep the Field.

On the other Side, Lieutenant-General Schulenbourg, having staid fome Time before Possania, decamped with his Army, and marched towards Warfovia, in order to join King Augustus: This gave the Town a little Relief, which was afterwards rendered more compleat by the Departure of Radomicki, the General of Great Poland, towards Koffin, from the Bridge on the Warta, which Station he had hitherto held with some hundred Horse. This gave General Mardefeld an Opportunity to fend out a Party, which burnt the Bridge, and likewise a large Quantity of Fascines which the Saxons had gathered together.

The Governor made use of this Time to bring Forage and all Sorts of Provisions into the Town, which however cost him no small Trouble; for the Enemy's Parties secured the whole Country, and Redomicki had forbid the Nobility assembled at Skroda, to supply the Town with any Provisions on Pain of Death.

Major-General Meyerfeld, who had kept himself hitherto at Thorn, as soon as he heard that Schulenhourg had quitted Posnania, and that Radomicki with his Troops was encamped at a Place called Stenziewa, at no more than two Leagues Distance from it, made all imaginable Haste towards him, and the better to disguise his March, he dress d his Van-guard in the Saxon Fashion, and took with him all the Poles whom he met on the Road.

He lest Thorn at two in the Morning, at the Head of the three Regiments we have mentioned, having first sent his Sick to Elbing. He arrived at Zeita by Noon, where he halted in the open Field till the Evening, and then renewed his March, which he continued all Night through very large Woods. The Regiments arrived at break of Day at the Village of Wallopitza, whence they marched to the little Town of Labezin, where they passed the next Night.

On the 8th of September in the Morning, they continued their March through Zuin, a small Town, in their Way to Loppino, and thence advanced three Leagues to Powelziska, whence they arrived by Night within a League of Posnania, where they halted. At last they came before the Town; the Governor surprized at seeing Mr. Meyerfeld, let them immediately pass throthe Town in their Way to Stenziems. Major-General Mardefeld presently sollowed, and they arrived on a Gallop by six in the Morning.

Mr. Meyerfeld instantly attacked the Polish Camp, where were three thousand Saxons belonging to Schulenbourg's Army. The Poles had scarce Time to mount their Horses, and were forced to ride without their Saddles, dles, which they did with such Expedition, that though we pursued them for two Hours, we could kill or overtake but a very few. We found their Camp well furnished with Provisions, Tents, Horles and Baggage, all which were given us to plunder.

After this Expedition was over, our Men stood two Hours in order of Battle, after which, having fet fire to their Camp, they marched to Kunerzewo, a fine House belonging to Mr. Radomicki Constable of Posnania, and Brother to the General. Here they staid a few Days, during which they fent twelve Pair of Kettle-Drums, and two Standards, which they had taken from the Enemy, to Posnania. The 13th, General Meyerfeld decamped in the Evening from Kunerzewo, marched all Night, and returned the 14th of September at Break of Day to Pesnania, where he quartered his Men. in the Suburbs.

As King Augustus was resolved on the Siege of this Place, Lieutenant-General Brand received Order to invest it, and General Patkul, with fome thousand Russians, was commanded to join him.

Brand having left Warfovia, arrived fome Days after Meyerfeld returned to Posnania. He posted himself at the fame Place where Schulenbourg had encamped before, and where there had been a Bridge over the Warta, but it was destroyed by Mardefeld.

On the News of Meyerfeld's having detached Colonel Gustavus Horn with fix hundred Horse towards Costin, and that the rest of the Horse were out after Forage, Brand resolved to cut them. off, or at least to prevent them from foraging: For which Putpose he de-. 27

tached two thosand Poles and Saxon Cuiraffiers on Michaelmas-day to attack them; and ordered some other German and Polonese Troops to pass the Warta at a Ford, which the Shallowness of the Current now permitted, and oppose any Succours which the Swedes should attempt to send to their Foragers.

Almost two thousand had already past the River, when Meyerfeld, who had had Notice of this Expedition, marched up to them with a Squadron of his Horse, namely, his own Troop, and those of Lieutenant-Colonel Bolth and the Major, amounting in the whole to three hundred and fifty Men or thereabouts. Lieutenant-Colonel Trautfetter and Count Gyllenstolpe, who commanded the Van-guard, confishing of a Captain and seventy Dragoons only, received their Fire, and then attacked 'em so briskly Sword in Hand, that they were foon broke and driven in Confusion into the Water. In this Action many of them fell, especially of Bareuth's Dragoons.

When Meyerfeld up, Brand, who was on the other Side of the Water, contented himself with being a Looker on, without attempting to affift those of his Party who had pass'd. So that Meyerfeld's Squadron stood motionless, directly opposite to the Enemy, till all the Foragers who were commanded by Major Burrmann, and had been dispersed, were returned.

When these Poles who had passed the River, heard of the Blow which had been given on the Warta, they retreated, and suffered the Swedes to pass without any Molestation. lost very sew Men on this Occasion; and Count Gyllenstolpe, who was wounded $\mathbf{D}\mathbf{d}$ wounded in the Arm, was the only Officer hurt.

We took a Pair of Kettle-drums and a Polish Standard from the Enemy, whose Troops amounted, according to the Report of the Prisoners, to sixteen thousand; namely, four thousand Saxon Troopers, two thousand three hundred of Brand's Troops, and the rest were Russians, Poles, and Coffacks.

As it was known that the Saxons had absolutely determined on the Siege of Posnania, Major General Meyerfeld thought proper to enter that Town with his three Regiments, since the Suburbs were so far from being desensible, that we could not secure ourselves there from the Danger of being surprized. We then made all the necessary Preparations for the Support of a long Siege; but our principal Fear was a Desiciency of Provision.

Brand, on his Part, waited only Patkul's Arrival to attack the Town in Form, which though its Condition was not equal to a very long Resistance, took very obstinate Resolutions of defending itself to the last Extremity.

One Evening, whilst the Camp near Leopol lay in the utmost Security, Prince Wisniowiski the Elder, and the Referendary of the Crown, attacked us by Moon-light with all imaginable Fury, and with the most dreadful Cries, spreading a general Alarm.

The King, attended by the Prince of Wurtenberg, hastened to the Part where the Enemy attempted to enter. Our Foot, most of them in their Shirts, drew immediately up in excellent Order, with their Bandaliers and Swords as in a Day of Battle, and sustained all the Efforts of the Enemy, which they made on us very little more than half an Hour: For having stood one single Volley, they retreated in great Consusion, and at length ran away sull Speed. We suffered nothing more than the Loss of a few Horses, which got loose and ran after them; indeed their true Design was only to carry off our Cattle, which were grazing in the Front of our Camp: Several of them were wounded in the Attempt, but they took all away with them.

Though the Town of Leopol had lately renewed their Oath to King Augustus, they agreed to take another to King Stanislaus on his Arrival, and acceded folemnly to the Confederacy of Warsovia. The Nobility of the adiacent Parts followed their Example: and submitted to their new King; and as a Token of their Respect, returned to the King of Sweden thirty-two Swedes, who had been taken Prisoners at several Places. Caminski, the Governor, was afterwards fet at Liberty. and the Town as before committed to his Care, after he had sworn Fealty to King Stanislaus, in which he was followed by feventeen Officers and the whole Garrison, who all (except 80) Saxons who were carried Prisoners along with the Army) entered themselves in his Majesty's Service.

We fared well in the Neighbourhood of this City; it abounding with Provisions, excellent Fish, and noble Hungarian Wines, which were likewise cheap on the Account of its being situated so near that Kingdom.

When his Majesty had learnt that Schulenhourg had received new Troops from Saxony, he resolved to execute a Design of Importance: And as he had had no. Conveniences to remove the Cannon, which were found in the Arlenal of Leapol, he ordered them to be render'd unserviceable, as having a sufficient Number for his own Designs elsewhere.

After all was thus regulated in the City, his Majesty, the 13th of September, ordered the Infantry to march before him, and the next Morning he himself followed with all the Cavalry. The bad Roads and Defiles hindered us from marching above a League an Hour, till we arrived at a Village called Drobofiof: And on the Morrow, we could not reach above one more, to the Village of Maziachin; passing by the Town of Solkiew, where there is a Castle belonging to Prince Constantine Sobieski, and where he made his Residence.

The 16th, the Army marched to The Day following we Dobruzin. passed by the Town of Rawa to the Village of Rebenna, where the Peafants for Time immemorial, have a Knack of curing the Venereal Disease: For which Reason, all such as are infected with that detestable Malady, resort thither from all Corners of the Kingdom.

The King decamped from Rebenna, September 19, and marched on to Tomaschow, from thence to the Village of Labonie, near Zamosc, one of the strongest Places of Poland, having high Walls, a deep Ditch, and good, Fortifications; which encouraged the Lord of that Place, who is called Prince, to refuse a Passage to the Count de Stenbock in 1703, and even to the Troops of King Augustus this very, Year. Bur, when his Swedish Majesty appreached, he behaved in a quite different Manner: Sending his Brother to compliment the King, making the humblest Excuses possible with regard to the Count de Stenbeck; and when the Party which his Majesty had sent, under Lieutenant-Colonel Claes Bonde approached the Place, ordering the Gates to be inflantly opened. At the same Time the Garrison laid down their Arms, and the Burghers offered immediately to pay the fifty thousand Crowns, which had been demanded of them by way of Contribution to the Army.

It is impossible to express what the Troops suffered during this March: The Soil being flat and marshy, the Baggage was mired every Moment. and the wretched Inhabitants being all fled for the greatest Part of the Time, we were in Want of all Necessaries; especially, when the Cavalry had marched on before to Wingerow; for they devoured all before them, and for whole Days together we found nothing either to eat or drink.

From Zamosc the Army advanced to the Village of Mokerew, from thence to Dworizow, where the King leaving the Foot behind, to march more at Leisure, proceeded on before with the Cavalry, to Wisoiski.

General Rheinschild, whom King Stanislaus had rejoined, always act companied his Majesty. He had marched Sept. 7. from Cziesanow to Zanck, and the Day following to Kniespoli, where he rested till the 22d. when he fet out from Pilkowa, and the next Day for the little Town of Gorce. The 26th, he proceeded to Biskopi. and from thence, the 27th, to Kielklowice; where he was within a Quarter of a League of the King's Army, which lay on one hand of him, and the Vistula on the other.

Dd 2 Digitized by GOOGIC which

September 27, his Swedish Majesty decamped with the Cavalry from Wisoiski, and marched on to the Village of Strzizewice.: The next Morning to Belcice, where the Reformed have a Church, thence to the Village of Palike, some Leagues distant from Lublin, where the Count de Stenbock was posted with a large Detachment to furnish the Army with Previsions. The 30th, the King proceeded by Rekzin to Baranow, where they hastily threw a Bridge across the Wieper; over which they passed on to the Village of Dronezow, which is half a League farther.

About this Time King Augustus lay with all his Forces on the other Side of the Bug, in the Neighbourhood of Pultowsk, from whence his Parties made continual Excursions as far as Lublin, to be the better assured of what Route his Swedish Majesty had taken. Our Detachments often rencounter'd theirs, and always with Advantage, carrying off many Prisoners.

The Count de Stenbock arrived Ostober 2, with his Detachment, which he had conducted from Leopol by the City of Lublin; not without being harassed on the Road, a great Party of Valoches having, that very Day, attacked his Buggage near Baranow; but were so briskly received, that after many of them were killed and wounded, they were obliged to retire in the greatest Confusion.

His Majesty having learnt by the Polish and Saxon Prisoners, which our Detachments brought in every Day to the Camp, in what Manner King Augustus had disposed his Quarters in the Neighbourhood of Pulsowsk, refolved to repair thither as fast as possible: Accordingly, Ostober 4. he marched to Zelikow; thence, the next Day to Lepini; and the next to Wingorow, a little Town, where a Handful of Lutberans have a Church.

The King having learnt, as well by the Inhabitants as a Saxon Captain of Horse (who had delayed too long following his Detachments, and who was made Prisoner with six other of his Troop) that a Party of Saxons had marched by Night out of Wingerow, detached in the Evening Colonel Creutz, with nine hundred Horse in Pursuit of them. The King, himself followed, accompanied by Prince of Wurtenberg, and, after having marched all Night, arrived early in the Morning at Wiskowa, where he had hoped to furprize them. But the Saxons, who were commanded by Colonel Heuschin, had discovered the Net, and already repassed the Bug, leaving only a few Valets, and Baggage Boys behind them. The King then posted himself in a little Town called Caminiez, fituated on the Side of the River, and as the Water was very low, he passed over a Detachment of Valoches, who advanced even to Pullowsk, and returned with certain Prisoners.

King Augustus, terrified at the Approach of the Swedes, immediately refolved to quit a Place which had been so satal to him the Year before, and marching to the Side of the Vistula opposite to Wischegorod, caused a Bridge to be thrown over, which he passed forthwith, and afterwards assembled his Army in the Neighbourhood of the little Towns.

October

October 7. His Swedish Majesty having left Colonel Creutz and his Detachment at Caminiez, returned to Wingerow, accompanied by the Prince of Wurtenberg and certain Officers: Where having no Troops but Horse, the Infantry not having had Time to come up, he took the whole Body with him in the Morning, and after a toilsome March of nine Leagues, reached Radzimin, which is but three Leagues from Warfovia, being all the Way in Hopes of furprizing King Augustus, and forcing him to a Battle.

To this End, when he was at Radzimin, he pushed on with four Regiments of Dragoons, the nearest Way towards the Bug. Where, when he was arrived, and saw on the opposite Side a strong Guard of Saxons, he ordered Lieutenant-Colonel Funk with certain Foot to pass the River in little Boats to dislodge them, and post themfelves on the same Spot; which they did after a very flight Resistance, the Enemy having one Captain, and certain Soldiers killed. A Bridge was then immediately thrown across the River; over which Colonel Ducker passed with two Regiments of Dragoons, detaching Parties on all Sides to discover the Enemy; who, on their Return, reported that they were retired in great Confusion over the Vistula, having broke down the Bridge behind them.

King Stanislaus, with General Rheinschild and his Army of twelve Regiments, were now arrived at Praag, a Suburb of Warlaw. They had paised by the Town of Belcice to Konskavice, and arrived October 1. at Kosmin, a little Town on the River Weips; the 2d, they proceeded to Richella, the 3d, to Walazulakowska; the 4th, to Latavice; the 5th, to Kaluzino; the 6th, to Minsko; the 8th, to Okumow, with the Cavalry; and the 10th, King Stanislaus and General Rheinschild arrived at Praag. They were soon after followed by the Infantry of the King's Army, which had been retarded in their Rout, as we have seen, by the bad Roads from the City of Leopol.

General Stenbock also arrived at Praag with his Detachment, and all these Regiments posted themselves in the Adjacencies, as fast as they arrived. Of which when the King was informed, he posted to Praag, and ordered all the necessary Preparations to be made for throwing two Bridges over the Vistula.

King Augustus, on his Side, being exactly opposite to Warsaw, exerted himself to the utmost to render the Passage both difficult and dangerous. For which Purpose he ordered his Troops to work Night and Day, in fortifying two little Islands in the Vistula, which are situated at the two Extremes of the City, causing an * Epaulement to be stretched along the River from one to the other. And at the same Time commanding Parties to patrol round and round the City of Warsaw, at the Distance of five or six Leagues: From whence, if we might judge by Appearances, this Passage would become a fecond Controverly of the Duna.

As our Parties, after the exactest Search for a proper Place to pass the

Vistala, had found one, about four Leagues above Warfaw, where the Enemy was posted in a little Island, with some Infantry, and two Pieces of Cannon, a Detachment was sent thither under the Umbrage of a dark Night, who surprized them, and almost cut the whole Party in Pieces; taking two Lieutenants and fifteen Soldiers Prisoners, and carrying off their two Pieces of Cannon.

Tho' the two Armies were near enough to talk to each other, that of Saxony hardly ever fired upon us, and ours never upon them.

It is proper to remark here, that, as King Augustus visited every Day on Horseback the Works he had ordered, he once happened to come in Sight of his Swedish Majesty, and King Stanislaus, who were likewise on Horseback on our Side of the Vistula, opposite to an Island where the Saxons had a Battery. It happened too that they stopped, as if by Consent, at the same Time; during which Interval, the Officers in the Train of these Princes, held a Conference with each other, and when it ended, took their Leaves on both Sides with great Politeness; neither of the Monarchs interfering, or making themselves known. *

When the Bridges were finished in a Manner that enabled us to march over the Troops in what Part of the River we would, his Majesty made Choice of one about four Leagues above Warlaw, near to the Village of Kartziow, at a small Distance from Hoffock, a very fine Estate, with a Castle, which belong to the Bielinski; and gave Orders, Ollober 7. to all the nearest Regiments. both Horse and Foot, to repair thither; the rest being commanded to march strait to Prag. Which was done towards Night. One of these Bridges was likewise instantly conducted upon fifty Waggons to the fame Place, with a sufficient Train of Artillery, which last was properly disposed to scour the other Side of the River.

The King of Sweden and King Stanislaus, accompanied by Prince Alexander Sobieski, and the Princes of Saxe-Gotha and Wurtenberg, took the firstmentioned Route. Lieutenant-General Nils Stromberg was left commanding Officer of the Troops at Praag, and to take Care of the Bridge which was to be thrown over here; having with him Count Piper, the Chancery, and the Court.

In the Morning, before Day-break, their Majesties arrived with the Column of the Army at Kartziow, where Colonel Burenskiold had posted himself over Night. And as soon as the Dawn "appeared.

^{*} Hitherto the Story of this Interview has been told in the following Manner: The King of Saveden, fry they, King Staniflaus, and the Prince of Wurtenberg, being in an Island upon the Villula, King Augustus appeared with his Chamberlain Vitzthum on the opposite Shore, and cried out in German to the Swedes: Will not you fee over to us Gentlemen? The King of Sweden replied, We are not such Rascals as to desert. To which Vizzibum added, Is your King among you? And was answered by the Page Klinckowitrom, Yes, here he is, pointing to his Majesty. Vinthum is then said to have enquired after many Persons he was acquainted with in the Court of Sweden, and after having had his Questions refolved, ended in French: Gentlemen, we expect you. To which the Page rejoined, Speak Gontlemen. And King Augustus then pulling off his Hat, and Taving, Be absolute. Gentlemen actien! the Converfition ended - It is not impossible but the Fact really was as it is here related: But, in my Father's Journal, no Mention is made of the King's having shared in the Dialogue, which better agrees with the Char éter of Charles XII. Digitized by GOOS appeared, the Foot were ordered to file off towards the Viftula, and make ready the Bridge without Delay.

Upon these Motion's, the Crown-Referendary, who fince the King's Departure from Leopol had followed our Army, with a View to harrass it on its March, seeing the Infantry making towards the River, made an Attempt to pillage the Baggage. But the King hastening thither with the Cavalry, at the first Fire so effectually furrounded the Poles, that they cut to Pieces almost one Company entire, who could not fave themselves quick enough, and took the rest Prisoners, together with the Captain who commanded them.

The Saxons, who had a Guard of an hundred and fifty Men on the other Side, behind an Epaulement, and the Redoubts they had raised, hearing the Report of Fire Arms of our Side, did not fail to advertise the other Troops to advance, which they did, on all Sides, at full Speed; ranging themfelves in a Wood, some hundreds of Paces from the Banks of the River. which, on their Side was flat and fandy, to cover themselves from our Cannon.

As the Shore we possessed was much higher than theirs, the King, who observed this Caution of the Enemy, caus'd certain Field-Pieces to be planted on an Eminence, while the Affair of the Bridge was on Agitation, which fo effectually played upon their Epaulements and other Works, and commanded the Plain beyond them, that many being demolished, the Troops behind retreated to the Woods to join their Cavalry; which we likewife cannonaded next, and with fuch Success, that they were obliged, to penetrate. yet farther in for Shelter.

About Noon, the Bridge being compleated, his Majesty order'd a Lieutenant of his Guards, with thirty Granadiers, to embark on Boats, and fasten it on the other Side; which they effected: But the Current of the Vistula being become exceeding rapid by heavy Rains, and the Waters difcharged from the Hungarian Mountains, broke it off in the Middle, the King with a hundred Men being at that Instant upon it; seventy of which, together with his Majesty, swimming back to our own Shore, the other thirty joined the Granadier Guards who were posted on the other Side; remaining exposed to the Insults of the Enemy, (but who, nevertheless durst not venture to attack them) till the King had ordered over more of the Infantry in Boats and Rafts to join Towards the Evening his Majesty crossed the River himself, and lay on the Sand all Night, by a Treefide, surrounded by his Soldiers; while the rest of the Infantry were ferrying over to join him.

The 19th, at Day-break, the King without waiting for the Remainder of the Foot, put himself at the Head of his Regiment of Guards and that of Upland, to attack the Enemy in the Wood, where they had sheltered themfelves; but they had provided better for their Safety long before. His Majesty then resolved to proceed strait on to Warsaw, marching himself on Foot, three Leagues, as far as Golliof; where he re-assembled his Infantry, which had been transported without Intermission from Karziow.

The King was still in Hopes to fall in with the Enemy at Warsaw, and had in View, besides, to facilitate, by his Approach, the Passage of General Stromberg. But King Augustus was already far removed, having sent away his Baggage several Days before, and caused his Army to file off, Regiment after Regiment, by the Road of Rava, towards Silesia.

General Stromberg, on his Part, had not delayed his Endeavours to throw a Bridge over the Vifula, but with much the same Success as the former; the Rasts to which it was fastened not being able to resist the Violence of the Torrent: However, by the Help of a great Number of Boats, it was so well repaired, that it held out till the whole Army and Biggage were passed over: The first Troops that were landed, taking instant Possession of the Castle, by the General's Order.

When his Majesty was informed of the Retreat of King Augustus, he wheeled with a Body of Infantry towards Tarkzin, several Regiments joining him on the Road. At the same Time General Rheinschild was ordered to march with the Cavalry, which had been transported near Karziow to Novamiaste, while the rest, which remained at Karziow, under the Command of General Welling, returned back to Pracy with the Drabans, there to pass the Vistula. But this could not be executed immediately, because of the Breaking of the Bridge, as above mentioned.

The King took the Opportunity of this Delay, to make a Tour towards the Evening to Warfaw, to hasten the Reparations of that City; and after he had given the proper Orders for the March, he set out immediately to rejoin his Infantry; with whom he proceeded the next Morning, Ostober 20. towards Selcke, where he gave Orders to the rest of the Infantry to advance strait on to Rava; it being conjectured King Augustus had pursued that Road to Cracow, because we had taken many Saxon Prisoners, who were passing thither-ward.

The 21st, the King marched from Selcke to Lencice, where, leaving the Infantry, and accompanied only with the Prince of Wurtenberg, and certain Officers, he passed on the same Night almost from Novamiaste to Gostania, where General Rheinschild was already advanced with his Cavalry.

The same Day General Welling, after having passed the Visula, marched on with the rest of the Cavalry from Warsaw to Naderczin, in his Way to Rava.

As to General Stromberg, he staid at Warfaw with several Regiments of Infantry, till the Baggage and Artillery had passed the Visula; after which he followed the Army.

The King having learnt that the Saxons, after having first taken the Road to Rava, had changed their Rout for Lowitz, resolving to pursue them thither. Accordingly, his Majesty, accompanied by King Stanislaus and the Princes of Saxe and Wurtenberg, marched with the Cavalry, the first Day, as far as Drezow, surprizing in the Road many Saxons and Muscovites, the first of which were made Prisoners, and the last put to the Sword.

General Welling marched five Leagues, the fame Day, to Savadia, and the next, fix and a half to Drezow. From hence he proceeded to the little Town Town of Piontek, situated in a Morass, on the River Bsura, where he suprized the Enemy's Rear, consisting of three hundred Horse who were totally defeated, and the greatest Part slain. One Major being made Prisoner, and sixty Troopers, who had not Time enough to get on Horseback. One of King Augustus's Drabans, carged with a Letter to Field-Marshal Steinau, had likewise the same Fate.

The 24th, the King rested the Night near Piontek, where the Enemy was encamped, and renewed his March next Morning by Break of Day. Proceeding on to Uniejow, a little Town in the Palatinate of Lencie in Great Poland, where our Van again surprized the Enemy's Rear, which retired before us with all possible Speed, and passed over the Warta: It being impracticable to follow them, because of the Darkness of the Night. General Welling advanced the same Day to Piontek, and in the Morning early arrived at Uniejow.

It was at that Place King Augustus separated himself from his Army, which he submitted to the Command of Lieutenant General Schulenbourg, and marched towards Cracow with two thousand Horse, in the Hope to engage the King of Sweden in his Pursuit; and thereby preserve his Infantry, who could retreat no farther, on Account of the dreadful Marches they had already made. But his Majesty was too much a Master in the Art of War to be drawn into that Snare; concluding it immediately to be but a Feint, and resolving to follow Schulenbourg only; which he did the same Day, the 25th, to Karietz. In the next Morning we pushed on to Calis, where the Enemy's Rear was in View, which immediately passed over a Bridge through the Town, leaving but a Handful of Men behind, who took up the Bridge in order to retard our Passage.

Upon which the King ordered a Troop of Dragoons to alight, and make themselves Masters of the Gate, while he himself, with the Cavalry, forded the little River of Polna to the other Side of the Town, having commanded Colonel Ducker to hew down the Gate by main Force. Which was immediately put in Execution: But while all Hands were at work, certain Saxons, to whom we had already promised Quarter, being retired to an old ruined House, one of them fired at he Page Klinkowstrom, who was on Horseback by the Side of Colonel Ducker, and killed him on the Spot. As the King had a great Affection for him, he was extremely touched for his Loss; and gave an uncommon Proof of it, in ordering the Corpse of the Deceased to be carried after the Camp; which gave Place to a Report through the. Army, that the young Prince of Wurtenberg was killed.

Colonel Riebe, a Captain of Horse, three Lieutenants, and about fifty Soldiers, were made Prisoners in the Town, without reckoning those who were put to the Sword, when it was taken. That Day General Welling marched five Leagues to Zatschir, where he lest Colonel Buchwald behind to reassemble those who had not been able to keep up with the rest.

The 27th, we continued our March to Raskow, and from thence to Krotoczin, where the Saxons were preparing to encamp, in order to pass the Night;

not being able to imagine the Swedes could be so near them: But set out again immediately, and marched all Night long, till they believed they were in Safety. Nevertheless, they lost Numbers of their Men in this precipitate Retreat; sometimes ten, sometimes twenty, and sometimes a hundred, who could not keep up with their Corps, throwing down their Arms on the Appearance of one single Blue-coat. Two Scouts, among other Instances, taking twenty-five Prisoners at once.

The same Day, General Welling marched fix Leagues through Calis to making likewise a great Number of Prisoners upon the Road. But the more speedily Schulenbourg flew, the more eagerly the King followed; advancing, Ostober 28, in the Morning, five Leagues, through Cobelin to Poniec, or Punitz, upon the Frontiers of Silefia, where our Van defeated their Rear at the first Onset; and pushed the Advantage so home, without giving them Time to rally, that Schulenbourg, seeing no farther Possibility to escape, found himself obliged to face about.

He had with him twelve Battalions and four Squadrons, which he ranged immediately in order of Battle. His Left being covered by the Village of Punitz, and his Right by a great and deep Marsh. In his Front he had a Ditch, behind which he placed a Number of Waggons, and in the Intervals his Artillery.

It was already late, when the two Armies came in Sight of each other; the King, nevertheless, resolved to begin the Attack, though he had with him but sour Regiments, that is to fay, the Dragoons of Rheinschild, Crassau, Ducker, and Ornstedt, all extremely tired with so severe a March. The five other Regiments, which the King had sent Orders to hasten, not coming up till some Time after.

We immediately attacked the Saxon Cavalry, Sword in Hand, so briskly, that, at the first Shock, they were drove in Confusion upon the Infantry who followed them: Entire Battalions of the last throwing themselves on the Earth, to give them Way, as likewise to our Troops who pursued them eagerly a good Way beyond.

While the Enemy's Cavalry was thus flying full speed, their Foot recovered themselves, and performed their Duty extremely well. Our Horse attacked them with all imaginable Fury, and, in spite of the terrible Fire which they made, and the disadvantageous Situation of so many Ditches and ploughed Grounds, broke their Lines three feveral Times, and had totally defeated them, if the extreme Darkness of the Night had not prevented it. To which must be added, that the Flashes of Fire from the Muskets, so greatly terrified the Horses, that some of our Squadrons were put in Diforder.

The other Regiments coming up that Moment, we began to rally our feattered Troops, and prepare for a new Attack. But the Generals thought it their Duty to represent to the King, that the Darkness hindering the proper Dispositions, it would be impossible to succeed in it; and that therefore it was adviseable to postpone it till the Morning.

Schulenbourg, who expected the King would order his Cavalry to alight, alight, and saw nothing of that Nature take Place, instantly formed a square Battalion of all his Insantry, and began his Retreat through the Village of Punitz, which was on his Left. The King, who from the first apprehended the General would take that very Measure, had ordered certain Troops to way-lay the Enemy, and oppose their Retreat. But the Officer, who commanded that Party, missing the Road in the Dark, the Saxons had Leisure to retire to Gurau, a little Town about three Leagues from the Field of Battle.

The King, who depended much on that Officer, was greatly surprized in the Night, at the profound Tranquillity that seemed to reign in the Village; whence it was manifest that the Enemy was both retired, and already far off. Uneasy at this, he set out himself to examine what had happened, and found that the Officer, instead of investing the Village on the other Side, had lost himself by the Foot of a little Hill, and thereby-left the Way open to the Enemy. His Majesty appeared fomewhat thoughtful upon this Incident; but, without witnessing the least Discontent, continued marching his Troops into the Village till Morning; when Numbers more of fick and wounded Saxons were made Prisoners, and a great Part of the Enemy's Baggage, which they had left in their Hurry, together with three Fieldpieces, fell into our Hands.

There were above two hundred Saxon Foot, and fixty of their Cavalry killed, without reckoning their Officers. We had a hundred killed, besides certain Captains, and about a hundred more wounded: Among which were

Colonel Patkul, the Aides-de-Camp-General Carl Hard, and Count Tor-Stenson, and Major During of the Regiment of Crassau. One Captain, named Ehrenspreuss, whose Horse was killed under him, was taken Prisoner. We likewise lost a Pair of Kettle-Drums, and certain Standards, when the Fire of the Musqueteers put us in Disorder, as before related. The Horse fuffered much in that Action, and many of them were killed. The same Day, General Welling marched to Gobelin, six Leagues. The 29th, the Army did not decamp till broad Daylight; but this did not, however, put a Stop to the Pursuit of the Saxons, who were now divided into many small Parties, the better to conceal the Rout, which the main Body of their Infantry had taken.

The King, having left Colonel Crassau at Punitz with his Regiment of Dragoons, to guard the Prisoners and the Wounded, and passing near the little Town of Gura, where Schulenbourg had passed at Midnight, we marched strait on to Ritzen in Silesia, and from thence through the Pass called Bartisch, making Abundance of Though it Prisoners in the Road. were extremely difficult to restrain the Valoches, who marched in the Van, from their usual Custom of putting all the Enemies they met with to the Sword, the King forbid it on such severe Penalties, that Quarter was not only given to all who were taken, but they were even treated with Humanity.

The Saxons pushed on their March fo precipitately, that during the Night and the next Morning, they had gained fix Leagues upon a Stretch; in-E e 2 fomuch, fomuch, that they arrived early in the Evening near the Oder, where they instantly began (under the Favour of a little Hill, and a Causey, which covered them) to pass that River, at the Instant when our Squadrons arrived in the Neighbourhood of Lutz-ki.

The Darkness, which now came on, was exceeding friendly to the Defigns of the Enemy, who spent the whole Night in passing over, (though many of them were drowned by the Way) without any Disturbance from us, there being no possibility of attacking them with Success. Whence General Schulenhourg (who, from his Entry into Poland, had beforehand studied the Manner of his Retreat, and was besides better acquainted than we with the Course of the Country) found Means to escape the most lively and tenacious Pursuit, that ever was upon Record. All the old Officers, on both Sides, acknowledging they had never feen any thing like it, either for the Length, or the Vigour with which our Cavalry had attacked the Enemy's Foot.

His Majesty rested that Night near the Village of Krangelwitz, and, as he was now in the Territories of the Empire, he ordered ready Money to be payed for Forage and Provisions of all Sorts.

The same Day, General Welling marched on to Sembrowa, near Lissa, and, having been informed that a Party of Muscovites was but a little Way off, detached, in the Evening, Count Erich Lowenhaupt, Lieutenant-Colonel of the Regiment of Stenbock, who put fifty or sixty of them to the Sword, and took twelve Prisoners, with certain Waggons.

The 30th, the King rested at Krangelwitz, as well because it was Sunday, as to refresh his Men and their Horses, who were inexpressibly fatigued.

General Welling proceeded that Day to Frauenstadt, and on the Morrow, his Van rencounter'd the Russians, marching in Platoons from ten to forty in a Body, who were all put to the Sword: The Swedes still treading on the Heels of those before, till at last they surprized the whole Party to which they belonged, in a Village above Frauenstadt.

As our Van was not strong enough to attack them, they had Time to barricade themselves within their Waggons, under the Cover of eleven Pieces of Brass Cannon. But when General Welling came up with his whole Force, he charged them immediately, in spite of the Fire of their Cannon and small Arms, both with his Horse, and a large Body of Dragoons on Foot, driving them from one House to another, and at last setting Fire to the Houses themselves, where they were all destroyed except one Major, one Lieutenant, and four Soldiers, who received Quarter; all their Buggage being pillaged by the Soldiers.

At first we did not believe that above fix or seven hundred Russians had been slain; but the Burgomaster who had them buried, reckoned nine hundred and twelve, exclusive of those who perished in the Flames.

Some Days after, we discovered certain others, who had hid themselves, and were now made Prisoners. Among whom were one Subaltern, and twelve Soldiers, Soldiers, who, having the Honour to perform their Exercise before the King, his Majesty was so pleased with them, that he took them into his Service, and they afterwards belonged to his Stables.

We lost in this Action Count Erich Lowenbaups, Lieutenant-Colonel, a Captain of Horse, a Quarter-Master, and twenty Men. Colonel Burenskield, two Captains of Horse, and about sorty Men being wounded. General Welling designed to have advanced yet farther in the Morning; but the King having enjoined him to continue there till farther Orders, he quartered his Men in Frauenstadt, and the neighbouring Villages.

King Augustus having remarked at his quitting Warsaw, that the King of Sweden's Design was fixed on pursuing him, sent Orders to Patkul to raise the Siege of Posnania. Which he obeyed forthwith, dividing his Army into several Corps, and making all possible Haste into Silesa: One of which had the Missortune to be deseated in the Rencontre, before spoken of. And here it will not be impertinent to introduce the following curious Piece relating to that Siege.

Extracts from a very circumstantial fournal, writ by the Baron de Mardefeld, Major-General, touching what passed before, and during the Siege of Posnania, An. 1704.

When I learned from Breflau, that the Saxon Troops affembled themselves near Guben, and was entirely persuaded they would fall upon Great Poland, to the apparent Hazard of Posnania, the fortifying of which had been stopped ever fince Autumn, by express Order from the King, I resolved to repair thither: And to much the more, as I could neither join General Rheinschild, who was at that Time encamped near Sendomir, nor the Army under my Command. Being convinced, beside, that in one Sovereign's Service all Places were alike, and that a Man ought not to sit with his Arms across, when he sound an Opportunity to be useful.

On these Considerations I set out for Posnania, and arrived there May 17. In passing by Lissa, I had already learnt that several Polish Companies, and about a hundred Saxons, encamped at Calis, had received Orders to march to Posnania. And, at my Arrival, Colonel Lilliebok confirmed the same Thing; as likewise, that the Saxon Army was on the point of passing the Oder, to the Number of fixteen thousand Men; according to the Report of our Correspondents at Breslau, at Berlin, and from Count Mellin, Field-Marshal and Governor of Pomerania.

The first Thing we did, therefore, was to send out a Detachment of Horse and Foot, who surnished us with sixty Head of Cattle, and three hundred Sheep. Some Days after Smigelski carried off our Officers Horses, which were sent out to forage. We immediately dispatched a Party both of Horse and Foot to recover them, but as the Enemy had already gained the Wood, it was not possible to overtake him.

The Day before, the Regimentary Dobrosolski arrived in the Evening, (with three hundred Polish Horse, who encamped at Swarizens, a large League League from Posnania) and offered himself, as soon as he had heard of the Exploit of Smigelski, to pursue him. I asked him, how he thought he should be able to come up with him? To which he replied, That as he had not been pursued, he would not fail to send his Horses to forage on the Side of Cossyn, six Leagues from Posnania, and that, if I would furnish him with only a hundred Horse of the Garrison to support him, he would answer for the Success.

Upon this I agreed to his Request; but as I could not entirely depend upon the Poles, I gave the Command of the Detachment to Lieutenant Colonel Hagen, in the Service of Holstein Gottorp; who had not only the Happiness to overtake Smigelski, but defeat him, though he had sixty Saxon Troopers with him, pursuing him even to Costyn, and taking several Poles and Saxons Prisoners. But, as to the Horses they were totally lost, Smigelski having sent them on before.

Some Days after, having received Letters from Lieutenant-General Horn at Warfaw, recommending to me that Regimentary, who lay by to refresh himself and his Men in Expectation of their Arrival, I resolved with Colonel Lillieboek to surprize Costyn. Accordingly, Lieutenant-Colonel Waidenbeim marched thither with three hundred Foot, three Field-pieces, and a hundred and thirty Horse of the Garrifon, together with Dobrofolski and his Polanders. But the Enemy having received Notice of our Defign, and put themselves on their Guard, the Situation of Costyn almost surrounded with a Marsh, being besides very advantgeous for the Defendants, the whole Party returned without attempting any Thing. And, a few Days after, that Regimentary received Orders from the Crown General Lubomirski, to repair to Warsaw at the approaching Election.

The Governor Lillieboek, during this Interval, busied himself in filling the Magazines, and took all his Meafures with great Prudence. But, as he was extremely folicitous to be provided against all Events, it was with extreme Regret he faw himself obliged by his Majesty's Orders to exact no more Contributions, or lay in any farther Provisions: Which were so much the more afflicting, as the Stock in hand were not sufficient to support the Garrison for any Time; as the Saxon Army approached, and Smigelski continually harassed our Foragers.

Our Garrison consisted but of six hundred Foot, and some hundreds of Horse. We had but ten little Pieces of Brass Cannon, three Pounders, which we found in the City when it first fell into our Hands, and which were a Present of the late King of Sweden to Galetski, at the Time of his Embassy in that Kingdom; the other five Brass Cannon having been sent away to the Army. We had but one Cannonier, who was a Soldier in the Regiment of Lillieboek. What Powder we had was sent from General Rheinschild's Army, no settled Resolution having been taken to keep a Garrison in Posnania. And, to compleat our Misfortune, all the Fortifications, by the King's express Command were neglected, and suffered to fall to Ruin; particularly the Front of the Gate of Breflan, from whence we could could fire but with one fingle Cannon; And as to the Demi-bastion of Gerberschantz, it had none at all.

We had begun a Work before Autumn, to the Left of the Jesuit's Cloyster, where the City is almost open and without Defence; but it was not half finished, and it was high Time to take some Precautions on that Side, even to prevent a Surprize; and in case the Enemy afforded Leisure, to work upon it by Degrees, till it was become defensible; at least, till we could procure Succours from Polish-Prussia.

The Garrison, however small in Proportion to the Extent of the Place, worked nevertheless with all imaginable Ardour on the Fortifications; our first Task being to heighten them with a Parapet. We then erected two Traverses in the Gate of Breslaw, under the Arch, placed in fuch a Manner, that we could pass beside them; and then a third in the Street within the Gate. In short, we negiected nothing to fecure the Place from being cheaply When we had made all these WOD. Preparations, the Governor and I took Care to inform his Majesty of the Approach of the Enemy, and how much we wanted a Reinforcement.

While these Things were transacting, the Poles appeared one Morning, and carried off two Centinels, and certain Cartle; just as the Piquet of Horse, posted there to guard them, was going to relieve them. But even these were forced to retire towards the City, upon the Approach of a greater Number of the Enemy.

Upon this Captain Wrangel sallied out with about a hundred Horse, accompanied by a Subaltern called Ring, at the Head of twenty Voluntiers, who had resolved to do their utmost for the Recovery of the Cattle we had loft. Being alarmed at this, I mounted on Horseback to see what was doing, and met at the City-gate a Captain with certain Infantry, whom I posted at the End of the Street in the Suburbs, behind certain Hedges, to hinder the Enemy from entering there, and cutting off our Retreat.

I then followed our Cavalry at full Speed, who purfued the Poles brifkly, together with the twenty Voluntiers; but these last regarding no Sort of Order, I made it my Bufiness to form them, and in the Interval I perceived that our Cavalry made a sudden Halt; and likewise that Captain Wrangel galloped towards me, making Signs with his Hat that he stood in need of Succour. I presently made up to him, and observing three stout Squadrons behind the Mountain, on the Edge of the Wood, I posted the twenty Voluntiers in a Garden near the Village of Wilda, which is close to the Suburbs; and, at the fame Time, ranged the Cavalry, commanded by the two Captains Wrangel and Benkeritz, in Front of the Village.

As the Cattle was already far off, under the Cover of the Wood, where it was impossible to recover them, I kept my Post a full Quarter of an Hour, during which the Poles approached us from Time to Time, to draw us out to Combat; but the Saxon Squadrons made no Advances at all. Having femt to the Governor to order more Infantry into the Suburbs, and he requesting me to make my Retreat back to the City; I took his Advice, and withdrew about three hundred Paces, ordering the Captain whom I had posted in the Suburbs, to retire into the City, when he should see me make my second Movement.

But, in the Instant that I was putting this in Execution, I heard a firing in the Suburbs, and foon perceived the Captain was actually engaged with the Poles. Upon which he hastened to second him; but the Saxon Dragoons, who were already alighted, remounted instantly, and made off, together with the Poles, before we could come up. I reproved the Officer for advancing beyond his Orders, but he thought he had behaved well; because he had killed certain of the Enemy, without losing one Man of his own. In short, one Coporal, of the Regiment de Crassau, who was killed in the Beginning of the Skirmish, was all the Loss we suffered on this Occasion.

Mr. de Lillieboek and I did not fail to acquaint his Majesty and General Rheinschild with the Motions of the Enemy, who held us always blocked up, though at a Distance. At last the Governor received a Letter from Major-General Meyerfeld at Dantzick, June 7. in which he certified, that being commanded by his Majesty to march towards Posnania with three Regiments, he intreated him to lay in the necessary Quantity of Provisions for them. This News was very agreeable to us, but we kept it a profound Secret; and only gave Orders for providing the Bread, according to the General's Desire. But as those Troops were long retaded, we were obliged to distribute the Bread prepared for them among the Garrison; who were not very well pleased with it neither, because it had already began to be mouldy. At last we received Letters from Major-General Meyerfeld, dated at Thorn, in which he promised to relieve us without Delay.

The Saxons, commanded by Lieutenant-General Schulenbourg, were posted from the Town of Meseritz all along the Frontiers of Silesia. They had exacted excessive Contributions from the City of Lissa, which belonged to King Stanislaus, and had Garrisons at Costyn, and at Frauenstadt, where they had filled a Magazine. One Part of their Army was already advanced as far as Zaun; but as ours commanded by General Rheinschild hindered them from joining King Augustus at Cracow, they took a Resolution to return back again.

The General of Great Poland, Radomyki, and his Brother the Constable of Posnania, together with Smigelski, and several other Polish Parties, having now joined the Saxons, they took Possession of all the Places and important Passes upon the Warta, put a stout Garrison at Notetz, and another in the Castle of Wielun, which belonged to the Starost Sapieba. All which they afterwards abandoned, having first committed the most horrible Excesses.

We had often News from Meyerfeld, who at last arrived with the three Regiments; his own, that of Taube's, both Dragoons, and the Regiment of Sania, Horse, which was commanded by Colonel Gustavus Horn. This last consisted but of six hundred Men, two hundred having been sent to Warsaw, and several other Parties to other Places; so that the whole Reinforcement did not amount to above two thousand Men. They encamped about taja on the Right; and the Governor was obliged to furnish them with Profor his own People.

Some Days after the Atrival of these Troops, I was seized with a Fever, and, though I did my utmost to bear up, and made a Shift to pay a Visit to Major-General Meyerfeld in his Camp, I foon found myself obliged to keep my Bed, which gave me the more Pain, as I faw myself disabled from ferving his Majesty, according to my Hopes, or even to review the Regiments, according his Majosty's Or-. ders.

General Mererfeld failed not, together with his Colonels, to advise with me every Day upon what was fit to be done; and I, on my Side, expressed my Concern that the Succours he brought were too feeble to look the Enemy in the Face, who were, at leaft, twice as ftrong. However, as, upon mature Deliberation, it feemed of Importance to us to know the precife Number of the Enemy, and, at the same Time, with as little Hazard as possible, July 29. Meyerfeld dispatched a Subaltern of the Regiment of Breme, together with a Corporal and ten Men to go upon the Disco-

The same Night, a Deserter of Bareuth's Regiment of Horse, brought us the News, that the Saxons were in full March with two thousand Foot, and almost as many Cavalry, to furprize our Succours; and that they were already on the Point of passing the Warte. Upon this, as the Instance of Meyerfeld, Lieutenant-Colonel Wai-

a Quarter of a League from the City dealers with three hundred Foot, two on a Line, having the Village of Ra- | Field-Pieces, and all the Cavalry, received Orders to join his Corps.

As I was ill a-bed during this Acvisions, though he had little enough tion, it is not possible for me to give a Detail of it. It began at Day-break, and lasted three Hours; when certain Squadrohs came, in Confusion, towards the City, among whom was Major-General Meyerfeld himself, and the Colonels Horn and Waidenbeim, all demanding the Gates to be opened.

> The Governor at first refused it, and recommending to them to return to their Duty, as having no Provisions for their Support; but at last consented to their Admission, that they might a little recover their Disorder. had no News of Colonel Taube or Lieutenant-Colonel Trautsetter, we believed them dead, and their Troops dispers'd.

We were in this Incertainty for three Hours, at the End of which they returned; the first of them wounded, and reported the Enemy was buly in plundering the Camp, all in Disorder, and that an Opportunity offered of returning the Affront we had received. Upon this the Major-General ordered them to found to Horse, and sallied out in Search of the Enemy, who were by this Time retired, and had already reached the neighbouring Woods.

Meyerfeld then encamped a short League from the City, from whence he marched in the Morning towards Guelen and Lowitz, and thence to Thorn. The Baggage followed a Day after, under a strong Guard; and thus were we left with only a hundred Men of all this Reinforcement, whose Horses were killed, and they therefelves felves wounded; among which were Colonel Taube, Lieutenant Colonel Grosbusen, Wauber and Cronberg, Captains of Horse, and some others.

Some Days after the whole Saxon Army arrived, under the Command of Field-Marshal Schulenbourg, and posted themselves near the Warta, about half a League above Posnania. It consisted of twelve Battalions and sixty Squadrons, neither of which exceeded an ordinary Company. They had no Artillery but Field pieces; and, for their first Enterprize, began to throw a Bridge over the Warta.

In which Interval, they several Times fent a Trumpet into the City, with Letters to the Governor, for the Exchange of Prisoners. But we at first resuled to hear their Messages, without an express Order from the King: But, as his Majesty was far off, as we had above a hundred Saxons Prisoners, who demanded a large Guard, and confumed a great deal of Provisions; as, on the other hand, we should enlarge many of our own People, and at the same Time recruit our Garrison, the Governor, after having demanded my Consent, entered upon the Exchange. The Prisoners on both Sides, except Trepha and his Companions, whom he detained, being all discharged.

The Enemy's Army, nevertheless, continued to make its Approaches every Day, and held us blocked up on all Sides. A Party of their infantry were posted behind the Cloyster, and possessed the cathedral Church which is without the City. We learned, in the mean Time, that they were collecting large Quantities of Fascines. And one Night they came to examine the Ditch of Gerbarschung, but we fired upon them so briskly, that they made off as fast as possible.

The whole Garrison continued all that Night on the Ramparts, every one in his proper Post; which was then but a Pleasure, because the Weather was so exceeding fine: And a Surprize was what we dreaded more than a formal Siege, because the Artillery of the Enemy, which were but certain Field-pieces, were not able to make a Breach.

While we thus lived in a fort of Truce, we beheld all at once, Sept. 3. the whole Army of the Enemy marching with all their Baggage in two Columns, in the Road to Wresnia. We were also informed, that the Enemy had not left above a hundred Men, both Horse and Foot, under the Command of General Radomicki, near the Bridge of Warta.

Two Days after I learned farther, that all the Saxon Infantry had followed the Cavalry, and that the Poles were retired as fast as possible to Cosyn. Upon which, without Loss of Time, I detacked a hundred Horse to ruin the Bridge, and burn it with all their Fascines, which was done accordingly. About the same Time I received Letters from Lieutenant-General Horn at Warfaw, in which he informed me, that King Augustus was approaching that City with confiderable Forces: That is to say, six thousand Saxons, four thousand Poles, three thousand . Coffacks, and fix thousand Muscovites, exclusive of the Troops of Brand: That he would enclose himself in the Castle, which he would defend to the last Extremity; exhorting us likewise to do the same, without expecting any Succours 3

Soccours; the King being obliged to follow the Rout of the Army under General Rheinschild.

However discouraging this Letter was, we were glad to take Breath, and did not fail to provide ourselves with Forage. As for Provisions, it was more difficult to procure a sufficient Quantity; Radomicki being returned from Costyn to Stenzewa with three hundred Saxon and Polisto Troopers, harrassed our Parties incessantly; especially, after the Nobility assembled at Skroda, had published an Edict to forbid our being surnished with any Sostenance of Pain of Death.

I writ to Major-General Meyerfeld, to acquaint him with what I had heard from Thorn, as likewise with the Departure of the Enemy. We had, nevertheless, little Hopes to see him speedily return, when, all at once, Sept. 9. at eleven o'Clock at Night, they brought me word, he was at the Gates with his Cavalry; and a Moment after he entered my Chamber, with the Governor, and the Lieutenant-Colonels Waidenbeim and Hagen. Having then immediately informed him, that he had the fairest Opportunity in the World to take his Revenge, he replied, he was of my Opinion, and that he had not made such Haste, if it had not been on that Account. 1

I then ordered all the Gatrison to Horse, who were to lead the Way; and followed them myself as a Voluntier. Colonel Taube likewise insisted on bearing us Company, notwithstanding his Wound; together with Lieutenant-Colonel Grotbusen; and both mounted on Horseback immediately. But the first, not finding himself able to bear the Fatigue, was obliged to stay behind.

We marched wholly under the Conduct of a Posnanian Guide; and, as he led us thro' narrow Lanes and marshy Places, we moved but very slowly. Having, at Day-break, travelled but two Leagues, and being yet one more distant from the Enemy.

The Cavalry of the Garrison, which were three hundred strong, formed the Van; the Regiment of Tunbe sollowed, then that of Meyerfeld, and Colonel Horn brought up the Rear. In this Order we passed the Wood, to a Village which was still a Quarter of a League short of the Enemy, where we halted, till all the Cavalry had passed the Desile.

When this was done, we advanced by Squadrons in full Gallop towards the Enemy, while passing through the Village, and a little Wood beyond it, in our Way to another Village called Stenzew, from whence the Camp was not far distant. We knew that in this Wood there was both a Desile and a Water, through which we were obliged to march, and where we expected the Enemy would dispute our Passage: But as they did not dream of us, our Squadrons passed both the Bridge and the Water without Molestation, and thence strait on to the Camp.

This was about fix o'Clock in the Morning. The Saxons, who were encamped separately, made off forthwith, without being perceived by us. And our Van, without regarding the Pillage, briskly pursued the Poles, who were divided into two Bodies, and likewise retired upon our first Approach.

Colonel * Taube with his Regiment, and certain other Squadrons, purfued their Track for above a League; and, though they rallied, we attacked them? again, notwithstanding the Weariness of our Horses, and gave them a total. Defeat. Our Enterprize accomplished, Meyerfeld and I returned to the Camp, which we found already pillaged, tho Colonel Horn, who was behind with his Regiment, had Orders to hinder it, till the rest of the Troops returned. Some Poles of Quality were killed; and we took the Bonschup, or Enfign of the General of Great Poland, together with three Standards, and eleven. Pair of Kettle-drums.

Their Camp was well stored with Wine, Beer, and Aqua Vite; which our Troops making too free with, and beginning to be intoxicated, we hurried them away. Meyerfeld took his Rout through a fine Estate belonging to the Constable Radomicki, in the Court-yard of whose Seat, and the Out Offices belonging to it, he took his Post, together with his Regiment. The two other Regiments encamping in a Garden close-adjoining, which, as well as the Court, was walled in.

I staid there all Night, though there was neither Foot or Forage to be met with; and the next Morning set out with Colonel Taube, and the Cavelry of the Garrison, to return to Posnania, which was but two Leagues off. At the same Time, I was obliged to detach certain Horse to the neighbouring Village, to take Order for a Supply of Forage to be sent to Gunar-sew; where I had advised Meyerfeld to continue, for the Benesit of Forage from the adjacent Villages. But he replied, that all the Inhabitants being fled, it was impossible to be furnished with any Quantity but at Posnania; where likewise he could best defendabilities. He added, that his Troops were in so bad a Condition, that he should be obliged to buy a thousand Things for their Accommodation; and being likewise new Levies, it was difficult to keep them in Discipline. He returned therefore, the 14th, to Posnania, and his Regiments had Quarters assigned them in the Suburbs.

Some Days after we learned that General Brand was arrived, that he had possessed himself of the same Post which Schulenbourg had accupied before, and that he waited only the Asrival of Patkul and the Muscovites with the Artillery, to besiege us in form. And accordingly, Sept. 19. we saw the whole Army cross the Country in two Columns, in their Way to the Warta.

As the Enemy, when the Waters. were low, could easily ford over that; River, near the Place where they had: their late Bridge, I immediately gave Notice to Meyerfeld to keep a strict Watch on that Pass, as the greatest Part of his Troops were out in Pursuit of borage. Upon this he fent to recal them with all Speed, and marched himself with the Remainder of his Troops, which amounted in all to about three hundred and fifty, towards rhe Water-side, where he found that several of the Enemy's Squadrons had already passed over; whom he attacked. routed, and drove back into the River.

The Count de Gyllenstolpe was danperously wounded in the Arm in this Encounter. The Foragers, except some few, arrived happily in the Suburbs, but without having Time to bring in their Forage.

Mezerfeld now sent Colonel Taube, to intreat of the Governor and me, that, as it was not possible for his Troops to defend themselves in their; present Situation, they might be permitted to enter into the City, on his Promise of their paying ready Money for whatever they wanted; which we consented to, though our Stock of Provisions was exceeding low. Accordingly, they were admitted, and, not without great Difficulty, found Room for their Horses. In the Morning, we fent out the Foragers again, almost as far as the neighbouring Villages; and, though the Poles and Coffacks came in Sight from Time to Time, they did not think proper to give us the least Interruption.

Soon after we learned, that the Muscovites, to the Number of fix thousand Men, had joined Brand at about a League from the City, having taken their Rout by Srem, and that they had no Bridge over the Warta.

Offeb. 4. the Enemy advanced with their whole Army in two Columns towards the City, and encamped in the Plain almost joining to the Suburbs. We immediaely discharged our Cannon upon them, and the next Day allotted every Officer his Post, with written Instructions for their Conduct, both in general, and as particular Incidents might arise.

The Houses of the Suburbs were already burnt down, but we could not hinder the Enemy from posting themfelves in St. Martin's Church, and the Bernardine Convent, from whence they fired upon us; but without Effect; because our Troops, according to the Orders they had received, kept: themselves quiet and concealed, except some few who had Permission to return the Compliment.

That Night Major Duderburg was dispatched with ten Troopers, having each a led Horse, to inform his Majesty, or, at least, General Rheinschild, ... of what had passed since the Commencement of the Siege, and the Condition of the Garrison. They wereescorted a League and a Half by as hundred Horse, who returned all safe, and without having been once attack-. ed.

- The 5th, the Enemy began to fire. from a Battery of fix Cannons on the Tower of the Breslau Gate, with Balls, from fix to eighteen Pound. They likewise threw certain Bombs, Carcasfes, and red-hot Bullets into the City, which they continued all Night, had ordered the Citizens to take Careof their Houses, and have Water ready every where. At the same Time, the Jews were enjoined to be at hande to extinguish the Fire, and take proper Measures to hinder the Effect of the Bombs.

The 6th, the Enemy continued: quiet till towards Night, when they renewed their Fire, and discharged: red-hot Bullets as before, which lasted till five o'Clock next Morning. At the same Time we sent out certain, Troops, by the Suburb of Kalenzevo. towards, the Cathedral Church, to bring in some Forage, (as having yet that whole Side of the Warto, entitely, open) but with very little Success.

fifing towards Evening; but remained.

quiet all Night long.

The 8th, they began at Day-break, and did not give over till fix o'Clock; at Night. As we observed, they principally battered the Wall, between the two Towers situated between the Castle and the Gate of Breslau, we began forthwith to form a Coupure behind the Rampart, consisting of a Parapet, with two Flanks, or Sides, and Palisades in Front.

The 9th, being Sunday, they fired till Moon, with a greater Number of Cannon than ever. At four o'Clock they renewed their Endeavours for a Breach at the Place before mentioned, with seventeen Pieces of Cannon great and small, and actually made a strong This continued till ten Opening. o'Clock at Night.

· As we conjectured the Enemy had a Sentinel on the Tower of the Cathedral Church, we fent thither a Captain with thirty Horse and sixty Foot, but found ourselves mistaken. They, however, feized a Waggon load of Hay, which they happily conveyed into the City; together with two Valets, belonging to v Saxon Captain of Horse, who were released some Days after.

This Evening I was informed, the Enemy began to thicken on that Side next the Breach; on which I repaired chither forthwith, but found it was a falle Alarm, and that they had only let go the Sluice of a Pond behind the Castle and the Stable, by which Means ≥ Mill within the Walls was deprived of Water.

The roth, they continued to fire upon the Breach, where Major Rothy.

The 7th, the Enemy continued sen had his Post, and by eight o'Clock had made it considerably wider. They did the same all the rest of the Day; and towards Evening, they began to play from several other Butteries upon the Gerberschantz, but without effect. They likewise fired upon the Breach all Night long, though to no great This Evening a Miller's Purpole. Boy got over the Wall, to let down the Sluice of the Pond again, which he happily effected.

The 11th, they fired briskly at first upon the Breach, but towards Noon abated their Fury, and only cast Stones into the City. Towards the Evening they continued quiet, and during the Night never once fired at all.

The 12th, they did not fire all Day. We observed them to march out on all Sides, and that they conducted to the Camp abundance of Forage. They fired again upon the Breach in the Evening, and continued to do the same all Night.

The 13th, they fired with greater Fury than ever from their Batteries. as well on the Side of the Bernardines on the Gerberschantz, as from that of St. Martin, on the Wall, and the. Breach, which they widened confiderably. But we repaired it in the Night with a great Number of Fascines, and, a suitable Quantity of Earth; which, when they perceived, they fired upon our Workmen incessantly with their fmall Arms, but without doing any Execution.

We however reinforced that Post with a hundred and fifty Men. Lieutenant in Colonel Taube's own Company was killed in the Gerberschanz with a Musket Bullet, which he received in his Forehead. A hundred and twenty Men were ordered to raise a Ravelin on the other Side of the Water in the Ech, but as the Enemy had posted themselves in another neighbouring Island, the Asiair proceeded no farther.

The 14th, they made an Opening in the Breach twenty Pieces broad, which gave us but little Pain, because it afforded us room to support our Coupure, by opening a Communication with the Convent of St. Teresa, where we had posted a great Number of Men. In this View we set sixty Labourers (who were likewise a Corps de Reserve for the Coupure) to work every Night in throwing out the loose Stones, and levelling the Way, to enble us to pass thither on Occasion, or even to sally from thence in case of Necessity.

To Night the Enemy made a brisk Fire with their small Arms towards the Breaches, perceiving what we were about; and we in return fired as briskly on them, perceiving likewise that they were as busy as we; we threw also among them Pots of lighted Pitch, and made Abundance of Fires to discover what passed in the Ditch.

The 15th, in the Morning we saw there three Ladders, which the Enemy had abandoned. We gave one Sol a Day more to every Man, on account of their being obliged to work Night and Day. The Enemy forbore firing; but took Possession of the other Side of the Warta, both with Foot and Horse, and drew a Line of eighty Paces round about the Bridge, among the Ruins of the Suburb, which had been burnt down. This Line they farnished with Gabions, and we observed they had begun a Battery against the great Gate of the City. In the mean while they fired almost without Intermission, from their small Arms on that Gate, and the Mublen-schanz; notwithstanding which, we had but one Dragoon wounded.

The Governor gave Orders, the fame Day, to all the Citizens who had their Houses most exposed to the Fire of that Battery, to cover them with Dung and Earth. At Night I was informed, that a great Noise of Workmen was heard behind the Stable, near the Castle. Upon which I ordered immediately Pots of flaming Pitch to be thrown, in order to discover what they were about; when I perceived they had placed a great Quantity of Gabions all along the Ditch, in order to raise a Battery; and thereupon ordered a Lieutenant and forty Men to teinforce that Quarter, and fire upon the Labourers all Night.

As it came into my Head, that the Enemy, after having taken Possession of the other Side of the Warta, had entirely cut off our Communication with the Country, and that, after they had, by the Help of their Batteries, beat down the great Gate, and razed the Parapet of Mublen schantz, which they might accomplish in one Day, they would not fail to feize upon the Bridge, and extend their whole Line close to the Water, not to mention that they would ruin the only Mill we had remaining, and prevent our very Horses from being led to Water, I proposed to Meyerfeld to burn down the Bridge. To which he replied, that, as it was an Affair of Confequence, I should do well to consult Accordingly, having the Colonels. fent for them to my Apartment, and given given them my Reasons for this Pro- contained: The Enemy having abanposal, they received it with Applause; and even added, that, when the Enemy had battered down the Tower of the great Gate, it would be impossible to burn the Bridge if we would. eonsequence of which Resolution, Captain Pulman had Orders that very Night to let Fire to it, which was immediately put in Execution. Enemy placed certain Cannon that Day on the Battery, near the Convent of Carmelites.

The 16th, the Enemy fired from the faid Battery on the Brummer-pate; and two Dragoons of the Regiment of Taube deserted.

The 17th, towards ten o'Clock they began to fire on the Breach in the Wall, which was to the Left of the Brummer gate; and especially from the Battery which they had erected near the Ditch, behind the Stable. As this was the nearest, I ordered some of our best Marksmen to fire into their Port-holes, as foon as the Smoke was over, who killed abundance of their Cannoniers.

After Noon, a Drum arrived with a Letter from a Swedilb Officer, unknown to me, for Lieutenant General Gylkenstierna. He was also charged with another Letter from Lieutenant-General Patkul, to the Governor Lil-This Letter was writ in a stately, obscure and tumid Stile: It fummoned the Governor to furrender himself and his Garrison Prisoners of War, and not to expose himself to Extremities. The Breach being made, and, in case of a Refusal, no Mercy -being to be shown.

We treated with Scorn both the Letter and the impertinent Reason it doned their first Breach, and being then at work to make a fecond. Gyllenstierna, nevertheless, replied to that which he had received; but we gave the Drum to understand, that as we looked upon Patkul as a Swede, as a Traitor to his Country, and of Course, as dead in Law, we did not know what it was to hold a Correspondence with People of the other World. An Answer which terribly surprized the Drum. In the Evening we reinforced the Guard of the Gate de Brummer with twenty Men. And that Night the Enemy did not fire at all.

The 18th, a hundred Men were ordered to fill up the Road to the faid Gate, with Dung and Earth, leaving room however for one Man to pass on each Side; and the Enemy beginning to fire from a new Battery to the Right of that Gate, as they had before done to the Left, where they had already made a Breach thirty Foot wide, we immediately funk a Ditch with a Parapet behind, it, as an additional Security in case of Need; and when they prepared to batter down the second Wall as they had done the first, we made a Way thro' to the Convent of St. Catharine, which was near the Breach on the Left, to come from behind to the fecond Wall; which being feeble, was foon overturned, and the Convent ruined. That Evening, we again reinforced the Gate near the Breach with fixty Foot, the Command of whom was given to Lieutenant Colonel Hagen, who was in the Service of the Duke of Holftein Gostorp.

During the Night, the Enemy threw certain Bombs, red hot Bullets, and and Abundance of Scones. They befide play'd their Battery to the Right of the Gate de Brummer all Night long, but with less Ardor than at first. this Interval, we turned almost three hundred Horses out of the City, which we had not Forage to support, and killed them by the Water-side. had twice already been obliged to make Executions of this Nature.

The 19th, at Day-break, they renewed their firing on the Breach, which they confiderably enlarged: Their Balls passing quite through the fecond Wall, the Convent of St. Catharine's, and even the Street de Brummer. As to the Breach to the Right of the Gate, the two Walls were there so weakened, that they were both thrown down almost at the same Instant. The Enemy beside fired vehemently at the Tower to incommode the Troops upon Duty underneath with the Stones which tumbled from This Day we resolved upon a Sally, and Captain Pulman had Orders with a hundred and fifty Men, half Infantry and half Cavalry on Foot, to file off above the Mill: But, as I obferved the Enemy took the Alarm, and stood upon their Guard, I recalled them forthwith.

The Enemy, during the Night, to the Extremity of Gerberschaniz, and by that Step inducing me to believe, they intended to erect there another Battery, I detached Captain Bantboltz, of the Regiment of Tanbe, with a hundred Men to destroy them: But, as foon as they had passed the Ditch, and were advancinng to execute their them, and believing the Enemy at hand, except the Captain and a few, who proceeded, notwithstanding, to perform their Commission, they all run back to the City. We made Enquiries after into this Affair, but, as it happened in the Dark, the Truth was never known.

The fame Night the Captains Pulman and Morton fallied out likewise with a hundred and fifty Men, by the Road which lay under the Mill; attacked the Russians, posted behind an old Wall opposite to the Shambles of the Jews, and, after having killed several, returned without the Loss of a Man. Two Dragoons of the Regiment of Meyerfeld let themselves down with Cords from the Top of the Wall, and deferted to the Enemy. And we filled the Breach near St. Catherines. with Cheveaux de Frise.

The 20th, the Enemy battered the Wall to the Right of the Gate de Brummer, with twelve Pieces of Cannon, and continued it all Day with fuch Success, that towards Night, they had made an Opening above forty Paces broad, and beat down all the Rubbish into the Ditch; what remained not being a Foot in Height, and which they might enter upon the same Level with the Breach. Upon this, we placed two Pieces of Cannon, loadhaving placed their Gabions quite close, ed with Cartridges, in the Entrance, one to the Right, and the other to the Left, to scour the two Breaches in Flank in case of an Attack.

Towards Noon the Enemy shot into the City feveral Arrows, with Leters' fastened to them, fix of which were brought me. Their Contents were, That fuch Germans belonging to the Orders, a fudden Panic seized upon Garrison that would go over to them, should be well recompensed; or, in case they would not desert, such who threw down their Arms during the Assault, which they were on the point of making, should have their Lives; but that, otherwise, all should be put to the Sword. I rewarded those hand-somely who brought me these Letters: Nevertheless, we had so well divided our Posts, that the Regiments were every where intermingled, and, by that Means, each secured the Fidelity of the other. As to those Persons we suspected, we placed them where they could do the least Mischief.

The Guard of the Gate de Brummer in particular was that Night reinforced, to the Amount of a hundred and eighty Men, under the Command of three Captains of Horse, and one of Foot, and stationed in such a Manner, that they could mutually support each other till Succours arrived. And as, according to all Appearances, the Enemy designed to attack us that Night, I ordered all the Garrison to be prepared and under Arms,

I then repaired, together with the Governor, to the last Breach, as the most dangerous, and which was not far from St. Catherine. Meyerfeld continued at the first between the Gate de Bresau and the Castle. The Cavalry were ranged in the Market, to be ready to assist wherever there was Occasion, and every other Post was secured as well as possible.

The Night passed quietly enough, except that the Enemy fired, now and then, some Pieces of Cannon, with red hot Balls, though without Effect. But towards Day break, on the Discharge of one fingle Cannon, the whole Camp rung with the most hideous Outcries, Upon which Colones Taube, who was with me, repaired to the Breach with his Troops, where they continued behind the Parapet in good Order, expecting the Enemy; who still continued their Clamours, as if their whole Army was on the Point of overwhelming us. Nevertheless no body appeared, and, when it was Day, all was quiet again; which induced us to believe, that they defigned by these Howlings, to draw us into the Breach, in order to flaughter us with Cartridges. It was also conjectured, that they were alarmed with the Apprehentions of a Sally; no fuch. Cries being heard from the other Sideof the City.

The 21st, they renewed their Fire on the first and great Breach, till they had enlarged it to more than eighty Paces in Breadth; which obliged us likewise to enlarge our Caspure, and do our best to put ourselves in a good Posture of Desence. Towards Noon they ocased firing, and sent Letters by a Trumpet to Meyerfeld and Lillibeek, to exchange certain Prisoners; but, upon receiving a proper Answer, continued it on as before.

This Evening, we reinforced the grand Breach with a hundred Men, commanded by Major Barnman, who was posted to the Right of the Compute, and Major Reibusen to the Lest; the whole Guard amounting to four hundred and sixty Men, commanded in chief by Colonel Horn, to whose Care was likewise committed all that Side of the City, as far as the Castle inclusive, and to Colonel Tanke all the other. During the Night, the Enemy sired with their small Arms upon our Labourers

Labourers in the Breach, but could not reach them because of our Chewann de Frise.

The 22d, they renewed their Battery on the grand Breach with great Eury, more especially on the inner Wall, near the Cloister of St. Catharine; and as the Stones were exceeding hard, they fired with double Cartridges. Towards Noon, a Drum demanded Entrance, and being twice directed to the Gate do Brosau, he made his Appearance no more.

All this Day and Night the Enemy continued firing incessantly, both from their Cannon and small Arms, together with certain red-het Bullets. We being all the while at our Posts, and under Arms as before.

The 23d, being Sunday, they fired but a few Shot in the Morning. Nine o'Clook a Trumpet came to demand that a Captain of Hosse might be permitted to come out of the Camp by way of Hostage for another, who would be fent to the City. In answer to which we dispatched Captain Hall, with two other Officers, and as many of the Enemy were admitted in Exchange; who were introduced to the Governor, Major-General Meyerfeld being prefent. As they could not foon agree on the Exchange of the Prisoners, the Conference lasted till Noon, and the Officers then staid to Dinner; to which I was likewise in-These Gentlemen seemed to be much out of Humour; and what was ridiculous enough, they had demanded, together with the Exchange of the Prisoners, the Restitution of the Bandtschup, or Standard of the General of Great Poland, which Radomicki had lost in the Action of Stenzewa.

After Dinner I returned to my own Apartment, and, towards Evening, the Officers fet out with the Polish Prisoners, and Captain Hall returned to the City.

When it began to be dark, a Dragoon of Meyerfeld's Regiment, who had been taken Prisoner in the Action with Schulenbourg, came to inform us, that he had heard a Murmur run thro the Enemy's Camp of a Retreat; that feventeen Pieces of Cannon were atready fent off, and that all the Batteries were dismounted. Our Centinels. posted on the Towers of the City, likewise confirmed this, by the Movements which they observed in the Enemy's Camp: But we continued on our Guard notwithstanding. Night they fired with certain small Arms into the Breach, but we heard no more of their Cannon.

The 24th, when it was Day, we perceived neither Cannon or Men on the Batteries, nor in the Approaches; a handful only appearing opposite to the Gate de Breflau, and discharging a few Vollies, by which a Surgeon of the Regiment of Sudermanlande was flightly wounded. Towards nine o'Clock both their Cavalry and Infantry were in full March, leaving only a Guard of Sarons near to the Convent of the Carmelites, and a Part of their Camp in the Wilda, We then had the Way cleared to the Gate de Breflay, and opened that near the Pond, which had been walled up in order to make a Sally; but we altered this Resolution afterwards. Towards the Evening all the rest of the Bessegers decamped.

The 25th, we made it our Business to raze the Enemy's Works, and burn ther Ladders, and all the other Implements they had abandoned. At the same Time, we sent out a Party in Search of Forage, who returned with a small Quantity of Straw, and Hay, which they found in the Camp of the Enemy.

G g 2 their

During this Siege, which lasted three Weeks, we lost but nine Men with one Lieutenant of Dragoons, and one Subaltern of Foot; and had but twenty wounded, among whom was one Captain.

Arvid Axel, Mardeveld.

It is now Time to return to the Army.

Ottober 31, some of our Troops passed the Oder, and sounded the Depth of the Water, to find out what Rout the Saxons had taken, in order to make their Report to his Majesty, and enquire if it was not his Pleasure that they should continue the Pursuit. The King only smiled at this Question, and, without explaining himself farther, gave Orders for all to be in Readiness, and, contrary to all Expectations, wheeled about again for Poland.

The King, having learned by the Way that two thousand Cossacks were but a little Way from the Army, went in quest of them, attacked, and put a great Part of them to the Sword; burning the rest in the Houses whither they were retired, and giving Quarter only to two hundred and twelve, at the Instance of King Stanislaus. A Colonel and fifty more of the best-mounted made their Escapes at the Beginning of the Action.

His Majesty marched three Leagues that Day to Schlichingsheim, after a

Pursuit of fixty Leagues in ten Days, from the Time of his passing the Vi-stula, to his reaching the Oder, thro' the most hideous Roads and Doubles, without having changed Clothes or Linnen all that Time, which dropt peacemeal from the whole Army, Princes, Officers and Soldiers.

Novemb. 1. the King continued his March to Fraustads, where he quartered in the House of a Gentleman, called Roersdorf. The Regiments being dispersed in the adjacent Places, to snatch a little Repose which they stood greatly in need of.

Here his Majesty allotted the Winter Quarters for every Regiment. He himself with his Drabans retiring to Ravitz, a little pretty Polish Town on the Frontiers of Silesia, where he lodged, contrary to his usual Custom, in a fine House belonging to a Gentleman near the Gate. The Chancery and the Court had likewise very convenient Quarters, the like had the Prince of Wurtenberg, who, nevertheless, exchanged his for others less commodious, in order to be nearer his Majesty.

Ravitz is surrounded with a Rampert, and so regularly built, that from the Middle one has a Prospect of the sour Gates of the Town. The Inhabitants speak no Language but German, and are all Lutherans, on which Account the Silesians on the Frontier, of the same Religion, often come thither to divine Service. Their Commerce consists in Cloaths, of which this is a tolerable Staple; and from hence they are sold by the Merchants all over Poland to Jaroslaw, and through Leopoleven to Lublin; and though they run great Hazard from Robbers and Rapparees both in War and Peace, they are nevertheless rich, and much at their Ease.

Before we finish the Year 1704, it will be proper to see how Lieutenant-General Meidel ended the Campaign in Finland.

After the Russians had been repulsed, in their Attempt on that General's Camp near Walkesari, in July, they sent out several Detachments on the other Side of the Neva, who all met with the same Fate. Meidel, on his Side, likewise detached Parties towards Noteburg and Petersburg, who burnt and destroyed all the Magazines of the Enemy.

After which, he advanced with his Troops farther into Finland, and the more boldly, as those of the Enemy appeared no longer on the Frontier. He detached, however, in September, a Captain of Cavalry, with sixty Foot and eighty Horse, who passed through Carelia, and made the whole Tour of Ladoga. Returning happily after several Weeks Absence, though they had attacked a Fort of the Enemy's built of Wood and Earth, with sour Towers, and garnished round the Top with Chevaux de Frise.

The first was defended by seven hundred Russians, who, after an obstinate Desence, were almost burnt by our People's setting fire to the Fort, and the neighbouring Village. The Governor, and about seventy Men attempting to escape to the adjacent Woods, were all put to the Sword, except some sew, who returned to the Fort, and were made Prisoners, together with sisty more who had hid themselves under ground.

After the fire was extinguished, we found four Brass Cannons, and eleven of Iron, with a great Number of Fire Arms, and other Ammunitions of War. The Captain conducted the Prisoners, a great Number of Arms, and abundance of Cattle to the Camp, Having burnt and destroyed all the rest.

We had several Men killed, and many more wounded, among whom was one Captain of Foot, two Lieutenants, and three Subalterns. This Fort was fifty Leagues from Wiborg; and General Meidel afterwards took. Possession of it for his Winter Quarters.

Little remarkable happened in that Interval, except that the Enemy detached a Party from Petersburg, who repaired to the other Side of the Nava, to cut down Trees for Beams, to be employed for the Fort; and being attacked by our Troops and totally defeated, were all put to the Sword.

King Stanislaus lodged in his own Castle of Ridzin, or Reussen, one League from the City of Lissa, which belonged to the Family of Lescinski, and from whence they derive their Name.

The Castle, which was one of the finest Seats in Poland, before it was ruined by the Saxons, An. 1705, is situated in a most charming Country, near both a Village and a Wood, very commodious for hunting, which was the darling Passion of King Stanislaus. An Avenue was cut through the Wood to open a Prospect to the And, among other City of Li/|a|. magnificent Apartments which it boafted, there was one varnished all over in so charming a Taste, that though the Saxon General had Orders to ruin that that magnificent Fabrick, he spared this Lodging as the most beautiful in the World, and which could hardly ever be repaired. Another Apartment was garnished all round with Venice Glasses. A third presented now such superb Baths, as were worthy of a Prince for the exquisite Mosaic, with which they were adorned.

Hither the Prince of Wurtenberg, who had very dexterously infinuated himself into the Affections of King Stanislaus, repaired, (whenever he could be excused from attending the King of Sweden, which was not often) to share with him in the Pleasures of the Chace. That young Prince had applied himself so earnestly to learn the Swedish Tongue, that he spoke it in Persection, which, joined to his extreme Ambition to please his Majesty, had establish him persectly in his Esteem and Friendship.

Hither likewise the Nobles of Poland, assiduously, repaired to pay their Compliments to King Stanislaus, whose Court grew more and more splendid every Day. In a little Diet which was held at Kostyn in Great Poland, it had been resolved to levy certain Troops, which were to enter into his Service the following Campaign. In the mean Time also, they had formed a new Regiment of Infantry, which, together with two hundred Horse, were to serve for his Guard. At the End of December, that Prince repaired to Prussia to see the Queen his Spouse, who had retired thither with her Family, ever fince his Departure from Warsaw.

The Baggage of the Army, which was likewise followed by our Infantry, arrived by little and little. The Lieutenant-Generals Stromberg and Peffe, who had each the Command of a Body of Foot, brought along with them Numbers, of Sanons whom they had made Prisoners upon the Road. The Army was distributed along the Frontiers of Silefia, from the City of Petrekow, to the Frontiers of Brandebourg.

Colonel Charles Horn was in Garrifon in the City of Thorn, with his Regiment of Pomeranian Infantry. As to the new Regiments of Dragoons, Stenbock, Meyerfeld, Taube, and Ducker, they took the Road of Pruffia, to raife Recruits, after having fuffer'd fo much during this Campaign. And the like did other Regiments likewise.

As soon as it was understood in so-reign Courts, that his Majesty had taken up his Winter-Quarters at Ravitz, many of their Ministers repaired thither to treat of those Affairs they had in Commission from their Masters; but were all reserved to the Chancery of Stockbolm. Nevertheless, as there were some who wished the King would himself take Cognizance of what they had to propose, and others who by no Means cared for so long a Journey, they changed their Characters, and were admitted as Travellers to an Audience of his Majesty.

But the the King would never treat of foreign Affairs, while at Ravitz, he nevertheless spent the greatest Part of his Time in the Chancery with Count Piper, and Secretary Hermelin, often attending there from Morning-Prayer, till one or two o'Clock in the Afternoon. He applied himself to the Affairs of his Kingdom, as well as those of the Army, and carefully examined the present Situations of Courts, and their different Interests. As to his leisure Hours his Majesty employ'd them in a quite new Manner, which will hereaster be explained.

Thus gloriously did he finish the Campaign of 1704, having scarce allowed himself any Repose for the Space of six Months; that is to say, from the 21st of Jane, to the End of December.

He first set out from Heilsberg in Prussia for Warsaw, from whence he repaired through Great Poland to Sendomir and Leopol; from the last of which Places he retired to Warsaw, and afterwards posted on to Punitz, in which Interval he compassed above two hundred Leagues, dethroned King Augustus, set the Crown of Poland on the Head of Stanislaus, took the City of Leopol with Cavalry only, passed the Vistula three Times, and after the Action of Punitz, drove the Enemy out of the Kingdom.

But in spite of all these Expeditions, the Partizans of King Augustus still flattered themselves with some Revolution in savour of that Prince; which was owing to the Hopes the Czar, his Ally, had given him of a considerable Aid both of Money and Troops.

That Prince was now arrived to Cracow, as has been already faid, with all the Cavalry he could affemble; whom he quartered in the Out fkirts of that City, and in the adjacent Villages. Many Senators however repaired thither, with a great Number of Gentlemen, to advise of Means to affemble a Senatus-Concilium: Many even of those who had affifted at the Election of King Stanislans were likewise present, infomuch that King Augustus did not know in whom to confide; so great was the Confusion every where, and the Change so extraordinary.

The most prudent, and those who valued themselves most upon their Integrity, continued neuter, and made a third Party is the Kingdom by the Name of Indifferents.

The Grand-General Prince Lubemirski, the same who had sollicited the Crown, followed the Example of his Peers, and being arrived at Cracow, intreated Pardon of King Augustus in the humblest Terms, for having abandoned his Party; and promised to repair his Fault, by an inviolable Attachment for the future, both to his Person and Interests. Nevertheless. to justify to the World a Turn which feemed so extraordinary, he published a Detail of his Reasons for deserting the Confederacy of Warfaw; among which, the most plausible was that which referred to the feizing of his two Sons, whom King Augustus had taken out of a Cloister at Warsaw, and fent into Saxony: His natural Affection did not permit him, he said, to bear any longer the Imprisonment of all that was dear to him in the World. This was, however; esteemed but Grimace; and supposing that King Augustus had secured the Children to bring back the Father, it is certain the Father was charmed to find a plaufible Pretence to abandon one, whom he had so long resolved to abandon, and whom he detefted ever fince his flattering Ideas of Royalty had deferred him by the Election of King Stanislaus, King Augustus, who had so many Reasons to mistrust all these Protestations that were made to him at Cracow, had very little better Opinion of his Affairs.

Affairs, after the Return of the Grand General; whose Fidelity he so much the more suspected, as the Change had been brought about by Envy and Disappointment only. After having recommended then his Interests to all the Nobility in general, he set out for Saxony, at the Beginning of the Year, as well to make up the Losses of the preceding Campaigns, as to levy fresh Troops, and put his hereditary Dominions in a Posture of Defence; as fearing an Irruption from his Swedish Majesty, who was now but a little Way off.

The Emperor, alarmed to see a victorious Army on the Frontiers of Silefia, took much Pains, in Concert with England and Holland, to reduce the Affairs of Poland to a Negotiation. What his Imperial Majesty had in View, being to procure a Peace beween the King of Sweden and King Augustus, and by that Means re-establish the Tranquillity of his Neighbourhood.

To this End, Count Zinzendorf had Orders to repair to Ravitz, where having demanded a Conference with fome of the King's Ministers, his Majesty referred him to Secretary Hermelin, who, after he had made his Report, returned to the Count, with the King's Resolution to persist in the Design he had formed to dethrone Augustus, and crown Stanislaus in his Stead; and to grant no Peace at all, unless King Augustus would abdicate, and content himself with the bare Title of King.

However follicitous the English Envoy, Mr. Robinson was (though otherwise very much considered at Court) to support the Imperial Minister, his Majesty continued instexible on that head, and prepared by an early Campaign, to compleat what he had so gloriously begun; the Establishment of King Stanislaus, and the eternal Exclusion of King Augustus.

The Affairs of King Stanislaus began then to wear a promising Aspect. We have remarked elsewhere, that towards the End of the preceding Year, he set out for Prussia; a little after which, Jan. 14. he had a long Conference in a Village near Dantzick with the Cardinal Primate, who remained in that City to observe, as from behind a Curtain, what Turn Affairs would take.

The long Residence of King Augustus in Saxony was of infinite Prejudice to his Interests on this Occasion. It was believed he durst not return to Poland; and whatever Assurance he gave his Partizans to the contrary, they found no Credit, which greatly abated their Courage; and, in the End, induced the Cardinal to side with his Competitor.

The King of Sweden had already demanded of that Prelate to fix a Time for the Coronation of Stanislaus, but he would not comply but upon certain Conditions. In the first Place he demanded that the King of Sweden should take upon him the Protection and Defence of the Kingdom of Poland for two Years to come; and that he should guaranty the Republick from all Acts of Violence and Hostility, that King Augustus might attempt from the Side of Saxony. Secondly, that he should exact no more Contributions of the Poles, that they might have Time to recruit their exhausted Strength. And thirdly, that he should use his utmost Endeavours to hinder the Court of Rome from making good her Menaces against him, on Account of his Union with King Staniflaus.

To the first of these Points the King answered, that he would always have eight thousand Men in Pomerania, to secure the new King from all Insults whatever. To the second, That his Majesty would exact no Contributions but of his Enemies, and never but in concert with King Stanislaus. And to the third, That he would chuse Deputies at the Diet, to defend his Eminence at Rome, and appease the Choler of the Pope.

It was on these Conditions, that the Cardinal came over to King Stanislaus, that he convened the Diet at Cracow, and that he, at last, dispatched the Universalia, for the general Diet to be held at Warsaw, for the crowning King Stanislaus, as we shall see by and by.

The Crown-Army still scoured the Country. Smigelshi, a samous Partizan of King Augustus, at the Head of seven or eight thousand Horse, chiefly Poles, beat up our Quarters continually. However, he made more Noise than Mischief, and we are now to see with Astonishment, one Lieutenant of Foot with eighty Men defend himself from so considerable a Body, who were not able to carry off the least Advantage. The Fact was thus:

The Lieutenant had been detached to levy Contributions in the Neighbourhood of the City of Pietrikow, where a Party of the Column under Lieutenant - General Stromberg was quartered. Smigelski having been apprised of this, and knowing the Lieutenant's Strength was but small, marched thither with all his Forces, not at all doubting but he should carry off the whole Party.

The Attack was made with Abundance of Vigour; but the Lieutenant, who had been happy enough to reaffemble in Time his whole eighty Men, sustained it bravely. Seeing however, that the Number of the Enemy encreased every Moment, he withdrew farther within the Village, disputing every Inch of Ground, till at last he posted himself in the Seat of the Lord of the Village; fully determin'd to hold out to the last Extremity.

Smigelski then flattered himself that the Affair was over; but the Swedes, far from a Thought of surrendering, defended themselves so effectually, that the Enemy were never able to set Fire to the House, though they did their utmost for that End, and though they lost in the Attempt abundance of their Men; the Swedes never firing but with their Pieces close to the Enemy's Breasts.

The Combat lasted from Morning till Noon, when Smigelski shocked and surprised at such extraordinary Valour, offered the Lieutenant honourable Terms if he would surrender. But he rejected them with Disdain, and the Enemy was at last forced to give over their Enterprize shamefully, and retire with a great Number of Carriages loaded with their dead and wounded Men.

This Action so highly pleased his Majesty, that, in a little Time after, he made the Lieutenant a Major. Neither was Smigelski more happy in his Enterprizes upon our Quarters; never attempting a Surprize but it H h miscarried, or engaging but he was effectually beaten.

The Crown Army being disbanded, took up its Winter-quarters without Distinction of Friends or Enemies, and levied Contributions on all Sides, which in Poland are commonly called Hyberness. At Lowitz, the Residence of the Cardinal Primate, there were fourteen Companies of Pales, and certain Troops of Horse and Dragoons, such as are called Quartians, who had there posted themselves in Garrison.

But the Swedes, not being very well pleased with their Neighbourhood, resolved to dislodge them. Accordingly, Lieutenant-Colonel Lubecker of the Life-guard, had Orders to march thither with eight or nine hundred Horse; which he did with such Diligence, travelling both Day and Night, that he had infallibly surprized them in Bed, if they had not received one Hour's Notice of his Approach; upon which they immediately flew to Horse, and posted with such Speed through the City, that it was impossible for our Troops to join them.

We surprized no more than sifty or sixty Men who were killed, and twelve who were taken Prisoners. We likewise took all their Baggage and Provisions, with a Number of Cattle, which they had carried off from different Places. Lubecker reposed himself here for some Time; but as to the Poles, they durst no more Approach so near to our Posts on that Side.

Nor were the Saxons less disquieted in their Quarters, which they had chose near the Mountains of Hungary, and in the Adjacencies, than we, by the Poles. Certain Saxon Generals.

having taken Possession of a little Tract called Sipferland, which belonged to a young Lubomir/ki, Son to the late Marshal of the Crown: He, who was then in the Emperor's Service, took his Leave immediately, and hastened as fast as possible towards his Seat, to examine a little nearer what Sort of Guests had visited him with so little Ceremony; and, not liking their Company, gathered together a Body of about three thousand Men, chiefly Hungarians, and obliged them to change their Lodgings. Not contented with this Success, he declared himself an open Enemy to King Augustus, and harrassed his Troops in several Encounters: Having once the Happiness to surprize certain Saxons in their Quarters near to Cracow, where he made several of their Officers Prisoners, and carried off a Pair of Silver Kettle-drums.

A third Party, as hath been already faid, was formed in the Palatinates of Wolbinia and Russia, called Indifferents. These assembled at Leopol, and had for their Head Count Potoki, Palatine of Kiovia.

As King Augustus so long delayed his Return into Poland, this Party, which had near six or eight thousand Men on soot, and which had never yet declared on either Side, at last inclined in favour of the new King, and openly declared for him, after Potocki had had an Interview with Lieutenant Stromberg, to whom he resigned sixty Saxon Prisoners, whom he had taken in a Rencontre.

This Accession greatly raised the Spirits of King Stanislaus's Friends, who were in that Country, and who indeed.

indeed hindered their Antagonists from undertaking any Thing contrary to his Interests. On the other hand, the Palatine threatened to use them with the utmost Rigour, if they presumed to excite the least Trouble; and surther assured his Majesty, that he would be ready to join him on the first Notice.

All these Incidents appeared so dangerous to the Senators and Deputies assembled at Gracow, to hold a grand Council in favour of King Augustus, that they writ anew to that Prince to press his Return, in order to put a Stop, by his Presence, to all the Designs that his Enemies continually framed against him in Poland.

Augustus answered, that he would repair thither with all Speed, and gave them a long Detail of the Reasons which compelled him to make so long a Stay in Saxony. When they had received this Reply, it was resolved that the Assembly should continue to sit but three Weeks after his Arrival; for which no settled Time was yet appointed, to the End that one of our Parties, which had been detached as far as Silesia, should have Knowledge of his Return, or have it in their Power to lay any Snare to surprize him upon the Road.

It was during this Interval that Lieutenant General Arwid Horn negotiated at Dresden the Exchange of the Prisoners which had been made on both Sides. This Convention was soon ratified, and that General was himself exchanged against Lieutenant-General Allart, who was taken at the Battle of Narva.

While these Affairs were transacting in Poland, the Czar prepared to enter into Lithuania, at the Head of a formidable Army, in order to be as good as his Word, given both to Dzialinski Palatine of Culm, and Ambassador from King Augustus, and Oginski, during the Siege of Narva.

As that Prince had resolved to lay, Siege to Riga, he had employed all his Diligence to prepare a grand Train of Artillery, with all the Necessaries for an Attempt on that important Place.

When all was ready for the Expedition, Velt Marshal Scheremetof led the Way with eighteen or twenty thousand Men, and the Czar himself followed forthwith at the Head of his Army, entering into Lithuania, thro' the Palatinate of Polocsk, and leaving behind him no more Troops than were necessary for the Desence of Narva, Dorpt, and other little conquered Places; and the Body of an Army, sufficient to made head against General Maydel, who commanded our Troops in Finland.

The Czar had reason to sear the Activity and Diligence of that Officer, who had given him such Proof of his Valour in the last Campaign. Tho Maydel was not in a Condition to act offensively, he would not however suffer his Troops to linger out the Time in their Winter quarters, but resolved to undertake some Enterprize against the Enemy.

The Czar, as was observed in the preceding Year, had caused a Castle to be built in the Isle of Retusari, at the Entrance of the Neva, more known by the Name of Cronslot, and which joins to a City since erected, and called Cronstadt.

This Place Maydel projected to H h 2 make

make himself Master of, and, as he well judged it must be done by Surprize, he detached Charles Arnselt, at the End of the Month of January, with a Party, which had Orders to march through unsrequented Roads, to avoid Discovery. But, as Arnselt sound himself obliged to pass on the Ice over an Arm of the Sea, which is between Finland and the Isle, in an exceeding dark Night, the Guide mistook his Way on that vast Plain, then all covered with Snow, and led them a great Way beyond the Castle without perceiving his Mistake.

Hence the Russians, having discovered our Design, had Time to put themselves in a Posture of Desence, and threw immediately into the Castle a Reinforcement of five hundred Men, while all the rest of their Cavalry and Infantry ranged themselves in Order of Battle in the new City of Cronstadt, and in the Palace of the Czar ready to Arnfelt, who was too far advanced to go back without making some Attempt, was not daunted at his ill Succefs, but, wheeling directly towards the Isle, attacked the Enemy posted in the Town so briskly, that he oblged them to give Ground. Cavalry instantly made off; but their Foot, not being able to escape, and endeavouring to fave themselves in the Castle, were all cut to Pieces upon the Ice, under their own Cannon. The Garrison likewise, having made a Sally to support their Friends, were used but very little better, being drove Sword in Hand as far as the Chevaux de Frise, and a Breach in the Ice, which the Enemy had made all round the Fort, three fathoms broad.

Upon which, Arnfelt, well considered that he could attempt nothing against the Castle, returned to the City, and set Fire to two Men of War from twenty to thirty Guns each, which were frozen fast in the Ice. Abundance of Ammunition, and all Sorts of Provisions likewise fell into his Hands, as also a vast Quantity of Forage, which he reduced to Ashes, as well as the Czar's Palace, a great many other Houses, and Numbers of Vessels in the Port.

A little while after this Action, General Maydel detached another Party towards Noteborg, which burned several Vessels fastened in the Ice, and ravaged the Country round, setting Fire to every thing in their Way. It is true, such Mischiess as these the Russians could easily repair; but Maydel did good Service notwithstanding, both by the Spoil that he made; and by giving the Enemy a Check at home; it being his Design to hinder them from making Inroads into our Provinces, for fear of being surprised in their own.

In Coarland our Affairs seemed to have a very ill Aspect, as well by the Absence and Distance of his Majesty, as by the formidable Force of the whole Russian Army, which was then approaching, and which Count de Lowenbaups, with his handful of Forces, appeared little able to withstand. But we had soon the Pleasure to see, that they not only made Head against them, but even repulsed that whole terrible Multitude.

The good Conduct of Count Eowenbaupt contributed greatly to this Succels. Whose first Concern was to keep the Communication with Riga free. free, and ward off the Siege; taking his Measures so happily, that he found himself able to defend that Province for a long while, and to render the Conquest of it extremely difficult to the Czar, with whom he resolved to dispute every Inch of Ground.

In this View he formed an Army of fuch Troops as he collected from Libau and other Places of Courland, together with the Regiments that Major Schlippenbach had commanded the preceding Campaign in Livonia; placing ftrong Garrisons in Mittau, and the Castle of Baush, to amuse the Enemy in their Way to Riga, that he might gain Time for more Succours to come up, as we shall see hereaster.

His Majesty had sent Orders to Lieutenant-Colonel Lubecker to quit Lowitz with his Detachment: But scarce had he marched out but the Enemy's Parties began to appear; and, some Days after, at a Place called Couallen, attacked a Captain who had been detached with a hundred Horse to levy Contributions.

The Enemy's Corps confifted of twenty-eight Companies, and two hundred German Horse; a Number fo fuperior to the Swedes, that the Captain, fearing to engage them in open Field, as liable to be there furrounded, and quite cut off, retreated with his Men to a Church-yard in a Village, where he posted them behind the Wall which surrounded it, and made a continual and well-managed Fire upon the Enemy; who then ordered their Dragoons to alight, and gather together Posts and Planks, to ferve instead of Fascines in Scaling the Church-yard. At the same Time a great Number of Poles being mounted on the Roof of the Curate's House, which was quite close to the Churchyard, did some Execution among our Troops with their Fire-arms. put an End to which Mischief the Captain, with one half of his Troops, fallied out and dispersed the Dragoons, who had undertaken to scale the Walls. while the other half fet Fire to the Curate's House; which, though the Poles prefently extinguished, yet that brave Officer held them so stubbornly at Bay, gave them fo much Employment on all Hands, and particularly by two subsequent Sallies which he made upon them, that, in the End, he dislodged them from the House, and fet it again on Fire. Many of the Poles perished in the Flames, and the rest were kept aloof. All this, however, did not hinder the Enemy from returning twice more to the Affault; but, being always repulsed with the fame Vigour, they grew discouraged, and at last left us Masters of the Field.

This Combat lasted from seven in the Morning till sour in the Asternoon without Intermission. The Enemy then retired to Lowitz, in Expectation of a Reinforcement, carrying with them a great Number of wounded Men, and leaving the Ground, round the Church-yard, covered with dead Bodies,

Lieutenant-General Nieroth, who was quartered in the Territory of Gnefes having been advertised of this Action, instantly dispatched Major Piper with three hundred and fifty Horse, to be at the Heels of the Enemy, who surprized them in the Night at Lowitz, Feb. 28. or rather March 1. and attacked them so briskly, that, after having killed a great Number, he put the rest to Flight, and took their Baggage and Ammunition.

The Poles, who were forty Companies strong, ashamed to be beaten by such a Handful of Men, returned again to the Combat, and ranged themselves in Order of Battle; upon which Piper did the same; and having with him some Lithuaniae Companies de Sapieba, and certain Valoches, he ordered them so begin the Attack. But, feeing they had no Stomach to engage, he broke through them with his Squadron, and, after a flight Resistance, put them to the Rout. A great Number of Poles fell likewise in this Rencontre. Seventeen Saxons, with two Corporals, and some Poles, were made Prisoners, and two Standards, two Enfigns, and one Pair of Kettle-drums taken.

March 1. Prince Lubomirski, of whom we have already spoke, repaired to the King's Quarters at Ravitz, with fifteen hundred Hungarians, and one Company of Poles, bringing with him a Major, three Captains, one Lieutenant, and eleven Subalterns, whom he had made Prisoners at Cracow, and whom he presented to his Majesty. He was very graciously received, and his Troops were immediately ordered into Quarters near those of Géneral Stromberg.

Some Days after, that General received Orders to march with two Regiments of Foot, and some Horse strait to Cracow, as well to chace thence the Saxons, as to oblige that Palatinate to acknowledge King Siànislaus, which the greater Part of the Nobility were already disposed to do; especially as all the Representations they had made to King Augustus, to induce him to return to Poland, had appeared ineffectual.

The Saxons, advertised of the March of our Troops, did not think it proper to wait for them, but retired with Precipitation from Cracow. They even passed the Vistula, and made long Marches towards Sendomir and Lublin to avoid the Encounter.

There now remained no more than the Partizan Smigelski on this Side the Vistula, who made frequent Attempts, but never did any great Mischief. One Day, March 20. he attacked the Troops of Prince Lubomirski; a Colonel was killed in the Action, but he was put to Flight as usual.

Swinarski was surprized on the Frontier of Silesia, by a Party of Swedes, who took him Prisoner: But he had the good Fortune to make his Escape some Time after.

March 28. Lubomirski, having acknowledged King Stanislaus, and taken the Oaths of Fidelity and Obedience, departed from Ravitz, greatly pleafed with the gracions Reception he had met with from his Majesty, in his Way to Cracow, together with his Troops, which were reinforced with fome hundreds of Swedes, in order to join General Stromberg.

It has already been said, that Lieutenant-general Horn had negotiated at Dresden an Exchange of Prifoners. As foon therefore as the Affair was regulated, the Swedes, who had been under Guard in Saxony, were escorted to the Frontier of Sorau, where the Baron Charles Horn, Colonel of the Regiment de Breme, Hotse, had Orders to receive them, and afterwards terwards to deliver the Saxons, who were all new cloathed by Order of his Majesty.

In this Interval, King Stanislaus returned to his Castle of Ridzin. The Queen his Spouse, and Madam Royal his Majesty's Mother, arriving there likewise from Prnsja at the same Time.

The Queen, having notified her Arrival to his Swedish Majesty by Major general Sauerbre, that Prince immediately dispatched a Chamberlain with his Compliments; and, in the Morning, mounted on Horseback to make her the first Visit, being accompanied by the Prince of Wurtenberg, and certain Generals and Officers of his Court.

The Queen received that Prince in her Anti-chamber, and his Majesty led her by the Hand into her Apartment, where they both sate down. The King spoke but little, and in German, to the Queen, who had some small Knowledge of that Language; and, after an Hour's Stay, took his Leave in the politest Manner, and returned to Ravitz.

That little City was now filled with fine Company, and we diverted ourfelves there with so much the more Pleasure, as all Amusements had been for many Years unknown in the Court of Charles XII. The Place itself is situated so advantageously, that Travellers may repair thither both from Pomerania and Silesia, without being obliged to pass a great Way through Poland. His Majesty had beside permitted his Ministers, and the Officers of his Court, to enjoy there the Company of their Ladies, which gave Place to a great Number of Bills and Affemblies.

The Countess of Piper, Spouse to the Senator of that Name, had brought thither her Sister from Sweden, who was contracted to Lieutenant general Arwid Horn, newly delivered from Confinement at Dresden.

The Nuptials were now celebrated with great Magnificence: The Queen of Poland took that Opportunity to return his Majesty's Visit. King Sianislaus likewise made his Appearance there with all his Court. Both were received with all possible Regard; and it may be said, that his Majesty performed the Honours of the Feast with as much Politeness, as Grandeur and Dignity.

While these Diversions were thus. carried on in the King's Quarters, certain Incidents took Place, which then appeared purely casual, but were afterwards proved to be owing to a very different Origin. One fine Morning, at ten o'Clock, a Fire broke out in a House near the Lodgings of the Prince of Wurtenberg; his Majesty immediately ran thither, and, not content to encourage his People at a Distance to extinguish the Flames, he himself got up into the Granary of the very House, that was now on Fire, and continued there to give his Orders, though all the Apartments below were already near reduced to Ashes; a Piece of the Roof which was at that Instant beat down, by way of stifling the Fire, discovered him to those without furrounded with Smoak, and Fire, and Flames. What an affecting Sight, for all those faithful Swedes, who had fo often hazarded their Lives for a

Prince,

Prince, they now faw on the very Brink of Destruction? But, in spite of all the Prayers which they poured forth to prevail with him, to attempt to fave himself, he was not to be moved, and the Fire had already taken hold of the Stairs, which was the only Way he had to escape; when the young and gallant Prince of Wurtenberg darted through the Middle of the Smoke, and urged him in so earnest and passionate a Manner, that at last he condescended to think of retiring. But he had scarce quitted the Place where he had stood so long, as if in Contempt of Danger, but the Floor fell in, and a Ladder being at the fame Instant thrown down, it fell upon him and beat him to the Ground. Upon which the Fears and Outcries of the People on all Sides were redoubled; but he instantly got up again, and without the least Alteration in his Countenance, calmly told those who had run to his Affistance, 'Twas nothing. But notwithstanding all the Pains which his Majesty took to extinguish the Fire, it could not be mastered till it had burnt twenty-two Houses to the Ground.

Within a few Days after a second broke out, and no body could tell how; nor, till some Years after, was the Mystery explained: When a Man, having entreated an Audience of his Majesty, insisting that he had Matters of great Consequence to communicate, consessed he had received Money from a certain Court to set Fire to the King's Quarters, which he effected twice as above, in hope of an Opportunity during the Hurry to assassing the Hurry to assassing the Majesty. That he was each Time close by him, with a Delign to strike the Blow, but that his Heart always failed him. The King, after listening to this horrid Tale with perfect Screnity, only smiled, and said to those about him, The Man is mad. Let bim go about his Business.

Lieutenant-General Stromberg had conducted himself so handsomely, and preserved such exact Discipline in his little Army, that almost all the Nobility of the Palatinate of Cracow resolved to quit the Party of King Augustus, and declare for his Competitor.

King Stanislaus had writ circular Letters to that Palatinate, to dispose them to assemble themselves, and hold a Dietine in what Place they pleafed. They chose the City of Pozovice. where nine hundred Gentlemen assembled in the Beginning of May, and agreed unanimously to renounce the Confederacy of Sendemir, accede to that of Warlaw, and confequently acknowledge King Stanislaus for their Liege-Lord and Sovereign. At the same Time, they entreated his Spedish Majesty to renew the Negotiations with the Repuplick, which he had begun the preceding Year.

When the King had granted their Request, they resolved to send several Deputations. The first to King Stanislaus to acknowledge him in Form, and swear Fidelity to him; the second to the King of Sweden, to be seech him to wave his Contributions; the third to the Primate, to exhort him to fix a Day for the King's Coronation, at which they defined him to assist in Person; the south to the Crown-General, to invite him to join the Nobles of that Palatinate; and be prefent at the Coronation; the fifth to the neighbouring Palatinates, to induce them to defert the Confederacy of Sendomir, and come over to theirs; the fixth to the Crown-Army, to difpose them to return to their Obedience to the Crown-General, for the Service of the Republick, and attend at the Coronation; and the feventh and last to the Pope's Nuntio, to beseech him to make for reditary Domin an Indispositio him, and anot which had been proceed against the Cardinal Primate, or against the Bishop of Posnania in any Manner whatever.

The Cardinal having received at Dantzick the Deputies they had sent, and having agreed with his Majesty, as before mentioned, to acknowledge King Stanislaus, sent forth the Universalia in his Name, to convene Dietines sirst of all, according to Custom, June 16. in all the Palatinates of the Realm of Poland; and afterwards, July 1. 1705. a general Diet of Warsaw, inviting the Deputies of the Palatinates to repair thither at that Time, with their full Powers.

At the same Time, the Marshal of the Confederacy of Warsaw, who had retired, together with the Cardinal, to Dantzick, sent also in his own Name Universalia, of the same Date with those of the Cardinal's, to all the Palatinates, with the same View of convoking a general Diet at Warsaw.

King Augustus, who was all this while absent, and now saw the ill Confequences which threatened his Assairs in Poland, if not instancy prevented, applied himself with all the Attention possible to find out Expedients for that End. Informed of, and surprized at these Steps of the Primate and the Marshal, he endeavoured to thwart them by a Letter to the Senators, and his Universalia, which he dispersed through all the Palatinates of the Kingdom.

It was in these Universalia, he published the Reasons which had obliged. him to make so long a Stay in his hereditary Dominions; one of which was an Indisposition that had hung upon him, and another the Representations which had been made to him of the Danger of fuch a Journey, while the Swedes were always in the Field to obferve him. He affured the Republick, nevertheless, that he would be careful of their Interests; that he had them always at Heart; and that he would join his Army, which was afready cenfiderably reinforced, to that of the Crown; and in fine, he exhorted them to put their Troops upon a good Footing, and to continue stedfast and loyal. These Letters were writ from Carlsbad in Bobemia, where that Prince then was for the Benefit of the Wa-

Augustus also was very sollicitous to engage the Pope of his Side; by whose Means he hoped to conjure down the Storm now raised in Poland. In this View, he sent the Count de Lagnasco to Rome, and, as that wily Minister knew how to take Advantage of the Pontiss's Pretensions to the Temporals of Princes, he obtained a Brief to the Archbishops and Bishops of Poland, dated May 31 by which they were forbid, on the Penalties of the Censures of the Church, from being present, or affishing at the Coronation of the new King.

The Dietines were held in many of the Palatinates, agreeable to the circul i lar Letters of the Primate, and they had all the Success imaginable; especially in the Places, which were unmolested with the Enemy's Troops.

The Nobles of the Palatinate of Sendomir, lately so zealous for King Augustus, in favour of whom they had made that famous Confederacy, which bears its Name, assembled themselves, in the Beginning of June, in the City of Opatow, where Lieutenant General Stromberg, at their Request, posted the Regiment of Clerk, to protect them from all Insults.

This Palatinate followed the Example of that of Cracow; and, though a great Number of the Partizans of King Augustus endeavoured to invalidate their Conclusions by entering their Protests, those of King Stanislaus pushed them on so vigorously, that they proceeded to dissolve the Consederacy of Sendomir, to declare it null and void, and acknowledge Stanislaus to be rightful King of Poland.

They then deputed the Marshal of the Dietine, the Constable of Sendomir, and several other Persons of Quality, to King Stanislaus, to communicate to him the Result; and, though these Deputies were intercepted by Smigelski, and conducted to Brzeczi, it did not hinder the Nobility from assembling at Opatow, and confirming all the Resolutions they had before taken. After which they chose four Deputies more, and dispatched them to the general Diet at Warsaw, in Behalf of that Prince.

The Pope's Brief, upon which King Augustus had founded such great Hopes, at last arrived in Poland, and therein, 'the Pontist declared his Displeasure against the whole Ecclesia-flick State of the Realm, for having acted with such Violence against that Prince, and disposing themselves even to crown Stanislaus. He exhorted them to proceed no farther in it; and, in case of Resusal, he menaced those who interfered in it directly ox indirectly, with the apostolick Cenfures and Excommunication.

It was at first believed that this Brief would have thunder-struck the Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelates of the Realm, and that they would not dare to infringe it: Many Devotees, bigotted to the Holy See, being of Opinion they ought both to respect and fear the Thunder of the But the Nobles, however submissive they are in Poland to the papal Power, began then to regard with very different Eyes the imperious Conduct of the Court of Rome: And, as they regarded this as an Affair purely political, which had no Sort of Connection with Religion, they maintained with Vigour, that the Bishop of Rome had no Right to meddle with their Government, which was a Republick independent and free.

The Nobles of Great Poland, not content with publishing a Letter, both elegant and folid, against the Pope's Brief, and his imaginary Power, refolved, yet farther, to protest by a publick Manifesto against that Becree, and every thing that the Pontiff should undertake to the Prejudice of King They protested, at the Stanislaus. same Time, against the detaining the Bishop of Posnania, who was arrested at Rome, and declared that the States of Poland would never suffer that a Licence should be taken by that Court, to confine a Senator of their Republick.

Thus King Augustus, far from attaining the End he aimed at, only inflamed Matters yet more, and exasperated the sierce Poles, who are extremely jealous of their Rights and Privileges.

The Deputies of many Palatinates being then affembled at Warfaw, Bronitz the Marshal of the Confederacy arrived there likewise, July 1. upon which the Diet opened forthwith, tho there were yet but few Members.

The Marshal made a very fine Speech to the Deputies, to convince them, that, whether they were few or many, they ought to proceed in treating with the Swedes to re-establish the Peace they panted for; and then adjourned the Session till the eighth.

He then opened the Business of that Day with an obliging and delicate Compliment to those who were prefent, for having so punctually attended the Diet, and overlooked all private Considerations, for the Sake of deliberating on fuch Measures as would most advance the publick Good. which, they all unanimously accepted the Confederacy of last Year, and then proceeded to the Election of a new Marshal, when the Choice again fell on Brenitz. Who, taking up his Function anew, proposed to the Deputies three Points: The first to write to the Cardinal Primate, to invite him in the Name of the Nobility, to repair forthwith to the Diet: The second, to write likewise to the King of Sweden, to request him to send thither his Commissioners, to put a finishing hand to the Treaty: And the third, to befeech the new King to prevail with his Swedish Majesty to provide for the Safety of the other Deputies of Great Poland, who, without that, durst not fet out to affift at the Diet, on account of the continual Excursions of Smigel-ski. The Diet approved of all, but the Decision was deferred till the Arrival of the other Deputies, and the Cardinal, who gave continual Expectations of his speedy Attendance.

While these Things were transacting, the King of Sweden busied himself perpetually in putting his Army on a good Footing, that he might finish the Affairs of Poland in the glorious Manner he designed. The Months of May and June were employed wholly in reviewing the Troops; his Majesty visiting all his Regiments round, and having the Pleasure to see they were all fit for Service.

About this Time, a great Number of Strangers of Distinction arrived at Ravitz, and, among the rest, a Prince of the House of Bevern, and Prince Charles Leopol de Mecklenbourg, who followed his Majesty till the Year 1706. The Princess Palatine de Stegeborg, Cousin to the King, likewise repaired thither from Sweden, as did the Dutchesses of Bernstadt Juliusburg, and Mecklenburg-Strelitz, on their Domestick Affairs.

A certain Italian, who called himfelf a Prince of the House of Mazarani, also arrived there, and, as he changed his Religion, the King allowed him a Pension, which he posfessed two Years with very little Satisfaction, and then died in Poland oppressed with Troubles and Diseases.

Here the Prince de Saxe Gotha, a Lord of great Spirit and Resolution, who had sollowed the Army for some Years, having had a Quarrel with a Swedish Colonel, named Lagerscrona, since Major-General, which he gallantly terminated, took leave of his Majesty, and went into the Service of the Emperor; finishing his Career gloriously the next Year before the City of Toulon, greatly regretted by all the brave Men of our Army, who loved and esteemed him as he deferved.

For what regarded the Saxons, who retired in Haste from Cracow on the Approach of General Stromberg, and took the Road to Lublin, when they heard that Count Potocki, Palatine of Kiovia, was advancing towards them from Volkinia, they withdrew into the Country yet farther still, till they reached the City of Breszici, on the Frontiers of Lithuania.

Here they were joined by certain Detachments of the Crown Army, commanded by Comentofski, Polaneitski, the Referendary Reyvatski, and some others, who till then had continued on this Side the Vistula. They afterwards encamped along the Bug, as well to have an Eye on the Assembly at Warsaw, as to be nearer the Czar, who, together with his Army, was now in Lithuania, and promised to enter speedily into Poland.

That Prince had given Orders to Field-Marshal Scheremetoff to lead the Way with fisteen or twenty thousand Men, while he followed himself with the main Body of his Army, marching through the Palatinate of Polocsko towards Vilna. His numerous Artillery took the same Road, with all the Requisites for a Siege. At the City of Polocsko he halted, from whence it was easy to descend upon the Duna even to Riga, the Place which the Czar flattered himself he should either conquer, or, at least, lay in Ruins with his Bombs.

But, before he attempted a Design of such Importance, he judged it absolutely necessary to destroy that Body of Swedish Troops which was then in Courland, under the Command of Major-General Count de Lowenbaupt, which he believed easily done, as scarce amounting in all to seven thousand Men. For this End, he sent Orders to Field-Marshal Scheremetoff to enter forthwith into Courland, and offer Battle to Lowenbaupt.

The Muscovite Army confisted of fourteen thousand Horse and Dragoons, four thousand Foot, and two thousand Cosaques or Tartars; and marched on without Impediment, till they were in the very Heart of Courland.

Count Lowenbaupt, who had excellent Spies, had Intelligence of the Czar's Design from the Beginning of the Year, and thenceforward made it his Business to collect together all. the Troops he could; which effected, he posted Colonel Knorring, with a Part of his Regiment, in the City and Castle of Mitau, and resolutely expected the Enemy at Gemauerthoff, a Lordship but little removed from Mitau; where was fought a most bloody Battle, as appears by the following Relation, writ by an Officer who was prefent, and afterwards transmitted to the Chancery.

The Czar having for many Years past formed a Design to drive the Swedes out of Courland, resolved, while the victorious Arms of his Swedish Majesty were employed in Poland, to take the Advantage of that Opportunity, to become the more easily easily Master of Livonia. For which End, he had this Year made more than ordinary Preparations; his Troops being better disciplined, better cloathed than before, all in the German Manner, and commanded by experienced Generals.

As this Prince believed it necessary to surprize Count de Lowenbaupt, before he could augment the Number of his Troops, he ordered Field-Marshal Scheremetoff, with twenty thousand select Men, to go in Quest of him; who, though obliged to wind through tedious Doubles along the Sides of the Duna, yet, by long Marches, gained Ground apace, in the firm Belief, that, with fuch a superior Force, they should easily master the Swedes, possess all Courland, and carry on the Siege of Riga without Interruption; their Artillery being all ready at Polociko, and upon the Point of being fent down the River, to push that important Enterprize with all possible Vigour.

Count Lowenbaupt, who had early Advice of the Enemy's Design, had taken his Measures so well, that it was impossible for them to surprize him with all their Diligence. Accordingly, on the first Intelligence of the Approach of the Russians, he ordered all the Troops to rendezvous at the little Town of Jagari in Samogitia; where he received a Reinforcement of a thousand Foot from Count Frolich, General and Governor of Riga, commanded by Colonel Stackelberg.

All the Troops, Regiments, and Detachments, being affembled at Jagari, except Colonel Gabriel Horn, and Colonel Gustavus Charles de Schreiterfeld, who, because of the Distance of their Quarters could not reach it so foon, Count Lowenbaupt himself set out for Mitau, and arrived at the Rendezvous the same Night.

In the Morning, July 13. Colonel Horn joined us with his Horse and some Foot detached from Libau. The, fame Day a Groom arrived at the Camp from Mitau, with the vexatious News that General Bauer, at the Head of two thousand Russian Horse, had, between three and four o'Clock in the Morning, surprized the Guard of one of the Gates of Mitau, entered the City, and put to the Sword all they met of the Garrison; the rest having faved themselves in the Castle. Colonel Knorring, who was then in the City, was forced to make his Escape at a Back-door, after a valiant Defence through the Doors and Windows; but that the Enemy had taken the Colours of his Regiment, and all the Baggage.

Upon. receiving this News, Count Lowenhaupt, without delaying a Moment, took all the Horse and Dragoons, together with those of Colonel Horn, who had rested themselves but a sew, Hours, and pushed on, at sull Gallop, through Gemauershoff to Mitau, giving Orders to Colonel Stackelberg, who commanded the Insantry, to march to Gemauershoff, and there wait till farther Orders.

The 14th, at Day break, the General arrived at Mitau, having marched all Night in hope to have surprized the Enemy there, or at least followed close at their Heels; but was informed, they were already retired to their Camp near Ullfoten, four Leagues from Mitau, having gained no other Advantage by this Expedition, but an Opportunity to leave behind them

the most horrible Marks of their Cruelty.

When our Troops, who were dreadfully fatigued, had reposed themfelves till five o'Clock in the Evening, the General gave Orders to remount, and marched all Night through the most dreadful Roads, in the most shocking Darkness, accompanied with continual Rains, which rendered the Service yet more painful. At five o'Clock in the Morning, however, we made a shift to reach Gemauerthoff, Colonel Schreiterfeld being already there with his Foot; so that now all the Troops his Majesty had in Courland, were assembled in one Body.

The 15th, the Army rested.

The 16th, at ten in the Morning, the Allarm was given that two Companies of Cosaques were carrying off certain of our Maroders; and, upon the first Fire, Lieutenant-Colonel Magnus von Bromsen was detached with about a hundred Horse to give them Chace. After which he was ordered to post himself half a League from the Camp, to observe if it was the whole Army of the Enemy that approached.

About two o'Clock he returned with News, that the Enemy appeared in great Numbers, upon which the General forthwith commanded the whole Army to pass the Rivulet, which was near Gemauerthoff, and range themselves in order of Battle on the other Side; which Place he chose, as being so narrow in Front, that his Troops, which were not very numerous, could make Head without being obliged to extend their Line, and without Danger of being surrounded.

'At the same Time he himself advanced with Bromsen to reconnoite the Enemy; and, being convinced it was their whole Army coming to engage him, he returned immediately to his own, whom he ranged in two Lines; the first exceeding close, and the second with certain Intervals.

On our Right we had a great Morass, and our Left was covered by the Brook in such a Manner, that there was no passing our Front on either Side. The Cannon was posted between the Battalions and Squadrons of the two Lines, on each Wing, and the Baggage made up the Rear; the Day being almost spent before the whole Army was ranged.

Count Lowenbaupt then addressing himself to the Lord of Hosts and Victories, ordered the Prayers usual upon the like Occasions; the Cavalry alighting, and the whole two Lines kneeling upon the Field. The Prayer ended with a verse taken from a Hymn, which was echo'd by the whole Army, and then the Signal was given, with the Help of God, and in the Name of Jesus.

Immediately Count Lowenbaupt gave Orders to Colonel Stackelberg. and Lieutenant-Colonel Lawrence Lofcher de Hertzfeld, with four Squadrons of Horse, to advance some thousands of Paces to observe the Aspect of the Enemy, and retire when he should see them approach. But the Wood which was to our Left, hindered them from discerning the Motions of the Enemy, who, passing the Brook, and almost furrounding them, began the Attack immediately with Abundance of Impetuofity, but received in Return fo fmart a Volley, that they retired fome Paces, and gave our Troops Opportunity to recover the Army.

Count

Their Cavalry which was on our left Wing, having difmounted the Foot they carried behind them, fell on our Squadrons with great Fury, both with their Fire-arms and Swords; but were received with fo much Vigour, that a great Slaughter enfued on both Sides. At last, certain Russian Squadrons having passed the Brook, a little below, to attack us in Flank, our Cavalry, on the Left, found themfelves so hard pushed, that, in the first Shock, they fell back on a Company of Count Lowenbaupt's Grenadiers, posted between the two Lines; which putting them in Disorder too, and the whole Wing finding itself straitned for Want of Room, the Victory was in Suspence, till the Horse of the second Line, together with the Foot, came into the Support of the first, which was on the Point of breaking, and gave them both Time to rally, and even to repulse the Enemy.

It was then the Russian Infantry, who had rode behind the Cavalry, being abandoned by the Horse, and enclosed between our two Lines, were all cut to Pieces.

As to our right Wing, it had bore down all before it. The Colonels Horn and Schreiterfeld, with their Regiments of Horse and Dragoons, as well as the Foot who were to support them, appearing irresistible; the first charging the Enemy Sword in Hand, the latter with their Musquets and Bayonets; and the Enemy's Horse being no sooner routed, but they fell in upon their Infantry, and put them almost all to the Sword.

The Field of Battle enlarging in Proportion as the Enemy gave Ground and we advanced, Count Lowenbaupt perceived the Advantage arising from the Disposition he had made of certain Battalions and Squadrons between the two Lines, since they immediately lengthened out the Front towards the Right, in such a Manner, that the whole Space was still filled as before.

While we pushed the Enemy thus vigorously on that Side, where all was in the most perfect Order, and bore the most noble Aspect, a strong Party of their Horse, which had, at first, disordered our Left, being reinforced with a great Number of Squadrons' from their Right, repassed the Brook, and together with the Cosaques and Poles, fell in upon our Baggage, which they pillaged, and then attacked our Rear with all the Fury imaginable. The same Instant likewise, the rest of the Enemy's Troops in Front taking: Courage, returned to the Charge; so that our two Lines were both engaged at once, as well in Front as in Rear, to the Right as Left; and, what was worst of all, neither of them would come to engage with their whole Strength. The Enemy, though always repulsed, returning again to the Attack, and, as they were superior in Number, falling upon us on all Sides with Abundance of Fury.

But, in spite of all, our two Lines, after a horrible Slaughter, and having fustained a most dreadful Fire with all possible Bravery and Firmness, at last repulsed the Enemy on both Sides, the fecond Line routing and pursuing their Left over the Brook, Sword in Hand; and obliging them to abandon certain Cannon which were left in the Water. They nevertheless drew up in Order of Battle on the other Side; and General Lowenbaupt, observing the Disorder of our Troops, and the great Intervals between the Battalions and Squadrons, occasioned by the very extraordinary Manner in which they had been obliged to engage, would not fuffer them to charge again, till, running from Rank to Rank, he had again drawn them up in Order of Battle.

But while he was thus employed in - rallying our Left, which was far divided from the Right, the Cavalry of the last, impatient to finish the Dispute, passed the Brook, and attacked the Enemy anew; being followed by the Foot, who likewise passed the Brook, and supported the Cavalry with an extraordinary Vigour. Count Lowenbaupt observing this voluntary Motion of our Troops, and the Intrepidity with which they behaved, after having , entirely ranged the Left, commanded them to pass the Brook too with all possible Expedition, and form themfelves into one Line conjunctively with the Right on the other Side. Order was well obeyed in the Midst of a brisk and continual Fire, and, tho? the Enemy's Cavalry attacked us in the Interval with inexpressible Fury, and at many Returns; our Infantry, who had now rendered themselves formidable in fustaining the Horse so well, that they kept the Enemy at Bay, and gave them Time to prepare themselves again for Action.

While this was in Agitation, our Infantry on the Right was employed in the same gallant Manner; for our Horse being too far divided from them, were repulsed in great Consusion, and owed their Sasety to the noble Stand made by the first; behind whom they rallied, and who, during that Interval, not only sustained the utmost Efforts of the Enemy, but obliged them to retire in Disorder.

Count Lowenbaupt, who was very fensible that while our two Wings were thus divided, we could never finish so obstinate a Struggle with the Glory he desired, order'd the Right to halt at once, till the Lest, which was marching sull Speed, came up: When, the whole Army being now formed into one Front, we paused a little while to observe the Disposition of the Enemy; it already growing dark, and both Men and Horses excessively satigued, in a Combat which had lasted four Hours and a half, with an almost unparallelled Oostinacy on both Sides.

The Enemy, surprized at the fine Arrangement of our Army, which was prepared to conquer or die, in that Instant, lost all their Resolution, and, without observing any Order, fled precipitately to their Baggage, which was about half a League from the Field of Battle; where, exasperated to have been routed by an Army so inferior in Number, they fell in a Transport of Rage upon the Prisoners they had taken at Mitau, and, with a Barbarity beyond Example, put the poor, helpless Wretches to the Sword; of all whom two Officers only recovered, who, being cruelly wounded, were left for dead among the rest, and who afterwards recounted to the General this affecting Tragedy.

At the same Time, the Enemy, taking all the Baggage they could carry off, fled full Speed to their first Camp; from whence Marshal Scheremetoff set out forthwith, tho' wounded, to bear the News of his own Misfortune to the Czar, who was then at Wilna; where he arrived just as that Prince was employed in reviewing his Army, furrounded with several of the Polish and Lithuanian Nobility.

'We took on the Field of Battle thirteen Pieces of Brass Cannon, all the Enemy's Carriages and Tents, eight Enfigns, and one Standard; without reckoning those which the Peasants found after the Action, and which our Troops had no Time to gather up in the Heat of the Combat.

After the Action was over, the Army rested all Night upon their Arms in order of Battle; and the Peafants pillaged, in the mean while, what Baggage the Enemy had left in their Camp, and what they had scattered in their Flight. We counted at least five or fix thousand Russians killed upon the Spot; and, fince, the Prisoners have confessed, that their Infantry, amounting to four thousand Men, were all cut off, together with a great Number of Officers; and that many more were wounded than killed; among whom was General Scheremetoff himself, who received a Musket-shot in his Belly, and General Bauer, who was wounded in the Thigh. The Officers and Soldiers, who were taken Prisoners, were immediately sent, together with the Trophies, to Riga.

We ourselves lost in this Action many brave Officers, viz. Colonel Gabriel Horn, the Lieutenant-Colonels Dankwarth and Kaulbars, Count Lindschold, and Baron Wrangel; certain Captains both of Horse and Foot, with about seven hundred Men, who were killed outright, beside the Wounded.

Such was the Manner in which fo fignal a Victory was obtained by our Troops, over a much more numerous, (especially in Horse) and at the same Time, a well-disciplined Army.

The Czar, after the Loss of this Battle, changed his Design forthwith, either of besieging or bombarding Riga, and countermanded his heavy Artillery, which was already coming down the Duna from Poloczko towards Riga. But, as he openly threatened to return speedily, with Forces yet more formidable, Lowenbaupt, who durst not run the Hazard of a second pitch'd Battle with fo potent an Enemy, resolved to post himself in such a Manner, that he might be always fure of a fafe Retreat to Riga: Which he executed some Time after; being obliged, notwithstanding the Glory of his Triumph, to leave Courland expofed to all the Enterprizes of the Czar; leaving only a Garrison in Mitau and the Castle of Bausk, to retard at least the first Attempts of the Enemy.

Upon the Instances of King Staniflaus and of the Assembly at Warlaw, his Swedish Majesty having detached Lieutenant-General Nierotb with three Regiments of Cavalry to cover the Diet, and the Deputies in their Journey thither, that General encamped below the City, on the Side of the than, while the Diet sate and deliberated on a Peace with Sweden, to cover that illustrious Assembly from all Insult; it was resolved to send thither likewise two Regiments of Foot, who were moreover to serve as an Escort to King Stanislaus at the same Time; who, after having took Leave of the King, and received the Visits of all the Court from Ravitz, set out for Warsaw with the three Swedish Ambassadors, which were present at his Election the Year before.

King Augustus could not well avoid making all his Efforts to interrupt a Feast, which was to be made at his Expence, and disperse the Nobility who were met to crown his Rival; and therefore had sent proper Orders to Lieutenant General Paikul, who commanded in chief in Poland those Troops, which had sted at the Approach of Stromberg, towards Cracow; and afterwards retired to Breszizi, and from thence to the Bug.

That General, believing himself superior to the Swedes, by the Number of his own Troops, and the additional Scrength of 80 or 90 Companies of the Crown-Army, which were but a little Way removed from his Camp, joined Forces with them directly; and, after having held a Council of War, it was resolved to attack Nieroth out of hand, before he could be succoured by the Infantry which were to join him.

Nieroth, on the other hand, was early informed by his Spies of these Motions of Paikul; but as the Vistula, both above and below the City, was in many Places so low, that the Cavalry could ford it over, he could not determine where to post his Troops, to dispute their Passage. He therefore ordered out two Detachments of a hundred and eighty Horse each, one under the Command of Stablbammar towards Gara, and the other, under the Command of Lieutenant-Colonel Clas Bonde, towards Kapum, to observe what Rout they would take.

Clas Bonde marched down the Vifula, and, having learned, during the Night, that the Saxons were in full March, about a League from thence, nearer Warlaw, to attempt a Passage, forthwith put himself at the Head of twenty Horse, leaving the rest behind, and marched full Speed towards them for better Information: At his Arrival, he found one Party actually come over, whom he instantly attacked Sword in Hand with all imaginable Bravery, hoping to oblige them to return the Way they came; but the Saxons being superior in Number, and reinforced besides every Moment, that Handful of gallant Men were almost all killed upon the Spot, together with their Lieutenant-Colonel.

The rest of the Detachment, commanded by the Captains Wrangel, Witting, and Ellberg, being come up by this Time to support their Leader, were so ill conducted, that, not being able to make Head against a Number fo superior, one Captain and fixty-two Men were flain; the Remainder being obliged to fight their Way through the Enemy in order to make their Escape, and inform Nieroth of their Miladventure, and the Approach of Paikal; who, being now puffed up with so happy a Beginning, and depending still on the Superiority of his Numbers, believed he should meet no farther Obstacle; and that he should make as good a Market of Nierath, as of his Detachment. Having then, July the 19th and 20th, passed the rest of his Army over the Vistula, he marched, full of Considence, towards Warsaw.

Nieroth, informed of his Approach, marched forthwith out of his Camp with his little Army, ranged in one fingle Line, to render his Front as wide as possible to encounter so potent an Enemy, and, in this Order, advanced shercely towards the Enemy. But the Night approaching hindered the Combat, and the General returned towards the City; his Right being placed near the Palace of Labomirski, and his Lest extending from Ujast to the Village of Rakevist.

In the Morning, July 21. at four o'Clock, General Nieroth gave Orders to march towards the Enemy. He had but three Regiments of Horse, as before mentioned, that of Smoland, the Ostrogoths, and Colonel Kruns, which did not amount in all to more than two thousand Men. Nieroth himself commanded the Centre, Kruus the Right, and Burenschild the Lest. The Squadrons were ranged in one Line, as before, two deep; and, in about two Hours, came in-Sight of the Enemy.

The Saxons, commanded by General Paikul, Major-General Schulenbourg, and Major St. Paul, were in the Centre, confisting of twelve Regiments, divided into forty-three little Squadrons, ranged in three Lines, which made in all four thousand Horse. In the right Wing Marshal Commentofski, Marshal Denbof, and Poloniecz, commanded forty Companies of the Crown Army. And in the Lest, Prince John Wisniowiski, and the Referendary Ruvaiski commanded fifty more of fixty Men each; all which were Poles, and amounted to fix thousand Men, who were ranged in two very long Lines.

It was about eight o'Clock in the Morning when the Armies approached, the Saxons beginning the Attack in Front, while the Poles, extending their long Lines to furround us, fell upon our Squadrons both in Flank and Rear, infomuch that we feemed to be in no small Danger.

Nieroth, as well as Kruus and Burenschild, had each so much to do to defend themselves, that neither of them were able to affift the others; nay, were even obliged to separate into different Bodies; which Paikul obferging, and what large Intervals were left between our Regiments, instantly detached fix Squadrons, who fell in Flank upon the Regiment of Kruus, threw some Squadrons into Disorder, and even took three Standards. But. while the Colonel was using his utmost Efforts to prevent the mischievous Consequences of this dangerous Shock, the Left Wing of the Saxons, repulled by the vigorous Resistance of our Troops, who were refolved to maintain their Ground, took to their Heels, and were briskly pursued by Nieroth.

By this Time Kruus, likewise had the Happiness to break the Enemy on his Side, and, in the End, put them totally to the Route. Burenschild, who had till then the whole Right of the Enemy on his Corps, began to breathe upon this Alteration, and Lieutenant-Colonel Sak, at the same Instant, running to his Succour with certain Squadrons of Kruus's Regiment, and sixty K k 2

Foot, commanded by Captain Kafle, they afforded so much Business to the Poles and Saxons, that they likewise, at last, sollowed the Example of the rest, and sted full Speed towards the Village of Vola, where rallying, they were again attacked and routed, and their General Paikul taken Prisoner. After which they posted on to the Vistula, which they passed in the utmost Consusion.

We did not pursue them far, because a great Number of Tartars and Cosaques who had fled towards the Vistula, wheeled suddenly about, and were pillaging our Camp; but were soon dispersed by our Squadrons, and a great Part pushed into the River, where many of them were drown'd.

After the Action was over, which lasted from eight o'Clock in the Morning till two in the Afternoon, Nieroth, having re-assembled all his Troops, returned in good Order to his Camp, with his Trumpets and Kettle-drums sounding, and leading General Paikul, together with one Captain, five Lieutenants, two Field-Chaplains, sive Corporals, one Trumpet, a hundred and seven Saxons, and certain Poles Prisoners.

The Saxons lost in the Battle Colonel Wideman, the Lieutenant-Colonels Winckelman and Dieke, many Captains, and about five hundred killed upon the Spot, without reckoning the Poles, of whom many likewise perished in the Vistula.

Of our Side, the Regiment of Smoland had one Cornet killed, and seven wounded. That of Oftrogothia, the Captains Lagerfelt, Bagge, and Brummer, sive Lieutenants, sixty Subalterns, and seventy Troopers killed; and the Captains Bebrn, Ekebielm and Brun, two Cornets, three Corporals, one Trumpet, and eighty-one wounded. The Regiment of Kruus had two Lieutenants, three Subalterns, and thirty-four Men killed; and certain Lieutenants and Cornets, two Subalterns, and thirty Men wounded.

It is not possible to express the Terror which seized the Deputies assembled at Warsaw, at the first News of the Approach of the Saxons and Poles. They could not believe that Nieroth could make head against such a superior Force, without being destroyed: In which Conceit they set out all together, and each endeavour'd to make his Escape as sast as possible.

The Marshal Bronitz alone, more firm than all the rest, not only remained behind, but shared in the Danger of the Day: After which he sent out Couriers all round about, to recal the sugitive Deputies, who, by little and little, returned to Warsaw, together with those who had been sent from the Palatinates of Cracow and Sendamir.

After which, in one of their Sittinge, the Marshal acquainted them that King Stanislaus was upon the Road to Warsaw, together with the Ambassadors of Sweden, to put the last Hand to the Tranquillity of the Kingdom, and the Treaty with his Swedish Majesty.

But what most pacified their Fears, was the Arrival of Colonel Dabldorff with two Regiments of Foot, that of Upland, and that of Dabl-Carlia, which encamped together with Nieroth to cover the City of Warsaw from any new Attack of the Saxons, which they had strongly threatened the As-

fembly with. But, after the Arrival of this Reinforcement, instead of making any such Attempt, they took their Rout to Lithuania, in order to join the Czar, and avoid the Hazard of any more Trials of Skill with our Troops, whose Valour they now understood so well.

The King of Sweden had now compleated the Review of his Cavalry in the Neighbourhood of Ravitz, and made them go through their Exercises after a new Regulation, (since printed) which was the Fruit of his leisure Hours, during the Winter; and which was admired by the most experienced Generals and Officers, who were astonished at the Penetration of that Prince, in forming so many judicious Evolutions, both useful and necessary for engaging with Security and Advantage.

His Majesty had likewise done the same by three Regiments of Dragoons, which were newly arrived from Pomerania, and then gave Orders for the whole Army to take the Field. The Swedish Ladies, who were permitted to stay at Ravitz during the Winter, first setting out from that Place, and returning home by the Way of Breslau.

As his Majesty judged it necessary to leave an Army in Great Poland, both for its Security, and to observe the Motions of the Saxons on the Frontier, General Rheinschild received Orders to stay there with thirteen Regiments, three of them Cavalry, that of the Nobles, of Scania, and of Nylande; sive of Dragoons, the Guards, Buchwald's, Crassau's, Mellin's, and Marschalck's; and sive of Foot, de Wasmanlande and Sudermanlande, de

July 29. the King set out from Ravitz, with the rest of the Army, taking the Road to Warsaw, with the Court and the Drabans; making that Day a most violent March through Koblin, Stun, and Taschina, as far as Krotoczin, (sive Leagues) the Rendezvous of all the Regiments of the King's Division, who had Orders to leave their Quarters, and repair thither forthwith.

The same Day General Paikul arrived there under a strong Escorte. Many Letters were found about him, discovering the Designs of the Enemy, in particular, that the Czar engaged to be at Warsaw by the 20th of August, to break up the Diet, and enclose the Swedes by the Help of the Saxons, who were to enter into Poland on the other Side.

The Project was good; but so far from giving the King any Pain for the Consequences, that he said, with a Smile, to his Ministers, I wish the Enemy may keep their Word.

July 31. the Army marched three Leagues to Rasko, the next Day three more to Kalis, the next four to Ravoitzin, the next to the City of Uniejoue, the next to Wirbosska, where they rested one Day. After which they advanced to the City of Pionteck, thence to Lowitz, and the next Day six Leagues upon a Stretch to Blonir, which is but four Leagues from Warsaw, where the King had his head Quarters the Year before. The Army had now marched thirty Leagues in eight Days, and both Men and Horse being excessively satigued, his Majesty ordered them to be cantoned out in the Neighbourhood of Blonia, to take some Repose.

King Stanislaus, together with his Court, and the Swedish Ambassadors, was already arrived at Warfaw the ith, and the Queen some Days after. The next Morning, August 8. the King of Sweden took a Tour to see the Field of Battle, where Nieroth had beat the Saxons, after which, together with the Prince of Wurtenberg, who was never from his Side, he repaired to the Vistula, to direct a Bridge to be thrown over, to keep the Communication free.

August 21. the Ambassadors of Swea den had a private Audience of King Stanislaus, as well to avoid the Ceremonial, as because they had a publick one the Year before; when the Ambaffador Horn presented a Letter from the King his Master, in which he asfured his Majesty of Poland, of a strict and inviolable Friendship; and likewise explained, that the End of this new Embaffy was to recommence the Negotiations, and put the last Hand to the Treaty of Alliance, necessary to be concluded for re-establishing the Tranquillity of the two Realms.

The Conferences were opened in the Cloister of Carmelites at Warsaw, and because, since the last Year, some of the Polish Commissaries had quitted the Confederacy at Warfaw, as the Crown General, and others had been taken Prisoners by the Enemy, as the Bishop of Posnania, they chose in their Stead the Bishop of Caminick, together with two Senators, the Constables of Siradia, Sandec, and other Polish Lords.

The first Proposals made by the Swedish Ambassadors, were to fix a Day for the Coronation; to make a more strict Alliance against the Czar and King Augustus; and to restore the House of Sapieba to all their Rights and Privileges.

The Poles, on their Side, insisted on the Renewal and Guarantee of the Treaty of Oliva; that no Province. Territory, or City of the Republick of Poland should be dismembred; that no more Contributions should be exacted; and that the Swedes should restore all the Cannons, and Train of Artillery, which they had taken from the Republick during the Course of the War. They likewise proposed many other Articles, which were afterwards inferted in the Treaty, as we shall fee in the Sequel.

In the mean while the Deputies continued their Conferences with great Affiduity. They agreed unanimously to reply to the Pope, touching his Brief against the Clergy, and to complain of the long Detainder of the Bishop of Posnania in the Castle of St. Angelo. They were even so irritated against his Holiness, that some Deputies proceeded fo far as to fay, that he neither behaved as the Vicar of Fesus Christ, or the Successor of St. Peter; but as a Pharaob, who would affaffinate Liberty with Faith, and Faith with Liberty.

The Rep'y to the Pope was actually fent to Rome, Sept. 3. N. S. 1705. and addressed to the Queen of Poland, that fhe herself might present it to his Holiness. In the mean Time the Palatinates of Catis, Posnania, and Great Poland, approved and confirmed ancw the Manifolto, which had been prepared against the Pope in favour of King Stanislaus. When all these Things were thus feetled, the 24th of September was appointed for his Coronation; but it was not fo easy to fix where the Ceremony should be performed. By the Laws and Constitutions of Poland, as well as Custom Time out of Mind, the King ought slways to be elected at Warfaw, and crowned at Cracow; and many of the Poles, scrupulously attached to these Formalities, infifted on their being observed, and that the King should repair to Cracow for that End. which the Swedilb Ambassidors, on the other hand, replied, that, to avoid the Inconveniencies easily to be forefeen in such a Circumstance as the prefent, they might, for this once, very well dispense with an obsolete Custom; that there was no Time to be lost; shat all Delay, at fuch a Crisis, might be attended with dangerous Confequences; and finally, that the Necesfity to dispatch forthwith an Affair of fuch Importance, ought to prevail over all the Laws and Customs of the Kingdom; especially as the Tranquillity and Happiness of the Publick absolurely depended upon it.

The Deputies, at last, gave Way to these Reasons; and it was only agreed to insert in the circular Letters to notify the Coronation, the following Clause, viz. That, though that Ceremony was now performed at Warfaw, it should not be esteemed a Precedent for the future, or become any Prejudice to the Laws and antient Customs of Poland.

Prelate, who should perform the Ceremonial. The Cardinal Primate was in a Town dependent on Poland; but as he always declared in his Letters that it was impossible for him to assist at the Coronation, and that he would approve all that should be done in his Absence, as if performed by himself, the Archbishop of Leopol, who was arrived at Warsaw, offered himself to officiate instead of the Cardinal.

When all these Things were thus regulated, the necessary Preparations were made for that superb Solemnity. As King Augustus had with him the Crown, ordinarily used at the Coronation of the Kings of Poland, two others were ordered to be made forthwith of massy Gold, garnished with Jewels, both for the King and Queen, with all the other Ornaments of Royalty.

While these Affairs were going forward at Warsaw, the Czar made long Marches towards Courland; being irritated with the Defeat of Scheremetoff, he had resolved to satisfe his Revenge; and accordingly, his Army commanded, under him, by Menzikoff, Ronne, and Repnin; soon reduced the whole Province except Mitau and Bauske.

Lowenbaupt, who foresaw the Return of the Russian Troops, and who was too weak to make head against so potent an Enemy, was already retired under the Cannon of Riga, in order to cover that City; which he could the more easily do; as his best Troops consisted in Infantry.

This Movement of his hindered the Czar from undertaking the Siege of that Place, he contented himself with sending a large Detachment to observe Lowenbaupt, and cut off all Communication between Riga and Coursand after which, to compleat the Reduction of that Province, Ang. 15. he entered into the City of Mitau, and, having forthwith invested the Castle, Summoned the Governor, Colonel For ran Knorring, to furrender himself and his Garrison Prisoners of War. To which the other not only returned a fierce Answer, but gave the Czar to understand, that if he made his Attack on that Side, (where the Castlo was most accessible) he would set the City on Fire about his Ears.

The Citizens, terrified with this Resolution of the Governor's, threw themselves at the Feet of the Czar. and befought him not to expose them to the Ruin they were threatened with. Their Instances prevailed; and he began his Approaches on the other Side of the River, though the Work was much more difficult, because of the Marshiness of the Soil. This, however, was but a poor Consolation for the Garrison, who had no Succours to expect, more especially as the Batteries of Cannons and Mortars advanced insensibly, and the Enemy were soon in a Condition to batter down the Fortifications, which were, at best, but feeble. Accordingly, September 3. the Enemy, having thrown about a hundred Bombs, and made a Breach in the Space of twenty-four Hours with nine Pieces of Cannon, two Bastions were already so dismantled, that the Besiegers made all ready for an Asfault.

Upon which the Governor, willing to preserve the Garrison, beat a Parly the next Morning, and demanded to capitulate; which being granted by General Repain, who conducted that Attack, he marched out with all the Honours of War, such as Drums beating, Colours flying, twelve Pieces of Cannon, one Mortar, thirteen Cartridges for each Cannon, and Ammunition for the Soldiers, who were escorted by the Regiment of Dragoons de Renne, as far as Riga.

The Castle of Bauske, which was yet less able to resist an Enemy than that of Mitau, did not hold out so long; so that, after the Conquest of these two Places, the Czar became Master of all Courland. After which. and after having left Garrisons in both; as likewise a considerable Body of Troops under General Bauer, for the Security of that Province, and another in Livonia under Velt-Marshal Scheremetoff, he resolved to keep his Word with Augustus, in marching towards Warfaw, in order to break up the Diet.

Accordingly, he entered into Lithuania at the Head of his Army, together with a hundred Pieces of Cannon, having left his heavy Artillery at Polocsko. Being arrived at Grodno, he fortified that Place, seized the Pass of Tykozin, and established Magazines in various Places, which he filled, not only with what he drew from the Country, but what was transported from the Provinces of Plesko and Smolensko. He likewise took Possession of several Posts on the Side of Warsaw, as far as Pultowck and the Bug, infomuch that he was likewise absolute Master of Lithuania, and made it appear, by the Measures he took, that he intended to keep it; which was afterwards more manifest, by certain intercepted Letters: He had even already taken the Title of Grand-Duke, and pretended to unite that great great Province to his other vast Territories.

Polish Prussia was now exposed to the Ravages of the Crown Army. Commentofski surprized a little Detachment from Elbing, in the City of Marionbourg, who, after some little Defence, were obliged to furrender themselves Prisoners of War. City was afterwards plundered, and loaded, as well as the whole District, with heavy Contributions.

Smigelski, likewise, entered into the Bishoprick of Warmia, and carried off from Helisberg and other Places, certain Swedish Parties, who had been detached to levy Contributions, and plundered them of the Money they had collected: One Swedish Captain only, having re-assembled his Men in Time, made so gallant a Defence, that Smigelski, after a long and obstinate Attack, was obliged to quit his Prey, and, in the Apprehension that the Garrison of Elbing would come to the Succour of the Captain, retired out of the Bishoprick of Warmia. Troops having plundered the Country of all they could carry off.

Over and above the March of the Czar, another Tempest was ready to burst over Poland. The Hitmann Mazeppa, by the Order of that Prince, advanced at the Head of his Cosaques, amounting to forty or fifty thousand Men, across the Ukrain, and from Volbinia as far as Zamoisk upon the Wieprz, in the Palatinate of Beliz: And, having taken Zamoisk, after a short Siege, imposed Contributions, even to the Vistula, above Lublin.

It appeared then, by the Approach of such large Forces on all Sides, that the War was breaking out anew; and that all these Nations pretended to nothing less than to (wallow us down whole: For now King Augustus, at . the Head of twenty thousand Saxons, was likewise ready to enter into Poland, and fall upon General Rheinschild. But happily all these dreadful Phantoms disappeared, as if by Miracle, within less than a Year; that is to say, when Charles XII. entered with his Army into Lithuania.

During this Interval, Count Potocki, Palatine of Kiovia, arrived at Warfaw with his Troops, among whom were eight hundred Calmuck Tartars, whose flat and horrible Faces, and strange Way of living, afforded our Army not a little both of Wonder and Enter-

They had all likewise Horses as ugly and deformed as themselves, but so admirable for Speed and Labour. that the King, the Prince of Wurtenberg, and feveral others bought a great Number of them, from forty to fixty Ducats apiece. They being able in two Days Time, to march thirty Leagues and more upon a Stretch.

Count Potocki, a little while after, joined the Great-General Sapieba, and both passed the Vistula, for the being more easily supplied with Provisions. Prince Wisniowiski, who was posted near Wengorod, at first seemed disposed to dispute their Passage, but gave over his Delign, and moved quite off after the Coronation.

When the Senators and Deputies of Poland had prepared the Patta Conventa, King Stanislaus repaired the Eve of his Coronation to the Church of St. John, to swear to his solemn Observance of it. Sept. 23. his Majesty set out from the Palace de Bielinſķi,

The King's, in which he sate alone, was preceded by a Number of Nobles on Horse-Horseback, and by the Life-Guards who were on Horseback too. While all the Company ranged themselves on each Side of the Gate to receive his Majesty, the Archbishop of Lepol, Scielin/ki, robed pontifically, repaired to the Grand Altar, whither the King followed through the Body of the Church, which was illuminated with a double Row of Flambeaux, from End to End. Then the Archbishop read the Pasta-Conventa, and the Formulary of the Oaths, which his Majesty took upon his Knees, and was afterwards reconducted to the Palace 'in the same Order; only with this Difference, that the Archbishop, who had first laid aside his Pontificals, sate backward in his Majesty's Coach, together with Spiski, Bishop of Caminieck.

The Day following, their Majesties repaired to the Castle incog. having fasted three Days successively to prepare themselves for that Solemnity, together with the Communion; and, while the Senators, Deputies, and Nobles assembled, put on their Robes. Here follows the Manner of the Ceremony in the Church. At every Gate was posted a Guard of Swedes, together with a Polish Officer to examine all who entered. In the Choir, opposite to the great Altar, and upon a. Level with it, was erected an Estrade, on which, beneath two Canopies, were placed two Thrones, furrounded with the Life guard; one Side of the Choir being allotted to the Swedish Officers, and the other for the Grandees and Deputies of Poland. Between the first Row of Pews and the Altar were placed three Elbow-Chairs; over which Place was a little Room, with a Window into the Church, from whence the Kings of Poland used to hear Mass. This was let apart for the King of Sweden, who, together with with Count Piper, the Princes of Wurtenberg and Mecklenbourg, and certain other Swediff Lords attended there to observe the Ceremony: Opposite to which was a Balcony, where sate Madam Royal the King's Mother, and certain other Ladies of the highest Quality.

The Procession from their Majesties Apartments to Church began with the Gentlemen in the Train of the Swedish Ambassadors, followed by the Polish Deputies, and a great Number of the Then Mr. Garofski, the Swerd-bearer of Posnania, with the Sword; the Constable of Radziec, with the Globe; the Constables of Jung, Wladislaw and Leurre, with the Sceptres; the Grand General of Lithuania, Constable of Wilna, and Mr. Zopolski, Constable of Siradia, with the Crowns. All being borne on Cushions of Cloth of Silver. the Standard or Banner of the Kingdom, which used to be carried abreast with the Sword, it was not used on this Occasion.

These Ensigns of Royalty were sollowed by the Treasurer Sapieba, who officiated as Grand Marshal, carrying the Bittoon, pointing downwards, till after the Ceremony, when it was to be carried upright, according to the Custom of Poland.

The Ambassadors Waehslager and Palmberg preceded his Majesty.

Then the King, armed and robed as before described, being supported by Mr. Potocki, Grand-Commissary of Lithuania, and the Starost Sapieba.

After whom followed the Queen, led by Baron Horn, the principal in the Swedish Embassy; the whole Train being closed by the Ladies and principal Officers of the Court.

When the first Persons in the Procession entered the Church, the Mulick began from two Galleries, and encreased in such Proportion as it advanced, that the whole Band were in their fullest Concert, at the Moment his Majesty appeared. All being ranged, those, who carried the Regalia, as they approached the Altar, deliver'd them into the Hands of the Ecclesiasticks, who placed the King's Crown somewhat higher than all the Two Bishops, and two other: Prelates received his Majesty, and, complimented him at the Foot of the Throne. Then the two first led him to the Altar, and the Queen passed into the Vestry.

The Archbishop being robed pontifically, and seated before the Altar, the Bishop of Caminieck addressed the following Words to him in Latin: Our Mother, holy Church, desires that this valiant Knight, elected King, should be crowned. Upon which the Archbishop demanded, Is he worthy? Does he design to fulfil his Duty? And the Bishop answered, Yes he is worthy, and will fulfil it.

The Archbishop then proceeded to a Prayer; after which he addressed a short Discourse to the King, on the Duties of his Function, and asked him if he was disposed to observe them? And the King, who was seated between the two Bishops, (in the Elbow-Chairs above-mentioned) having answered, Yes; he swore again upon his Knees to keep several other Articles of the Pasta-Conventa.

When this was done, the Archbi-L 1 2 shop shop and his Assistants took off the King's Helmet; after which his Majesty kissed the Archbishop's Ring, made Profession of his Faith, and pronounced the Oath in the usual Words, with both his Hands laid on the Gospel. The Archbishop then having his Head bare, fell on his Knees, together with the other Ecclesiasticks, and the King prostrated himself with his Arms stretched out. In which Interval they fung the Litany, and repeated feveral Prayers: At the Conclusion whereof, the Archbishop replaced himfelf in his episcopal Chair, and the King kneeled as before.

They then took off his Majesty's Mantle and Gaptlets. And the Archbishop, with the Thumb of his right Hand, anointed the Palm of the King's Right Hand, his Elbow, and the Vertebræ, or that Part of the Neck between the Shoulders; at the. fame Time pronouncing these Words, I anoint thee King in the Name of the: Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoft. He afterwards wiped his Thumb with Bread, and washed himself; while a Bishop wiped the King likewise with Bread and Cotton.

His Majesty was then conducted into the Vestry, where he changed his military Habit for an episcopal Robe, all white, which he was to keep as long as he lived; it being to ferve for his Winding Sheet: Because King Fobn had been interred in his Coronaaion Robes.

The King, after this, was again led back to the Altar, where the Archbishop presented him with a drawn Sword, which his Majesty gave to the Sword-bearer, who returned it into the Scabbard, and hung it at his Majesty's Side; who then drew it again, and, after making several military Flourishes with it, to signify how it ought to be used, returned it once more to its Scabbard.

The Crown was then placed on his Majesty's Head by the Archbishop and Bishops, the Sceptre in his Right Hand, and the Globe in his Left. All these Ceremonies being accompanied with Prayers and Exhortations, proper to each Occasion. The King them raised himself up, returned the Sword to the Sword-bearer, and, having all the Enfigns of Royalty, mounted the Throne, being conducted to it by two Bishops, and the principal of the Laity; where, having fate a little while, he was re-conducted as before to the Altar, where he demanded of the Archbishop to crown the Queen; who fignifying his Consent, two Bishops conducted her Majesty from the Vestry to the Altar; and pretty near the fame Ceremonies were repeated, as before used in the Coronation of the King.

The Queen proftrated herself while the Benediction was given: They anointed her Hand and her Neck between her Shoulders, and having dry'd both again, led her back to the Vestry, where they robed her Majesty with a Mantle of Cloth of Silver, garded with Ermine. She was then re-conducted by the Bishops to the Altar, who placed the Crown on her Head, and the Sceptre in her Hand; and, after certain Prayers and Exhortations, as before, attended her to her Throne; feven Ladies of the first Quality holding up her Train, and all the rest ranging themselves round about her Majesty.

When the Bishops were returned to the Alrar, Te Deum was fung, under a triple Discharge of the Cannon of the Castle, and the small Arms of the Garrison. One of the Bishops then carried the Gospel to be kis'd by their Majesties, while sitting on their Thrones: After this, the two Bishops again conducted them to the Altar, first the King, and then the Queen, to make their Offerings: When they again kissed the Archbishop's Ring, and certain holy Relicks, and, upon their Return to their Thrones, assisted at the grand Mass, which over, first the Archbishop, and then their Majesties communicated in both Kinds. The Archbishop then pronounced the Benediction both to their Majesties and the People, and the Grand-Marshal ordered, long live the King and Queen, to be proclaimed aloud, which was repeated by the whole Church.

All these Ceremonies ended, they returned to the Castle in the same Order as before. In the great Hall of which, the Bishop of Caminieck made an eloquent Speech in the Name of the Senators and the Nobles; and the grand Treasurer answered in Behalf of their Majesties. After which the Grandees and Nobles were admitted to kiss their Hands.

Their Majesties now retired to disrobe, and six down to Dinner. Three Tables being prepared for that Purpose: The Middle one square, and raised some Steps above the two others. At this their Majesties sate, being served by the great Officers of the Realm, and the Ambassadors of Sweden. At the Table on the Right, sate the Prelates, Senators, Deputies and Generals; and on the Lest, the Ladies, together with the several Lords and Officers, both Swedes and Poles.

During the Repast, the Company were entertained with Musick, which lasted till the Evening, when the King and Queen rose from Table, and were re-conducted to the Palace by all the People of Quality present.

The Castle had not been repair'd since the Siege the Year before, and consequently could not be supposed very fit to entertain their Majesties.

Prince Alexander Sobieski retired from Court during this Solemnity, to his Estate at Villa Nova near Warsaw, not so much for fear of provoking King Augustus against his Brothers, who were still Prisoners in Saxony, as to avoid Disputes with the Swedish Ambassadors, who had given him to understand, that they could not yield him the Precedency, either in the Procession, or at the King's Table.

For the same Reason, Madam Royal, the King's Mother, absented herself likewise; there being a Precedent at the Coronation of King Michael, of his Mother's being set at Table below the Ambassadors of Sweden.

When this Ceremony was over, the King of Sweden returned to Blania perfectly satisfied with having accomplished a Work, which Numbers thought so difficult. But the Prince of Wurtenberg, who had borne him Company, returned immediately to Warsaw, to selicitate King Stanislaus, who, the same Night, set out with the Prince for Blonia, where the two Kings embraced with all the Marks of Friendship and Affection.

The King of Poland then returned, together with the Prince of Wurtenberg, who resided some Days at War-faw, to share in the Feasts and Divertions, which were given upon this Occasion in great Numbers.

In the Morning, their Majesties were congratulated anew by abundance. of Lords and Ladies: After which they repaired to the House of Ambas. fador Horn, where there was a Maf-. querade and a Ball, which lasted far in the Night. These Diversions continued the whole Week. In which Interval, Numbers of the Grandees. and a Crowd of the Nobility, who were not present at the Coronation, poured in on all Sides, to pay their Compliments to their Majesties: Insomuch that the whole City swarmed with Deputies, as well from Prussia and Lithuania, as from Great' and Little Poland, to swear Fealty to the new King.

His Majesty, immediately after his Coronation, gave Orders to the Palatine of Kiowia to march towards Prussia with a Part of the Crown-Army, to dislodge a great Number of Quartians who were posted there, and committed the most horrrible Excesses. And, the better to meet with them, Mr. Potocki, Commissary-General of Poland, and Cousin to the Palatine, together with the Starost Bobrunski, Count de Sapieba, were detached at the same Time, at the Head of above three thousand Poles, who passed the Vistula at Warsay, and marched through Blonia, strait on to Prussia; while the Palatine, who had taken another Rout, the better to circumvent the Enemy, was to join them at a Place before agreed upon.

But the Quartians, having been advertis'd of his March; had already thought proper to retire: So that the Palatine not being able to make a regular Attack, was obliged to content himself with pursuing them; which he did so briskly, that the Enemy lost above five hundred Men in their Flight, who, being lest behind, were made Prisoners. After which they were so effectually dispersed, that one Party escaped through the Frontiers of Silesia, and the rest on the Side of Sindomir, a great Way above the Visula.

While this was transacting, the Palatine of Kiowia quitted the Nighbourhood of Prague, and all the rest of the Polish Army passed the Vistula to join the Swedes, except half the Regiment of King Stanislaus's Foot-guards, the whole Number amounting but to a hundred and fifty Men, which remained at Prague, with a Handful of Swedes to guard the Bridge; the other. Half of that Regiment having already marched with Kiowski.

When the Russians, and the Troops of Wilniowiski, which were at Pultowsk. and in the adjacent Places, had been informed of the Departure of the Polish Army, they would not let slip the Occasion which offered, to carry off the few Men left behind, and to ruin the Bridge. They quitted, therefore, the Bug, during the Night, and; began their March, to the Number of fome thousands; taking their Meafures so well, that they surprised the Lieutenant-Colonel, who commanded that Detachment of the Guards; and: who, in spite of a very brave Defence, was not only dangerously wounded, but fell with his whole Party, together with five Enfigns, and two Field-Pieces, into the Enemy's Hand; who, immediately taking Advantage of their Secois, attacked the Piquetguard of the Swedes near the Bridge, and obliged them to retire.

At this Moment Colonel Dahldorf, who was in Nieroth's Camp, as hath Report of the Guns, and the Noise of the Combatants, mounted immediately on Horseback, and, affembling in Haste a little Party of Officers and Soldiers near the Bridge, attacked the Enemy so bravely, that he repulsed them into Prague, and preserved the Bridge till the Arrival of a Reinforcement of Infantry. He was nevertheless so wounded, as well as several other Officers, by the Ruskans, who were retired into she nearest Houses, and fired continually upon the Swedes, that he was, at last, obliged to submit to be carried off. But Lieutenant-Colonel Siegroth, who just then arrived with Part of the Regiment of Dabl-Carlie, attacked the Russians with fuch Vigour, that he foon diflodged them from their close Quarters, and obliged them at length to quit the Suburbs.

The Enemy, however, rallied again immediately, as if with a Design to give us Battle in the open Field. But this Bravade lasted only till the Arrival of some of our Squadrons; when they thought proper to move off precipitately, and were eagerly pursued as far as the Bug, which they passed with fuch Celerity, that we could overtake. but a few who were ill mounted, and were all either killed or taken Prisoners.

We lost in this Encounter eighty Men, and had forty wounded; among which were Colonel Dabldorff, and Major Wrangel. The first so dangerously on the Head, that he was obliged to be trepann'd twice, and was almost given over, though afterwards perfectly cured.

The King, having been fallely inbeen already observed, hearing the formed that the whole Russian Army was on the Point of passing the Vistula, immediately put his own in Motion, and marched on with them to Wlosky, within half a League of Warfaw; where, putting himself at the Head of the Van, he pushed on yet farther for better Intelligence.

His Majesty arrived at Prague, together with the King of Poland, who joined him on the Bridge, and the Prince of Wurtenberg, exactly when all was over. Upon which he difpatched Orders for the Army to halt at . Wloska, where they remained till the 18th of August, when they returned to Blonia. After the Return of King Stanislaus to the City, his Majesty, who feared a fecond Surprize, rested that Night at Prague, and did not return to Bonia, till the Squadrons who had pursued the Enemy, brought back the News, that they had repassed the Bug.

During all these military Expeditions, his Majesty never forgot Affairs of State, and, pleased with the indefatigable Application of his Ministers, conferred on Count Piper, Senator and Premier, the Post of Grand-Marshal, appointed Hermelin to be Chancery-Counsellor, Cederbielm Secretary of State, and Hulten Register. 1 1

As there was great Reason to fear another Auack, his Majesty proposed to King Stanislaus to lodge the Queen his Spoule in a Place of Safety, offering for that Purpose the City of Stetingin Pomerania, till the End of the War.

The

The Queen of Poland set out some Days after, with the two Princesses her Daughters, and Madam-Royal Mother of the King. The Prince of Wurtenberg, the Ambassador Horn, and many General Officers waited on her Majesty, as far as the Estate of the Princess of Radziwil, who magnificently entertained all that illustrious Company; after which the Queen pursued her Voyage and arrived happily at Stetin.

It was about this Time that the Cardinal Primate, Michael Radziewski died at Dantzick. It is remarkable, he was taken ill the very Morning that King Stanislaus was crowned; languished in Bed till Ostober 3. and then expired, to the great Regret of all those who were acquainted with his Worth.

The Bishoprick of Guesna and the Dignity of Primate being vacant by his Death, those two Preferments were conferred by the two Competitors, on two different Persons. King Stanislaus giving them immediately to the Archbishop of Leopal, who had crowned him; and King Augustus, who was then passing through Danizick and Konigsberg to join the Czar, to the Bishop of Cujavia, who had elected and crowned him King of Poland.

Augustus, whose Affairs did not seem so desperate after the Arrival of the Czir in Lithuania, pressed by General Patkul, who then acted as his Ambassador to that Prince, and the satal News he received from Warsaw, to repair forthwith to Poland, departed incognito from his Army, and encamped near Guben upon the Oder, accompanied only by Colonel Goltz, and two other Persons. He arrived at Dantzick October 18. from whence he passed on to Konigsberg, where he arrived at nine o'Clock at Night, at the House of Counsellor Negelein, who conducted him with forty Horse to Tiskotzin, an advantageous Post which the Russians possessed in Podlachia, upon the Nerew, twelves Leagues from Bug, and thirty-five from Warsaw.

From hence he immediately gave Notice of his Arrival, not only to the Czar, but to his whole Party, by a Manifesto which he caused to be distributed all over the Kingdom. After which he passed on to Grodno, and thence to the Russian Army, Ozober 30. where, at their first Meeting, the Czar presented him with the five Standards taken at Prague, from the hundred and fifty Men of King Stanislaus's Guards, as related above.

It was at Grodno that King Augustus instituted the Order of the white Eagle, worn upon a blue Ribband, and having for a Motto, Pro Fide, Rege & Lege, which he conferred on many of the Polish Grandees, to attach them more firmly, and likewise on some of the Russian Generals.

Here likewise a Senatus-Confilium was held, a great Number of Senators and Prelates being present, among whom it was agreed to continue faithful to King Augustus; to join the Crown-Army to that of the Czar, with whom they concluded a strict and solemn Alliance against the King of Sweden and Stanissus; and to pay the Arrears due to the Lithuanian Army.

While these great Affairs were transacting between King Augustus and the Czar, the last received an Express from Moscow, with the disagreeable

News of a Rebellion in the Province of Aftracan, where a great Number of Malecontents were up in Arms, and wasted all before them with Fire and Sword. The Czar then saw himself obliged to set out forthwith for his own Dominions, taking with him a large Detachment from his Army, and leaving the rest under the Command of King Angusus, Prince Menzikoff, and Field Marshal Ogiloy.

He was scarce gone before King Augustus, giving Ear to certain of his Counsellors and the Grandees of Lithuania, who were greatly displeased to see their Lands ruined by the Rusfians, began to conceive certain Suspicions, which diminished the Confidence, and shocked the Union, which had, till then, subsisted between these two Princes. Though the Treaty was concluded between the Czar and the Republick, King Augustus, imagining that Patkul privately endeavoured to reconcile the Czar with the King of Sweden, and that, in Consequence, the first would continue in Possession of Lithuania, suddenly ordered that Minister to be arrested in Saxony: So rash a Measure raised a great Clamour, and it was apprehended a Rupture would follow: But the Necessity of each Party to be well with the other, foon brought about a Reconciliation.

Four Days after the Odronation of King Stanislaus, the Treaty of Sweden was recommenced at Warsaw; which was at last brought to a Period, and contained thirty Articles, many of which had long, separate Explanations. Having been signed November 18, and ratified the 24th and 25th by the two Kings, it was publickly proclaimed the 27th, with the Sound of Trumpers and Kettle-drums. After which To Deum was fung both in the City and the Camp, and King Stanislaus, to testify his Satisfaction, gave a superb Feast upon the Occasion.

Some Days after, the Ambassadors of Sweden took their Leave, and the Diet broke up with great Content on all Hands. The Substance of the Treaty was as follows:

1. There shall be a perpetual Peace, and sincere Amity between the two Kinge, their Successors, and their Realms.

2. The Peace of Oliva shall be confirmed in all its Points, except where expressly annulled, or more amply explained, or hereaster shall be for the common Good.

3. There shall be a general Amnesty; and three Months allowed for those of the contrary Party to come in.

4. No Truce, Peace, or Accord of any Kind shall be allowed with King Augustus, but by common Consent, and with the Proviso that he renounce the Crown, and give Satisfaction to the King of Sweden and the Republick, for all the Damages occasioned by the War. The Declaration published by him shall be deemed of no Validity, and likewise all the Decrees, Statutes, and other publick Acts, made in his Name during the War.

5. All Alliances prejudicial to the Swedes shall be annulled; and the Republick of Poland shall not permit their Kings to contract the like for the future.

6. The Czar of Musicovy shall be pursued conjunctively, till he has made Satisfaction for all the Wrongs and Mischies he has caused. No Peace or Truce shall be made with that Prince, but with the common Consent. The Manner in which the Armies shall join, and upon what Conditions, shall be adjusted by a particular Convention.

7. Sweden shall not lay down her Arms till Peace is re-established in Poland, and King Stanislaus remains in quiet Possession of the Throne.

8. Such Places as the Swedes retake from the Czar, shall be restored to Poland, reimbursing the Cost.

9. But the Swedes may hold Garrifons during the War, in the Places they either now, or may hereafter possers.

10. The King of Sweden may conduct his Army through Prussia, and the other Provinces of the Republick, and levy what Recruits may be necessary.

11. He shall be allowed Transport-Vessels for his Troops, and the Seaports shall be open to his Use.

12. If either of the Parties enter into War with his Neighbours, the other shall give no Assistance to the Enemy.

13. The King and Republick of Poland shall restrain such of their Subjects as shall dare hereafter to take up Arms against the Swedes.

14, 15 and 16. Regard only the Prisoners, and Fugitives of both Sides.

17. The House of Sapieba shall be restored to their antient Dignities, Honours, Employments, Estates, &c.

18. The King and Republick of Poland ratify and declare, that they will maintain the Peace and Safety, which the Protestants have enjoyed both in Poland and Lithuania, and which have been confirmed by the Confederacies, Passa Conventa, &c. fo that no Damage shall occur to them on account of their Religion, while they behave themselves peaceably: Neither shall they be hindered from assembling in the usual Places, hitherto allowed them for that Purpose; or from educating their Children in the Religion of their Fathers. Moreover, the Towns of Prussa shall be confirmed in all the Rights and Privileges spiritual or temporal, that they enjoyed before and after the Treaty of Oliva.

The Articles 19, 20, &c. to 26. contained divers Regulations concerning reciprocal Commerce and Navigation, particularly that of Riga.

26. All false Money shall be prohibited, such as the Sols of Walachia, &c. When the Republick begins a new Coinage, it shall answer to the Standard of that of Sweden.

27. The Republick shall oblige its Princes to observe this Treaty, and, in case of a Rupture, it shall be responsible for all Damages that may ensue.

28. If any other Realms, Republicks, and States, would be comprised in this Alliance, they shall be received by common Consent.

29. The Guarantees of such Princes and Powers shall be demanded, who are equally in the Interest of Sweden and Poland.

30. This Treaty shall be ratisfied and exchanged on both Sides, within a Week after the Day of signing it.

Twenty-threeCommissioners, all Perfons of the first Distinction, selected out of the Clergy, Senate, and Nobility, signed this Treaty in Behalf of the Republick. After which it was ratified by King Stanistaus, and counter figured by his private Secretary the Sr. Radouski, Starost of Inowolod. On the Part of Sweden, it was figured by the three Ambassadors, Horn, Wach-slager, and Palmberg, and, lower down, by the Secretaries of the Embassy Ronterbolm and Adlerberg. Last of all his Majesty ratify'd it at Blonia, and it was counter-signed by Count Piper.

When the Peace was concluded, the Enemy, who had much wondered the King of Sweden should continue quiet so long in his Camp at Blonia, did not question but that Tranquillity would soon be interrupted, now he had so gloriously surmounted all the Difficulties that had occurred in the Execution of so great a Design.

Notwithstanding the Rigour of the Season the Swedish Army still continued encamped, and as the Enemy was not ignorant that his Majesty had given them Orders to be ready for a March, the News gave them no small Uneafines: But what confirmed their Suspicions of being soon attacked in Lithuania, was the Advice they received, that General Rheinschild had been commanded to continue in Poland, and to enter into Winter-Quarin the Neighbourhood of Posnania; while Lieutenant-General Stromberg, who had remained till then at Cracew with four Regiments of Foot, and certain Cavalry, was ordered to join his Majesty.

The Enemy had, however, made all the necessary Preparations to resist the Swedish Army. The Russians having, in a more especial Manner, taken Care to fortify all the Posts from Grodno to Brefzizi upon the Bug, to secure themselves in Lithuania, Podlatina and Polesia, where they were Masters, and where it was very difficult for the Sweges to enter.

As King Augustus had given the Czar to understand, before his Departure, of the Danger that would occur from a decisive Battle, as not confiding much in the Constancy of the Poles, or the Valour of the Russians, and the Gross of the Saxons not being able to enter into Poland, because the Passes were so closely guarded by our Troops, both those Princes agreed to keep on the defensive only, and trust to their strong Intrenchments, in case they were attacked in Lithuania; It being their Design to weaken us insenfibly, by fending out large Detachments to harrass and disturb us incesfantly.

General Renne, who was posted as Pultowsk with certain Regiments of Russians, sent out Parties continually to pry into our Motions, and learn, the Day when we began our March; And, after being informed that our Army were still quiet in their Tents, he detached a strong Party towards the Visiula, on the Side of Plocski, on Advice that a Swedish Captain had passed that River with fixty Men to levy Contributions. December 3. 17052 these two Detachments met, and, after a valiant Defence, which lasted from Morning till Night, the Swedes were obliged to furrender Prisoners of -War.

The Army continued at Blonia till the End of December, without any Perfons being able to guess the Day of decamping, or even what Rout they should take.

ble, that Men could bear a Cold fo excessive as then prevailed, covered only with Tents, exposed to every Storm, if our Army had not, this Winter, given a Proof of it in the Neighbourhood of Warfaw, that aftonished all Europe. Even his Majesty exposed himself to all the Rigours of that severe Season, in a slight Tent, aired only at Night with red-hot Bullets, which emitted a most disagreeablé Smell, as he had done before in Courland in the Year 1701. In the Day time his Majesty warmed himself from Time to Time, at the Fire belonging to the Guard: And, as if to encrease the Hardship, his Kitchen was fo far removed from his own Tent, that his Victuals was ic'd over before it reached his Table.

Nevertheless, his Majesty, far from being shocked with a Life so deplorably wretched, persisted still in enduring it, till all the Rivers and Lakes round about were encrusted with Ice, to be the better able to fall upon the Enemy.

His Majesty, however, permitted the Prince of Wurtenberg and other Persons of Distinction, to build themselves Cabbins for their better Accommodation; and some threw up great Trenches in the Earth, which they covered with Planks, Turf or Tiles, to shelter themselves from Wind and Weather; insomuch that we did not ill resemble a Colony escaped from Iceland.

In the mean while, the Vistula was so filled with sce, that the Bridge at Warfaw was broke; but soon after again repaired, and the King gave

It would have been almost incredible, that Men could bear a Cold so excessive as then prevailed, covered only with Tents, exposed to every Storm, if our Army had not, this Winter, given a Proof of it in the Neighbourhood of Warsaw, that associated all Europe. Even his Majesty

Orders to decamp; marching the sirst Day, December 29, together with his Court, and the Drabans, sour Leagues, as far as Warsaw, where he encamped near the Vistula, in the Camp of General Nieroth, a Part of whose Detachment had already passed the Bridge.

The next Morning the King, accompanied by King Staniflans, the Prince of Wurtenberg, the two Courts, and the Drabans passed the Vistula; all the Regiments then prepared to do the same, marching towards the Bridge from the Camp on all Sides, and, at the same Time, with so much Order and Regularity, that no one Party interrupted another.

No body yet was certain what Rout his Majesty would take; some believed that the Army would march sorthwith towards Lublin, to drive thence Mazeppa, General, or Hillmann of the Cosaques, who had taken up his Quarters in that Neighbourhood with all his Forces; and others presumed, with greater Likelihood, that we should proceed strait on to Litbuania to dislodge the Russans.

Count Schlippenhach, General to the King of Prussia, who had sollowed the Army from Ravitz, and who defigned to share in the Campaign, provided the King had taken the Road to Lithuania, and the Frontiers of Prussia, not knowing his Majesty's real Design, resolved to quit the Army and return home; especially, when he saw that the same Day the March was continued through the City of Chumiof to Michaelow, and the next Day, December 31. to Stanislaw; the King having it still in his Power to wheel to either Side as he pleased, without any Bodies being able to discover which he would chuse.

Jan. 1. 1706. O. S. The Army took one Day's Repose at Stanislaw, where the Cold was so extremely piercing, that Liquids of all Kinds, and our Provisions likewise became frozen: This lasted the whole Months of January and February, and greatly contributed to facilitate our March over so many Rivers and Marshes as lay in our Way, and which were all Frost-bound.

The next Morning we advanced five Leagues and a half towards the City of Wengerow; and, in our Way, the Ice not being yet strong enough to bear our heavy Baggage, a great Part both of that and our Artillery, broke in. Upon which the King immediately hastened to the Spot, to take Order to remedy the Mischies, a Carriage, among the rest, belonging to the Prince of Wurtenberg, being so far funk down, that fifty Men could hardly drag it out: While this was doing, the Ice gave Way at the very Place where the King and Prince had stood, and both tumbled in, but were happily taken up again the same Moment. This March cost a great Num: ber of Servants and Horses their Lives : and, at last, obliged the King to halt a whole Day at Wengarow, till the Biggage came up. We then began to perceive that his Majesty's Design was to march into Lithuania, and we were confirmed in this Conjecture, when the Army proceeded the 4th to Korovice, a Village in the Road to Grodno.

The 5th, we proceeded to Krzimenka, a Village upon the Bug, where we encamped. As that River was not yet so firm frozen over, as to bear the Weight of the Army, the King, not to lose Time, and yet render the Passage safe, ordered a thin Bed of Straw to be laid over it, which being moistened with Water; and other Straw spread again upon that, the severe Cold froze all fast together, till by frequent Repetitions of the same Thing, a Sort of Bridge was formed upon the Ice, over which the Cavalry, Baggage, and Artillery, defil'd, and was followed by the Infantry without the least Danger, till towards the Close of the March; when the two Extremities of the Bridge feemed to give Way, and some Pieces of Ice absolutely broke loose, and carried away certain Men and Horses, though even these had the good Fortune to escape.

The greatest Obstacle was occasioned by a Rock of Ice on the opposite Shore, exceeding slippery, which we were obliged to surmount; though not without extreme Deficulty to the Cavalry, Baggage and Artillery; many Horses being killed by the prodigious Efforts they were constrained to make in climbing the Ascent.

The 7th, after having passed the Bug, we continued our March to Poplavice, where we rested one Day. This Village, which is in Podlachia, a Palatinate in the great Dutchy of Lithuania, was inhabited only by poor Gentlemen, who were destitute of all Things. The Russians and Saxons having stripped the whole Country before them; insomuch that the Army having neither V Etuals or Forage, both Horses and Men suffered extremely.

ble Place, the King gave Orders to decamp next Day, Jan. 9. when the Army marched through the City of Suras to Borofski. Our Valoches near this Place carried off a Russian Lieutenant, and eighteen Men, after having killed fisteen. Here, likewise, every Thing had been confumed by the Enemy; and the Cold encreasing confiderably, our Troops had not been able to subsist any longer, or bear up against the Rigour of the Season, if the next Day they had not reached Stabudowa, a small City, where the Reformed have a Church, and where we found fome Victuals, and especially Forage for the Horses.

The Army rested here one Day, and, notwithstanding the excessive Cold, encamped almost in the open Air; his Majesty not permitting the Troops to be canton'd in the Neighbouring Villages, in order to conceal their Numbers from the Enemy. the Ruffians were not informed in Time of the March of our Army, many of their Detachments were surprized in their Quarters, where they feared nothing less than our Approach: But when they were informed by those who had escaped our Valoches, and who spread the Alarm on all Sides, they provided for the Preservation of Tykozin and Grodno, where King Augustus was in Person, by instantly detaching fresh Troops to reinforce the Garrison there; fully resolved to abide on the defensive, and not to hazard a Battle in open Field.

At last they were perfectly convinced that the King of Sweden was much nearer than they believed, when (his Majesty having marched, January 12. from Slabodowa to Krimri, seven dreadful Leagues in twelve Hours Time, without Paule or Rest, from eight o'Clock in the Morning till Night) our Valoches, who were foremost, surprized certain of King Augusus's Drabans in that little City; the greatest Part of whom made a Shift to escape, and carry that Prince the News, that we should pay him a Visit out of hand.

Augustus, surprized with a March so extraordinary, undertook in the very Depth of Winter, assembled immediately all his Regiments, which were dispersed in the Adjacencies of Grodno; and admitted them into the City, which was tolerably well fortified by the Russians, who had worked upon it incessantly to put it in a Condition to support a long Siege in case of an Attack. At Krimri, the King resigned all the Houses to the Sick, and encamped with the rest of the Army for a Day and two Nights which they remained there.

The 14th, the March was renewed to a Village call'd Michalovice, which is but a small League from Grodno. As there were no more Marshes to pass, and the Country was wide enough for the Army to extend itself in Front, his Majesty ordered it to proceed, with the Baggage and Artillery, in different Columns; one of which furprized an advanced Guard of the Enemy's commanded Lieutenant, who was taken Prifoner, with all his People. Baggage arriving very late, the Army remained under Arms upon the Snow a great Part of the Night; soon after which, one of the Enemy's Parties, who were conveying a Number of Carriages to the City, fell in with our advanced Advanced Guard, which in the Dark they mistook to be Saxons and Friends; but, being soon undeceived, they made their Escapes in the best Manner they could, under Covert of the Night, notwithstanding which, abundance of their Men, and all their Carriages fell into our Hands.

The next Morning, Jan. 15. when it was broad Day, the Army removed to be nearer the City; his Majesty being resolved to pass the Niema, half a League above Gradno. As that River, which was froze over, had, on our Side, a very steep and rocky Shore, our Cavalry apprehended great Difficulty in getting over, more especially as it was to be done in Sight of the Enemy, who were ranged over against us, in order to dispute the Passage. The Artillery and the Biggage took another Rout, in order to proceed with less Difficultry.

At the first Movement of our Army, the Enemy had march'd all their Cavalry and Dragoons out of Grodno, as well as the greatest Part of their Infantry. Which last halted at some Distance from the City, while the first ranged themselves by the River's Side, as mentioned above.

The King, who arrived at this Inftant, and observed that the Enemy, by ordering their Horse and Dragoons to alight, and take Possession of all the Eminencies, Desiles, and Passes, that might facilitate our Landing, prepared to give us as much Trouble as possible, forthwith ordered the whole Army to halt, and, placing himself at the Head of six hundred Grenadiers of the Regiment of Guards, descended from the Height down to the Ice, where he drew up his little Corpse, and led them on to the Enemy, with Bayonets fixed; who, animated with the Presence of their King commanding them in Person, charged the Russians with such Fury, that, notwithstanding the Superiority of Numbers, and Advantage of Ground, they were obliged to give Way after a few Vollies, and a very slight Resistance.

The Russians then remounted, and, retreating to some Distance, drew up in order of Battle, while our Battalion of Guards made themselves Masters, with inconsiderable Loss, of the Posts they had abandoned; the King, at the same Instant, commanding the Dragoons to follow, which they did, though slowly; it being with great Difficulty that the Horses kept their Footing either down or up such broken Ways, covered over with Ice and Snow.

The King, however, not waiting for the whole Body, joined the first Squadrons that came over, and galloped, Sword in Hand, against the Enemy; who, having no Desire to engage, retired still in good Order towards their Infantry, who were posted in a Valley near the City so advantageously, that the King, with the Handful of Troops which had followed him, did not think it adviseable to renew the Combat. Only certain Voluntiers, who were ambitious of exchanging a few Pistol-Shot, and harraffing the Enemy, that their Retreat might not be wholly undisturbed, ventured still on; and a little Skirmish, that followed, had like to have cost a Captain named Saxo dear, an Italian by Birth, and lately in the Russian Service; which he had quitted, and came over to us in Search of Preferment, which he afterwards obtained. This Officer, extremely exasperated against a Nation, which he thought he had great Reason to complain of, exposed himself so much, that his Horse was killed under him, and himself taken Prisoner, after having most bravely defended himself against so great a Number, and received two Wounds, one in the Head and another in the Thigh; he had now been irrecoverably loft, if the brave Prince of Wurtenberg, who loved him, had not hastened to his Assistance, accompanied with Count Sapieba, Pizars of Lithuania, and a Squadron of Dragoons, who, having made Way thro' the Enemy Sword in Hand, effected his Deliverance.

During these little Skirmishes, which were smart enough, our Voluntiers neither giving or accepting Quarter, the Russian Cavalry and Dragoons joined their Infantry, and ranged themselves together in order of Battle. His Majesty likewise, who continually was reinforced with fresh Troops, which had now pass'd the Niema, did the same, and marched on to attack the Enemy. But the Russians, daunted at the Aspect and fierce Movement of our Line, retired hastily behind their double Entrenchments, to expect us there, according to the Orders they had received from the Czar in case of an Attack: But the King, having no other View than to pass the River, did not think it proper to disturb them, and even gave them Time to join the rest of their Army; as already forefeeing, that Wants and Difeales would foon destroy them, if they perfifted in continuing there, without his being obliged to rifque a fingle Man to diflodge them.

The rest of the Day was employed in defiling the Army, which, almost to the very Rear, whose Charge it was to guard the Baggage and Artillery. passed the Niema before Night. As the Country did not afford Villages and Houses enough to lodge all the Troops, who had neither Tents or Biggage, they were obliged both. Herle and Foot to continue in open Field, in order of Battle, without the least Shelter, near the Village of Dziewittowize, half a League from the City, and to kindle Fires to warm themselves as they could: Being overcome with Fatigue, and pierced thro? with Cold, they threw themselves in their Ranks upon the Ground, and tested upon each others Feet, only covered with their Cloaks *. which were then of great Use.

The two Kings and the Prince of Wurtenberg reposed themselves before a great Fire, which was made within an Enclosure of Straw, by way of Shelter both from the Wind and Smoke. But his Swedish Majesty did not remain here long, but spent the greatest Part of the Night in visiting the Regiments, and making Excursions towards the City to reconnoitre the Enemy, and watch if they attempted a Sally.

Certain Waggons of Provisions were taken that Night, but nothing like a Supply for a whole Army, which was fainting with Hunger, and yer more with Thirst; Water being so scarce, that the Soldiers gladly parted with their Money even for a fingle Glass.

In the Morning Jan. 16. the King approached with his Army, within half a Quarter of a League of the Entrenchments of the City, in the same Order they had kept the Night before: And his Majesty being advanced too near, accompanied by Count Stenbock, Lieutenant General of the Quartermasters, and certain Engineers, for the better examining the Avenues, the Enemy fired a great Number of Cannon upon him and his Train, but without doing any Mischief.

His Majesty then judging, by what he observed, that the Russians were resolved not to quit the Advantage of their Lines, or venture into open Field, ordered the Army to wheel somewhat to the Right, and post themselves between Grodno and Wilna, to have all the Benefit they could of the neighbouring Villages; but, as they had stript most of the Houses of their Tiles, (perhaps Boards) to serve them for Fuel, to mitigate the exceffive Cold, they found themselves obliged to pass yet another Night in open Air, though with less Inconvenience than they fuffered the Night before.

During these Transactions, the greatest Part of our Baggage arrived; none having miscarried but certain Waggons of sick Soldiers, which in the Dark had mistook their Way, and wandered to the City, where they were all taken Prisoners by the Enemy.

The 17th, the Enemy continued in the same Place; his Majesty having taken up his Quarters at a Quarter of a League from the City.' Our Parties, several Times that Day, came to Blows with the Enemy, and the Combats grew always fo much the more obstinate and bloody, as no Quarter was given on either Side. Towards Night the rest of our Baggage arrived safe.

The 18th, the Army decamped, and marched to Skalubow, two Leagues and a half from the City, where they were more at their Ease, being posted in the neighbouring Villages round about the City; and were indulged with some Days Repose, to wear off the inexpressible Fatigue they had sustained.

King Augustus now resolved to quit Grodno, where he had hitherto staid; and, accordingly, fet out for Warfaw with his Body-guards, certain Regiments of Saxons, and four Regiments of Russian Dragoons; leaving Field-Marshal Ogilvi, Prince Wisniowiski, with the Generals Allard, Venediger and others at Grodno, with all the Russian Infantry, with Orders to continue behind their Intrenchments, and put nothing to the Hazard, till he was upon his Return with the Saxon Army, which he had already ordered to enter into Poland, to attack General Rheinschild, who was posted, as already mentioned, on the Frontier of Silesia.

Ogilvi obeyed punctually the Orders of King Augustus, and was never seen out of his Lines all that Time, but he soon perceived that Sickness and Want of Provisions rendered fruitless all the other Measures which he had taken. For the Place being too confined for the Number of Troops enclosed in it; and Necessaries growing more and more scarce every Day, it occasioned dreadful Diseases, which N n lasted all the rest of the Winter, and earried off Abundance of Men.

The Kings of Sweden and Poland having rested at Skalubowa till January 22. decamped with the Army that Day, which was divided into two Colums His Swedish Majesty with the first marched to the Right, towards Holowaczi two Leagues and a half from Grodno, having with him,

The Regiment of Lifeguards,
The Oftrogoths,
The Smolanders,
And that of Kruus.

The Guards,
The Uplanders,
The Dabl-Carlians,
The Oftrogoths,
The Regiment of Jankioping,
And that of Calmar.

The Regiment of Sten-

King Stanislaus, with the second Column, repaired to Striowka, having with him, back.

Dragoons,

Of Meyerfeld,

And of Taube.

The Artillery.
The Westrogoths, Horn, Infantry.
The Regiment of Scania, Cavalry.
And a Detachment of Ducker's Dragoons.

It was hoped these new Quarters, where the Regiments were distributed, would have been better supplied with Provisions. But they continued there no longer than the 25th, when the King decamped, and reached Kamiunka, while King Stanislaus had already repaired over Night to Zembrowa.

The Polify Troops, commanded by the General Count Sapieba, the Palatine Kiowski, the Starost Bobruiski, and others, marched always on the Lest of the King of Poland, and chose their Rout as they pleased, to the almost irreparable Damage of the Country.

But Misery followed us all; for, as the Inhabitants of these Provinces took their Flight at our Approach, and it is the Custom of Litbuania, White Russia, the Frontier of Muscowy, and in the Ukrain, not to keep their Corn. when it is threshed, or even their Honey, or other Victuals in their Barns, but to bury them under-ground, or in Caves hard to find, especially in Winter, when the Snow covers all. our Troops, to avoid periffing with Famine, were obliged to fearch for these Places, by piercing the Earth with their Swords and Pikes, as well round about the Houses, as without the Villages and Towns, and even in the Woods, where these People sometimes hide their Provision; which was done with so much the more Difficulty, in regard the Rigour of the Frost had rendered the Ground almost impenetrable. However, Necessity compelling, these subterranean Magazines were often brought to Light, especially when the Thaw came on; at which Time the Snow melted from off these vaulted Caverns first: But the Difficulty of finding these Provifions was not equal to the Danger attending the Discovery, to those who descended at the Instant the Cells were opened; opened; such Abundance of Vapours immediately streaming out, as killed Numbers of our People, till statal perience taught them to wait with Patience till they were dispersed, to avoid Suffocation.

In this dreadful Manner, in a Coun-' try totally waste and desolate, were we obliged to toil for our daily Bread: Nor was this the only Inconvenience; for, after the Soldier had found the Corn, he was obliged to grind and dress it; which took up a tedious Quantity of Time and Labour; and, after all, it was never fufficient to the Wants of fuch Numbers of People. The very Table of the Kings participated of the same Misery; instead of Butter, all was dress'd with Lard and Oil, which caused frequent Disorders, and with which King Stanislaus in particular was visited.

But, however extreme our Sufterings were in this painful March, they bore no Comparison with the Extremity to which the Garrison of Gredno was reduc'd: Ogilvi, therefore, seeing us to far removed, refolved to make use of the Opportunity to procure some Refreshments for his Troops, almost starved, and every Day diminished by Sickness, which carried them off by whole Companies. In this View, he detached all his Dragoons to bring in all the Provisions they could find in the Adjacencies of Grodno; but which was done with all possible Precaution, the River Niema being always between us and them, which they never prelumed to pais.

Upon the first Advice which the King received of this March, he ordered out Major-general Meyerfeld and Colonel Burenfehild with two thou-fand Horse to give them Chace, and carry off their Provisions; which Party having passed the Niema, thro' the City of Luna, pushed on to that of Indura, where there was a Regiment of Russian Dragoons in Garrison, to guard the Magazines deposited there of the Spoils of the Country, which was to be sent to Grodno.

As the Land all round about is extremely flat, it was impossible to avoid being discovered by the advanced Guards, who, after a slight Resistance, retired into the City, where they gave so terrible an Alarm, that the Regiments slew to Horse in a Moment, and made off full Speed, leaving only a Captain, a Lieutenant, and sixty Men behind, who were all killed upon the Spot, and sifty more who were taken Prisoners.

The Night coming on obliged Meyerfeld to halt here; upon which the Enemy returned with all the Strength they could collect, and seemed as if disposed to attack us. But Meyerfeld had scarce made one Movement with his Horse, when they all sted precipitately towards Grodno, leaving at Indura all the Victuals and Forage they had taken so much Pains to amass.

Both our Valoches, and the Lithuanian Nobles and Peasants, who were greatly exasperated against the Rushans, came in to Meyerfeld next Morning with several Prisoners, taken, in their precipitate Retreat, which had lest them scattered and cut off from their main Body. The General then returned to the King's Quarters, with all the Provisions he could carry off, after having burned the rest.

About this Time, the King published a Manifesto, addressed to the Lithuanians, and dated from Kamjunka, Jan. 29. 'In which his Majesty again lays before the Nobles of that Duchy the Reasons which had induced him to enter with his Forces into Poland, to repel the unjust War. begun upon him by King Augustus, and to deliver the Republick from the Slavery to which that Prince endeavoured to reduce it. That Heaven having prospered his Arms, Po-'land had, at last, chose another King in the Person of the most serene Stanislaus the First, who had been crowned with the usual Formalities. That his Majesty, having less regarded his just Satisfaction in that Event, than the Avantage of having obtained 4 the Assurance of a sincere and inviolable Alliance, had made no Difficulty to re-establish the antient Amity by a Treaty of Peace with the Republick, as much to its Interest and Glory, as ferviceable to disappoint the ill Defigns of the Russians. and Saxons, against whom he declared perpetual War, till they were driven out of Poland; till the pub-Lick Tranquillity was entirely reestablished, and the Government of King Stanislaus confirmed. That re-* turning with this Design into Lithusuis, his Majesty could not doubt but the States and Nobles of that Province, (oppressed by the Enemy, which had compelled them till now to continue inactive, seeing likewise that his Troops were present to deliver them) were possessed with an Eagernels to shake off the Yoke of these Foreigners, proportionable to the insupportable Tyranny they had endured. That he could not doubt but they would follow the Example Poland, in making use of this faurable Conjuncture, to enter into the Sentiments of those who laboured to deliver their Country. You see, it was said, the Standard of Liberty: You see it displayed in this March of King Stanislaus, who you ought so much the more to wish to see established on the Throne, as he is not a Foreigner, as he is moderate and valiant, as he both knows and loves the Lows of the Republick, and that it will be his Care to maintain that Liberty to which he is indebted for a Throne.

'His Majesty, afterwards, proceeded to assure them of his Protection, of his good Intentions; of which there was no legitimate Reason to doubt, after the Proofs of his Sincerity given in Poland, to the Guardianship and Safety of which, he had consecrated his Arms.

"He then placed before their Eyes" the Conduct of King Augustus, and the Projects which he had formed. from the Beginning of his Reign, to oppress the Liberry of Poland, and more especially of Lithuania. that, after he was convinced of the 'Impossibility of their Success, and faw himself thrown from his Hopes. by the Arms of his Majesty, he had drawn into the Provinces of the Republick one of the most inveterate • Enemies of the Polifb Name; exhorting them to make a just Comparison between the eqitable Declarations, confirmed in the last Treaty, to protect the Republick, and not to suffer it to be dismembred of its smallest Part, and the Views of the Muscowites, and the barbarous Nations with which Lithuania was over-run.

and which had never come to the Succour of King Augusus, if he had not made confiderable Offers to his faithful Confederate, by way of Reward for his iniquitous Services. That those who yet doubted, might draw more certain Inserences touching the Intentions of the Czar, if they would regard the Letters which he had writ the preceding Year in Musicovy, where they would find Lithuania among the Titles and Posessions of that Prince.

'His Majesty then caurioned them to be no longer blinded by the specious Pretences of those whose inconfiderate Z al and Ambition drew this 'Plague upon their Frontiers, at the Instance of King Augustus. Biside, it proceeded, will be who has already "manifested more than once, how little be regards the Faith of Treaties, obferve them more scrupulously now? By 'wbat Means can Assurance be given, that be, who has given Proofs of an insatiable Heart, who has governed the Poles and Lithuanians as Slaves, and who has profaned the Worldep of bely Things, will become more mode-'rate? When he shall no more he aw'd by the Terror of our Arms, he will drop, make no doubt of it, he will drop that Mask of Sweetness and Moderation which he now wears. Then be will treat even his own Partizans A and their Friends with so much the more Severity, as be will be fure, that, being convinced he has deceived them, they will regard him but with an evil Eye. Even ibus far; what Fruit bave these Partizans of his reaped from their Obstinacy, but to be themfelves in continual Peril, to see their Country ruined, their Relations, Friends, Wives and Children dragged into Captivity, and obliged to how beneath the Russian Yoke.

'In fine, his Majetty exhorted them to think better of it, and to unite with those who, conjunctively with 'King Stanislaus, had undertook to restore their violated Liberties; promissing a general Amnesty to all the Partizans of King Augustus y as likewife Security and Protection, and to fulfil exactly all the Engagements taken to benefit or aggrandize the two Realms; and, at the same Time, menacing all those who despised these Offers, with all the Rigours of War. And, for the greater Assu-* rance of the Performance of his Pro-'mises, that his Majesty would order this Letter to be fent to all the Palatinates of the great Duchy of Lithu-"ania, signed by his Majesty, and ' sealed with the Seal-Royal.

The Forces of Prince Wisniowiski, quartered near Cauno, and in Samogitia, had resolved to surprize the Palatine of Kiovia, who followed, with his Poles, and the Lithuanians of Sapieba, the Column of King Stanislaus, near whom he encamped: For the Execution of which, it was requested of Ogilvi, by whom the commanding Officer of Wisniowiski's Troops had communicated his Delign by a Letter, to detach Forces on his Side, by a certain Day appointed for the Enterprize, By good Fortune this Letter was intercepted and brought to King Stazislaus, who dispatched immediately the Palatine of Kiovia, to be before hand with the Enemy; and fuch Expedition did he make in marching, ... Night and Day, without Intermission, that he surprized the Enemy at Olisa on the Niema, and gave them a total Overthrow, taking, beside a great Number of Prisoners, all their Baggage, three Pieces of Cannon, and other Booty; General Schimetski himfelf escaped with great Difficulty, in the Disguise of a Peasant, and made a Shift, at last, to join General Bauer, who commanded eight or ten thoufand Ruffians in Courland.

We have before observed, that King Augustus had taken the Road to Warfaw, with certain Saxon Troops, and four Regiments of Rullian Dragoons, amounting in all to seven thoufand Men. Jan. 26. he arrived there. and fent immediate Orders to General Brouse, who commanded at Cracow, to hold his Detachment in Readiness to march at a Moment's Warning, to facilitate his Junction with the Saxon Army, which was on the Point of entering into Poland, to attack General Rheinschild, and either beat up his Quarters, or even oblige him to retire into Polish Prussa.

Schulenbourg, agreeable to his Orders, passed the Oder, Jan. 30. and that his March into Poland might be made with the more Regularity, he ranged his Cavalryland Infantry in different Bodies, advancing towards the City of Slawa in Silesia, where he arrived, February 1.

On the other hand, Field-Marshal Rbeinschild, who, till then, had rested quietly in his Winter Quarters, which extended from Koffyn to the Frontier of Brandenbeurg, Leagues in Length, had no fooner received Advice of the first Motion of the Saxons, but he affembled his Army and took the Field, to pass the Oder, and enter into Silesia, by the Road of Lissa; at which Place having been informed that the Enemy had already passed the Oder, and was arrived at Slawa, he drew towards the Frontier, to offer them Battle in Silefia, if Occafion offered: But being advised that Schulenbourg seemed inclined to pale befide him, and take the Road to Posnania and the Warta, to join more commodiously the Savons under Brause, who were in full March from Cracow in order to meet him hastily, he guesfed at the Enemy's Intention, which was to fall upon him behind, and manage him the more cafily after that Junction: On which Account, and to avoid all Surprize, he measured back the Way he came, and passed by Franfadt in his Rout to Sweetz; giving out every where, as he paffed along, that his whole Design was to avoid a Battle; and this he did, to draw Schnlembourg from his first Plan, and tempt him to engage before he was reinforced by Brank.

This Stratagem succeeded to his Wish, Schulenbourg gave Credit to these Reports, and, instead of pursuing what he had before projected, sell into the Track of our Army, and half persuaded himself, that the very Terror of his Approach would alone be sufficient to carry all before him. An Opinion which he was the more confirmed in, when one of his Parties, which he had detached to observe our pretended Flight, returned with several Carriages loaded with Baggage, which they had carried off from our Rear. Full therefore of that Confidence he advanced as far as Frankadt, where he posted his Troops.

Upon which Rheinsteild, charmed that his Feint had prospered so well, Feb. 3. faced about without Loss of Time, and marched on to meet the Enemy, with twelve Battalions and thirty-seven Squadrons, in three Columns, which were composed both of Horse and Foot.

Schulenhourg was then convinced he should have the Trouble of a Battle, and that it would be scandalous, for him to retire with fuch superior Forces; having no less than twenty-nine-Battalions, and forty Squadrons under his Command. He proceeded therefore to range his Infantry in two Lines near Frauftdt, between the Villages of Fager [dorff and Roer [dorf; the first of these Lines being composed of fixteen Battalions, and the second nine; and in the Front he placed thirty-one Pieces of Cannon great and small, and forty-four little Mortars for throwing Grenades; then spread the whole Space of Ground before his Line, with Chevaux de frise, linked together with strong Chains, and all over bristled with sharp Spikes of Iron. And, that the Swedes might not penetrate into the two Villages which covered the Right and Leift of his Infantry, he threw into each two Battalions; and, for the farther Security of his Foot, posted his Cavalry in the Wings, each of which was composed of twenty Squadrons, ranged in four Lines, to render them more impenetrable.

ing come within a certain Distance, formed of his two Columns three Lines. the first of which was composed of eight Battalions placed in the Centré, and commanded by the Major-Genetals Axel Sparre and Mardefeld; having upon its Right twelve Squadrons, among which were mingled two Battalions: This Wing was commanded by the Field-Marshal himself. the Lest Major-General Hummerbielm commanded eleven Squadrons, two Battalions, mingled, as on the Right, among the Cavalry. The fecond Line confisted of fourteen Squadrons ranged at fome Diftance one from the other, in such a Manner, however, that, both on the Right and Left, four Squadrons covered them in Flank.

The Enemy, commanded by an able General, who had made the finest Dispositions to receive the Swedes, waited in their Line to receive us till within about a hundred Paces Distance. when they made a general Discharge of all their Cannons, in order to thin our Ranks, and discompose the Firmness with which we had marched up to But we did not give them much Time to redouble their Fire, and before they had given us three Rounds, our left Wing, as being the most advanced, had begun the Combat, soon after which our Centre did the same, and all testified an extraordinary Ardour.

The Chevaux de frise placed before the Enemy's Infantry, seemed at first to check the Impetuosity of our Charge, but were soon hurled aside, Sword in Hand, in spite of the continual Fire of the Enemy, who were put to slight in less than a Quarter of an Hour; our Troops

Troops having, till then, reserved their Fire, which so greatly contributed to our Success, that even their fecond Line was shocked, and on the Point of giving Way. However, they re-assured themselves with great Intrepidity, and made a continual Fire to abate the extreme Ardour of our Soldiers; but their most vigorous Endeavours were fruitless, and, though they again made Head, sometimes in forming themselves into an oblong Battalion, sometimes taking Advantage of the two adjacent Villages, and drawing up behind the Hedges in hope to retard the Victory, they were at last compelled to yield the Day, and take their Flight by Fraustadt, towards the Village of Birzen.

As to our Right Wing, we had there much less Difficulty to overcome. Count Rheinschild, who commanded at in Person, having only six thousand Rustians divided into eleven Battalions to engage, who had turned their Coats in order to pass for Saxons; but who did their Duty so wretchedly, that after one fingle Volley, they fell into Disorder, and then, throwing down their Arms, hurried off in the greatest Confusion: Upon which, our Soldiers removing the Chevaux de frise, and our Cavalry pouring in through the Opening, this whole Body of Russians were put to the Sword, not a fingle Man escaping, and their General Westromirski being made Prisoner.

The rest of the Enemy's Battalions, as well in the Centre as the Wings, having, in this Interval, been put to flight, our Squadrons, who, after having routed their Cavalry, were pursuing them at full Speed, now obferving this total Overthrow of the Saxon Infantry, push'd on before to cut off their Retreat, and, by surrounding them on all Sides near the Village of Birzen, oblig'd them to lay down their Arms, and surrender themselves Prisoners of War; by which Means in less than an Hour the whole Affair was ended.

It must, nevertheless, be acknowledged, that the Enemy's Cavalry made but a miserable Desence, and by turning Tail from the very first, were the principal Cause of the instant Deseat which sollowed, and of the total Loss of their Infantry.

The Squadrons of Horse Guards commanded by Colonel Kospoth, and attack'd by Colonel Buchwald at the Head of his Dragoons, behav'd much better than the rest; and, to do them Justice, it must be own'd they desended themselves gallantly, though they were broke at last, and oblig'd to follow the Herd; having been first abandoned by the other Squadrons of the Right Wing.

It is fact, that, except these two Squadrons which stood their Ground, all the rest, as well Infantry as Cavalry, betray'd so much Fear from the Beginning, that our Troops had nothing to do but drive them before them, and only advance, instead of fight:

The Field Marshal had, from the first, detach'd certain Cavalry to pursue that of the Enemy, but though they pushed on sull Speed, it was impossible to overtake them. So sharp a Spur is Fear!

Only some Hundreds, who had separated from the main Body, fell into the Hands of the Sweedsh Valoches, and were all put to the Sword, either in the open

open Field, or, in the Wood adjoining to the Scene of Battle.

Thus the whole Saxon Army, rais'd with so much Toil, Care and Expence, commanded by a General who was a Master in the Art of War, and greatly superior in Number to the Swedes, was totally deseated in less than an Hour's Time, with the Loss of 7000 Men killed upon the Spot.

Among the Prisoners were Lieutenant Genera! Wustromirski, Major General Lutzelburg, Colonel Mellarede, and another Colonel who died immediately of his Wounds.

We had four hundred Men kill'd, and fourteen hundred wounded. Among the first of which were the sollowing Officers of Distinction: Colonel Lilleboek, Governor of Posnania; Lieutenant Colonel Cronbeilm, and Major Ornstedt. And, among the last, Colonel Buchwald, the Majors Wrangel and Suoski, Captain Loder, and certain other Officers. Field Marshal Rheinschild had his Horse shot under him.

When the Battle was over, that General took care to have the wounded on both Sides put under Cure, and the Dead interr'd; after which he remov'd some Leagues from Fraustadt towards Posnania, where he distributed his Army all round about, to refresh themselves after their Fatigues.

King Augustus, who had set out for Warsaw with ten or twelve thousand Men, Saxons, Poles, and Muscovites, at the Time of the Battle, was not above fifteen Leagues distant from Fraustadt, hoping to enclose the Swedes between him and Schulenhourg, and, by that Means, more easily defeat them: But, being disappointed in his Expectations by the Loss of that Battle, he returned instantly to War-Jaw, and from thence to Cracow, the Fortifications of which City he order'd to be repair'd and strengthen'd forthwith; detaching Smigelski, at the same Time, to keep an Eye upon the Swedes, and molest them in their Quarters.

The King of Sweden was then employ'd in preparing Quarters of Refreshment for his Army, where, after so dreadful a March in so dreadful a Season, they might recover their Health, and taste some Repose. Feb. 10. His Majesty set out from Kanjunka, and marched with the Army four Leagues to Zadulek, (a little City a League from the Niema, belonging to the Sapiebas) where he took up his Quarters in the Convent of the Franciscans.

King Stanislaus likewise decamped from Zembrowa, and repaired with his Column to Wasieleski, four Leagues from Kamjunka, and certain Leagues from Zaludek: In which Place his Majesty receiv'd the News of the compleat Victory which Count Rheinschild had obtain'd at Fraustadt.

All the Army was distributed round the Quarters of the two Kings, and as close as possible: Certain Parties only being detach'd from Time to Time to reconnoitre the Enemy at Grodno, where the Garrison apparently diminish'd every Day. For, fince the entire Defeat of the Saxons, and the Remoteness of the Czar, who was posted at the Head of twenty thousand Men near Smolensko, and gave little Hope of his marching to relieve Ogilvi; the last, who was block'd up in Grodno, and well knew that, while the Niema con-O o tinued tinued frozen, it was impossible for him to escape out of that calamitous Place, found himself at his Wits End. He had already buried above eight thousand Men, who died of Diseases, and the Remainder were reduc'd to a Condition most sad and deplorable: Notwithstanding all which he was still compelled to abide within his Lines, and suffer the last Extremities; all that was in his Power, being to order out his Cavalry, who were posted in the Adjacencies of Tykozin and other Places, to establish Magazines at Augustowa.

His Majesty, receiving early Intelligence of this Delign, detached immediately Colonel Kruus with three hundred Horse to take Possession of Augustowa, and harass the Enemy on the Road; with Orders to put all they met to the Sword. This Party took the Road towards Idura, thro' which Meyerfeld was come a little while be-As they met with no body in that Rout, Kruus march'd strait to Grodno, within half a League of which he cut to pieces a little Party which had been detached to raise Contributions. After which he passed on, in fight of the Enemy, towards the City of Nowiword, fituated between Grod. no and Tykozin, detaching a Party by the way to give chace to a great Number of Russians in a neighbouring Wood, who were all killed upon the Spot. After which, upon the same Road, they encounter'd a Captain, by birth an Englishman, with seventy Rusfians, who, at first, stood upon his Defence in a certain Village, and even began to fire upon us, but was foon obliged to surrender himself Prisoner, with the few that remained of his Troop, having first seen all the rest cut to pieces. Arriving at Nowiword, the Colonel surprized a Lieutenant with sixty Dragoons, who were all put to the Sword except the Lieutenant himself, who was taken Prisoner, and two Dragoons, who had the good Luck to make their Escape.

Kruus having taken up his Quarters at Night, in that Place, and being informed that two thousand three hundred of the Enemy's Horse were then in the long Village of Dlugowitz, where his Majesty had given Audience to the Ambassadors of the Republick, when upon his Entrance into Poland, An. 1702, he march'd thither the next Morning, when it was broad Day, in the hope to find them still there; but they, having received Advice by the two Dragoons, who escaped from Nowiword, made off full Speed, to fave themselves in the City of Lipkia, where there was another Muscovite Regiment, which they took along with them, and all together galloped post to Grodne. Kruus followed instantly, and, to retard them, detached his Valoches before to harass their Rear: But norwithstanding, they never once faced about, and, aiming at nothing but to escape, left at the Mercy of the Valoches about fifty or fixty Men, who were all made Prisoners, together with a Lieutenant. The Colonel then, weary of pursuing an Enemy he could not overtake, and convinced that the Alarm of his Expedition was spread all round the Country, wheeled about, all at once, towards Augustowa, to which Place he had still ten Leagues to march; and the Way lying through a Wood eight Leagues in length, which was render'd quite impassable, by the Trees they had felled across the Road, he was compelled to take a new Rout across Morasses, Lakes and Rivers; during which Progress, approaching a Convent in the middle of a Wood, he surprized seventy Russans and two Lieutenants in an adjacent Village, who, except the Officers and a sew of the Men, were all put to the Sword; after this, finding himself near Augustowa, he detached before him ten Horse to secure the Avenues which led to the City, and followed immediately after himself with the rest of his Corps.

As the Russian Major, who had been in garrison in that place, with some hundreds of Russians, was advised in time of the March of our Troops, he thought proper to retire the Evening before we arrived there towards Prussia, upon the Frotiers of which Augustowa is situated.

When the Swedes came before that City, they found it well furnished with Palisades, but very ill guarded, there being but one Lieutenant, one Cornet, and seventy Dragoons in the Place, who were surprized when taking their Repose, and all killed except the Cornet only, who, being a Scotchman, was allowed quarter.

After this Expedition Kruus rested some days at Augustowa, his Troops being extremely satigued with so violent a March: when, having consumed the Provisions and Forage which the Enemy had amassed, and burned what they could not carry away, he returned through Liepnin and Merecz, where he cut to pieces certain Troops of Wisniowiski, and then proceeded on to the King's Quarters, where he arrived without having lost any more than sive Men, and after having marched in fix Days Time fifty-two Leagues.

The Territory of Caun had been assigned to the Polish and Lithuanian Troops commanded by Count Patacki, Palatine of Kiovia, and Count Sapieba, Palatine of Wilna, for their Winter-Quarters: but, as that District was too remote, and they mistrusted the near neighbourhood of the Ruffians, who were posted in the Dutchy of Courland, it was but with an ill Will that they removed fo far from the Swedes: neither was the Apprehension. without Ground; for General Bauer having joined Prince Wisniowiski, Oginski, and Zaranech, with three thoufand Russians, they formed all together an Army of eight thousand Men in the neighbourhood of Sadowa, in Samogitia. Upon the first Advice, therefore, that the King received from Count Potocki, he judged it expedient, for the Security of that Palatinate, to detach to his Succour nine hundred Dragoons, under the Command of Colonel Ducker, with Orders to attack the Enemy wherever he should find them, and, by that means, cure them of their Ambition to disturb the Polish Quarters for the future: and, in his Return, to ruin all the Estates belonging to the Enemies of the King of Poland, and put the City of Wilna under Contribution.

Accordingly, Feb. 22. Colonel Ducker marched strait on to the City of Wolkiniki, where he halted till the Polish and Lithuanian Palatines joined him with their Troops. In the mean while General Bauer, who knew nothing of all this, was on the Road to surprize the Poles, and already so near, that, when Colonel Ducker marched out of Wolkiniki, both Parties were alike like furprized, to rencontre each other in a Wood, within a quatter of a League of that City.

Our van was presently attacked by that of the Enemy; and, though the Space between the Trees was very narrow, the Colonel drew up his Squadrons, one after another as well as he could, and advanced in good Order to a little Plain in the middle of the Wood, where he extended his Front, to make his Force appear to more Advantage. But he had scarce began to form his Line, before the Enemy rushed out from among the Trees to begin the Attack, but were so briskly received Sword in Hand, that they soon retired in great Confusion, and took Shelter yet farther in the Wood: however, not warned by this Essay, they returned a fecond Time to the Charge with more Troops, and renewed their Attempt on all Sides; but with no better Success than before; being again repulsed into the Wood. After which Ducker, to prevent a third Onset, which the Enemy were preparing, ordered a Part of his Dragoons to alight, and with the rest on Horseback penetrated the Wood, where he attacked the Russians so vigorously, that they instantly disbanded, and flew on all Sides, having made but one fingle Discharge.

The Enemy lost in this Action a Colonel, two Lieutenant Colonels, four Captains, with a great Number of Soldiers killed or wounded, which they carried off with them according to their Custom. Ducker then returned to Wolkiniki to put under cure three of his Captains, three Lieutenants, and about fixty Dragoons who were all wounded.

As to the Poles they had very little Share in the Action, contenting them-felves with looking on without shewing any Inclination to share in the Danger. The others (Lithuanians) never once appeared till all was over, when they fell in with the Pursuit; so that Ducker, with his nine hundred Dragoons, alone defeated the Enemy, who had thrice the number.

Feb. 25. he marched on to the City of Wilna, whither the Russians were. retired; who had scarce heard of his Approach, before they flew to Horse, and made off full Speed towards Samogitia and the Frontiers of Courland. never once halting till they came to a Place of Safety. But what is pleafant enough, at Mitau, General Bauer ordered Te Deum to be fung; without question to thank God for his happy Escape out of the Hands of Colonel Which last, not meeting. with any of the Enemy's Troops in his Way to Wilna, rested there some-Days, and put the City under Contribution.

The Polish Army, refusing to return to their Quarters till they were well guarded against a new Invasion from the Russian-Posts in Courland, remained with the Swedes at Wilna, till they heard, a little after, that General Bauer, after having ruined the Castle of Milau, was retired out of that Province into Russia; when they ventured to return to their Quarters in the Adjacencies of Caun.

The news of the Victory of Fraufladt being spread through Lithuania, so greatly discouraged the Partizans of King Augustus, who were beside wearied out with supporting both Friends and Enemies, that they began at last to acknowledge King Stanislaus: to which his Majesty's Manisesto so marvellously contributed, that Lords and Deputies arrived every Day at the King of Poland's Quarters at Wasilieski, to make their Submission to his Majesty.

Among the Grandees, there remained only Prince Radziwil, sworn Enemy to the House of Sapieba, who would not follow the Example of the Majority, but obstinately adhered to King Augustus; as did likewise Wisniowiski, Oginski, and certain others, though at so dear a Price, as the Ruin of their Estates, which were very numerous in this Country, and were all laid desolate by the Polish and Swedish Soldiers.

Provisions began now to be more plentiful in the Quarters of the two Kings, by the Care of the Jews, who rendered us great Services in the Course of this War, by procuring, at great Hazard to themselves, abundance of Eatables, and, especially exceeding good Wines.

Certain French Merchants of Konigsherg, likewise, did the same, and, though they run great Risque on the Roads, from Thieves and Murderers, frequent in Poland in time of War, they profited so well by the Commerce, as in all likelihood to make themselves easy for the rest of their Days.

As to the Horses, they always suffered greatly, through the Want of Forage, and, though our Troops had Leisure for Repose, Diseases still continued to rage among them. King Stanislaus, nevertheless, recovered from his Indisposition, which, at first, gave some Apprehensions.

The King of Sweden now gave Orders to throw a Bridge over the Niema, or the Memel, one League from his Quarters, and nine from Grodno, where Count Stenbock, Lieutenant General, had his Quarters, with the Regiment of Dabl Carlia, and likewise the Direction of the Bridge.

Nevertheless, the King often repaired thither to encourage the Labourers, and observe what Progress they made; and one Night, March 8. being there, and near the Bridge, when he was on his Return over the Ice, to take Horse for his Quarters, at a Place where the Current was exceeding rapid, and the Ice exceeding thin, it gave way, all at once, underneath him, and plunged him up to the Neck in the River.

The Danger was extreme, and so much the more dreadful as the Rapidity of the Stream would have infallibly dragged him down, without a Possibility of Suecour: had not he, by good Fortune, found sooting on a Heap of sunk Ice, upon which he stood upright, and supported himself against the Torrent.

In this terrible Extremity, the Prince of Wurtenburg, (who had once already faved the King's Life, and was always near him) Mr. Siegroth, Lieutenant-Colonel of the Regiment of Dabl-Carlia, and the young Count Wachtmeister, threw themselves instantly upon the Ice; and the Prince catching hold of one of his Majesty's Hands, held it above Water, till more Help came to draw him out, which was at last happily effected, though not without great Difficulty and Danger.

It may justly be faid, that the King was never in greater Danger than on this Occasion, in his whole Life; which, which, in all human Probability, had here loft, if the Ice had not held firm under those, who threw themselves along upon it for his Preservation.

Count Stenbock, who came up with the other Officers of his Regiment in this Interval, turned pale at the Spectacle, and stood as if immoveable, at the Sight of the Danger to which his Majesty had been exposed. though he implored him to stay that Night Ollowa, to change his Cloaths, and get himself warm again, the King replied as usual, 'Twas nothing, and, remounting his Horse, though dripping wet, his Boots full of Water, and the Weather piercing cold, returned in that Equipage to Zaludeck: In the Road to which Place he had another dangerous Fall, at the instant that a Waggon-load of Timber was driving on to the Bridge; his horse being already under the Wheels, and his Majesty on the point of perishing, when the Team was stopped by the very Outcries of those who were Witnesfes of his Danger.

Thus a Journey, which threatned fo many Misfortunes, ended at last without any ill Consequences: his Majesty only, contrary to his usual Custom, keeping in his Lodgings all the next Day, where he, nevertheless, gave Audience to the Deputies of Wilna.

The Czar, while at Smolensko with his Army, had summoned thither General Mazeppa with thirty or forty thousand Cosaques, who shewed themselves in several Places in the neighbourhood; and, after having been reinforced by some thousands of Russians, they took up their Quarters in Minsko, Sluczk, Nieswiecz, Lacowiecz, and other little Cities; from whence they made continual Excursions, in hope to surprize us.

Though his Majesty had already Parties on the other fide the Niema, or Memel; he nevertheless, on receiving this Intelligence, detached Lieutenant-Colonel Trautsetter with one hundred and eighty Horse towards Novogrodeck, to join the two hundred and seventy already in Garrison there, and after gave Chace to fifteen hundred Cosaques, who were posted in the City of Niezwiecz, belonging to Prince Radziwil, great Chancellor of Lithuania, and near to which he had a Castle fortified, into which the Commander had refused them Admittance.

The Lieutenant-Colonel, in Obedience to these Orders, so regulated his March, that he arrived, March 13. before Nieswiecz, by Day-break; when, ordering all his Men to alight, and forming three Battalions, he happily scaled the Walls, and made himself Master of the City-gates; after which he attacked the Cosaques on all sides; who having had Time to draw up in the Market-place, barricaded the Streets in the best manner they could, and, at the fame Time, kept a continual Fire upon the Swedes, who, nevertheless, pressed upon them so yigorously, that, in less than half an Hour, they killed three hundred of them, together with their chief, and took four Pieces of Brass Cannon.

After which Trautsetter ordered his Horse to scour all the Streets, that none might cscape: but, notwithstanding this Precaution, five hundred threw themselves into a Convent; and the rest, having taken Shelter in the Houses

Houses round the market-place, fired upon us continually and wounded several. To put a Stop to which in the most effectual manner, Trautsetter ordered the Houses to be fired, by which means six hundred Cosaques were destroyed in the Flames, and those who escaped surrendered themselves Prisoners, who, together with those taken in the Action, amounted in all to a hundred and eighty Men.

As to those who retreated to the Convent, Traussetter, not being able to master them so easily, lest them in Peace; and, according to Order, marched on to dislodge, likewise, the two thousand, posted near the Castle of Lakowiecz, after having sent to the Army the Prisoners and the Wounded, the last of which including the Officers, amounted to forty Men.

This fecond Enterprize did not, however, succeed, because the Enemy was ready retired to the Castle, after having first set the City on fire. Trautfetter, therefore, seeing it was not in his Power to reach them, returned to Novogrodeck, ordering out his Parties, by the way, on all Sides, to lay wast the Enemy's Estates, which gave Occasion to several little Encounters that were smart enough.

March 26. his Majesty detached yet another party of six hundred Horse, under the Gommand of Baron Charles Creutz, Colonel of the Regiment of Horse-guards, with Orders to march to Slonim, as well to observe the Enemy in their Quarters, as, afterwards, to re-assemble all our Detachments posted on the other Side the Niema, and give Chace to all the Enemies they met, to enable himself to lay Siege at leisure to Lacowiecz, where the Co-faques were inclosed.

When, therefore, Colonel Creutz was arrived at Slonim, and found the Enemies he was to observe were only certain miserable Polish Vagabonds, he did not think it worth his while to pursue them, but contented himself with collecting together the Parties, which had been detached in different Places.

As foon as all these were re-assembled, the Colonel put himself at the head of fifteen hundred Horse and Dragoons, without reckoning the Valoches and Poles, and marched directly to Lacowiecz: near which he encountred a large Body of Cosaques, who were foon drove for Refuge into their Castle. He then posted his Troops in the best manner he could. in the Houses in the Suburbs, which the Flames had spared, and, in that manner, held the Enemy closely blocked up, though they fired their Cannon continually, and made frequent but ineffectual Sallies, with a View. principally, to set fire to the Houses in which the Swedes were lodged.

It was about this Time, that the Rocks of Ice, loosened with the Thaw, and carried down the Niema, by the Waters melted from above, broke the Bridge we had thrown over the River near Ollowa: and, though we laboured instantly to repair it, General Ogilvi, who waited for that Opportunity, took the Advantage to retire from Grodno, which he effected with such Diligence, (after having sunk all his Cannon and Ammunition in the Niema, of which he had great Abundance) that it was impossible to overtake him.

That General had lost, during the Blockade,

Blockade, above eight thousand Men, beside two Generals, who died by Sickness; and the rest of his People were so enseebled by Hunger and Wretchedness, that Numbers perished in that precipitate Retreat; which was made thro'various Roads little frequented, and in various Columns, thro' Brescici towards the Volbinia. They had, however, the Precaution to leave certain Detachments in the Passes of the Morasses through which they marched, to retard our Pursuit in case we had followed them.

Though it seemed impossible to come up with the Enemy, who had gained so many Days March, especially as the Bridge was broke, and the Roads were, beside, almost impassable, his Majesty, who had rested some Days longer in his Quarters, resolved, nevertheless, to decamp, as soon as the Bridge was repaired. Accordingly, April 4. he passed the Niema with his Column, and another little River, over, which, likewise, they had thrown a Bridge, near Orta, marching that day five dreadful Leagues and a half through Skura, as far as Dcrezini.

It is impossible to express how much the Men and Horses suffered in that one Day's March: as the last, in particular, were almost famished for Want of Forage, as the Country was marshy, and the Roads silled with Mud, rotten with the late Thaw, it was with the utmost Dissiculty they were able to drag their Legs through: and, as to the Baggage, it sunk in so deep, that it took two Days to extricate it again; but one Carriage belonging to the King, being able to make way.

During all this Time, no Provision could be made for the King's Table, and he thought himself happy in having a Morsel of Bread in his Pocket, to appease the Hunger he selt, in a Country wholly desolate. The next Day, April 5. his Majesty proceeded as far as Blezenice, where he was obliged to halt for the Baggage.

King Stanislaus, who had with him three Regiments of Foot, viz. the Artillery, and those of Rank, and Clerk, and certain Cavalry, the whole commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Stromberg, set out, April 6. from his quarters at Wasiliski, with his Court and the Grandees of Poland and Litbuania, who followed him, and marched that first Day three Leagues, as far as Zaludeck, from whence he pursued the same Rout the King of Sweden had taken, and met with the same Difficulties and Hardships we had undergone before him.

However painful this horrible March was, his Majesty, April 10. after the Arrival of his Baggage, still persisted; but could reach no farther than Zezernice, one League, where he was again obliged to halt certain Days, the Roads being become wholly impassable, because of the huge Morasses, we met with almost at every step; and, to compleat our Missortunes, all the Villages and Houses we found in our Way, were deserted, and no more Provisions any where to be met with for the Army.

But, in spite of all these Obstacles, the King continued still resolute to make War upon the Partizans of King Augustus: to which purpose, he determined to march into Polesia and Volhinia, both for the better subsisting his Troops, and to reduce the Malecontents to reason; the there were nothing but Morasses to cross from thence to Kiow, and though it was represented to him, as an Enterprize wholly impracticable for an Army.

Troops,

April 14. The King continued his Rout as far as Rosanka, a considerable City, belonging to the Sapiebas, but then so wholly ruined, as well as the Castle, by Oginski and the Russians, that, except the Jews who had a Seminary there, we did not meet one living Soul. At this Place the Morasses begin, and extend through the whole Rout, without interruption.

The 16th, the Army entered into Polesia, where the greatest Families of Lithuania have fine Estates, and reached a village called Alba, where there is a fine Seat belonging to the Starost Bobrowiski, of the Family of Sapieba, and where we found a large Quantity of Corn, which came most leasonably. Here the King received Advice that fifteen thousand Russians. were posted five Leagues from thence, near the Convent of Bereza, to defend the Pass, which was some thousand Paces long, and, to the full, as broad; beside which it was cut thro' in several Places, and the Communication preferred by Bridges, then all broken down by the Enemy; who had likewise raised Barricades on the other Side, and of Course rendered the Passage more difficult than ever. His Majesty, however, gave Orders immediately for two Battalions of Foot-guards and certain Field pieces to lead the Way, in profound Silence, and under Cover of the Night, through the great Woods and Marshes, to surprize to Russians, at present employed in raising Redoubts and other Works on the other fide of the Pass.

The next Morning the King himfelf followed, and, finding the Infantry already arrived, immediately ordered his Cannon to play, which killed ten or twelve Men. The Issue of this Enterprize, however, appeared so much the more uncertain, as the number of Inlets and Barricades in the Caufey, presented an Obstacle, which seemed hardly possible to be surmounted.

The King, nevertheless, without hesitating a Moment, put himself at the Head of his Grenadier-guards, accompanied by the Prince of Wurtenberg, Major-General Meyerfeld, and certain other Officers, rushed into the Pass, and threw himself into the Water, under the Angles of the first Barricade, where there had been a Bridge: at the same Time, causing the Depth to be sounded with Pikes, in order to know what Danger there was of drowning.

The Russians, astonished at such Intrepidity, and observing with what a menacing Countenance the Swedes made their Approaches, never waited for their Arrival, but, without losing a Moment, made off sull speed; and, by that Means, spread such a Panick through another of their Parties entrenched some Leagues off, near Sielce, that they retreated, likewise, in spite of the Resolution they had taken at first to defend themselves: all slying together in great Consusion towards. Pinsk.

When his Majesty was got to the End of this Pass, which might easily have been defended by a handful of Men against a whole Army, if the Enemy had been resolute; he ordered the Valoches, having no other Horse with him, to give them Chace, which they did and returned with feveral Prisoners.

We found among the wounded near the Redoubt, a Captain, a Frenchman, by birth, lying on the place, who had lost his left Arm, by a Cannon-shot, and was moreover wounded on the fame Side, whom the King regarding in that miserable Condition, with that noble Compassion, inseparable from the brave, stopt to have him ask'd, if he believed his Wounds were eurable? Which the Captain observing, and by the Description he had heard of his Majesty, believing it to be him, instead of answering the Question put to him, enquired with great Earnestness of those about him, if the King of Sweden was in the Action? adding, that he ardently wished to see him before he died. Upon which the Prince of Wurtenberg distinguishing his Majesty with his Hand, the Captain bowed with great Veneration towards him. bestowing on him a thousand Benedictions, and protested he should now die in Peace. He expired a few Hours after in a Village, whither he had been conveyed, with a Tranquility that furprized every body, and even the King himself, who could not help lamenting the Death of so gallant a Man. He was interred the next Day with all the Honours of War.

The King, having left the two Battalions at Bereza, and given Orders for repairing the Bridges in the Pass, returned the same Day with the Prince of Wurtenberg, wet as they were to Alba, from whence he fet out again the next, Ayril 18. for Bereza: where his Majesty took up his Lodgings, together with his Court, in the Chartreum Convent, which is a rich Foundation, well built, endowed by one of the Sapiebas, and lituated in a Country both fertile and agreeable. His Majesty rested there one Day; after which the Army decamped, April 20. and, marching through continual Marshes, with infinite Fatigue, reached the Village of Lacowice, and the 21st, Comok, leaving on the left, a quarter of a League from that City, a Fortress, called Zabirs, surrounded on all sides with Fens, and belonging to Prince Wisniowiski: accessable only in one Place, defended by four Bastions, a deep Ditch, and Palifades, and having above forty Pieces of Cannon upon the Ramparts.

It happened, during this March, that one of the Enemy's Parties, confifting of three Companies of foot, commanded by a Lieutenant-Colonel of the Troops of Pockies, who King Augustus had made Great-Treasurer of Lithuania, were discovered, and taken Prisoners in a manner singular e题·174 174 174 nough. They had Orders to throw themselves into Zabirs, from which they were not far distant; but, unhappily for them, Count Sapieba, Treasurer of the Crown, Adjutant-General Tittingbof, Lieutenant Colonel Hammerbielm, and Charles Adlerfelt, a Gentleman of the Court, with some others, and their Servants, who might in all amount to fifteen or fixteen Persons, being by chance strayed a little out of the Road, fell in with them, and, without Ceremony, bid them lay down their Arms.

This the Poles, at first, seemed in-Digitized by Google clined clined to dispute, but when they saw the Swedish Army advancing at diftance, they thought no more of Resistance, and furrendered themselves all Prisoners of War. The King, being then come up, immediately commanded certain Troops to conduct them. together with their Baggage and their Waggons to Comok: but, being advifed they belonged to Pocziei, fet them at liberty the same Evening; having first ordered half their Beards to be tlipped off, the Skirts of their Cloaths circumcifed, and Passports to be tied about their Necks, with Menaces that, if ever again they appeared in Arms against the King of Sweden, they should all be hanged. Upon these Terms the Soldiers were permitted to escape, but, as to the Officers, they were fill detained, and obliged to follow the Army: which, after one day's Repose at Comok, without making any attempt on the Fortress of Zabirs, let out again, April 23. for the village of Drazalovice, and from thence, the 24th, for Pinsk, which, after Breszizi, upon the Bug, is the Capital of Polesia; making part of the Domains of the Kings of Poland, though then belonging to Wisniewiski: it is of confiderable Extent, and would be handsome, if the Buildings, began there, were finished; especially the Palace of Wisniowiski, which is grand and spacious, having a fine Garden, but, like the rest, is not compleated.

This City is fituated as in the Centre of all these vast Marshes, which here, at some Seasons, look like a Sea; and may be navigated with Barks of considerable Burden down as far as the City of Kiow, especially with the help of the River Pina, which with feveral others, discharges itself into the Nieper, and which was of great Service to a party of the Russians, who, after their Deseat, took this Rout, as the safest, towards their native Country.

In the middle of this huge Marsh, or Sea, certain Eminencies rise like Issands, though not approachable but in Skiffs or Canoes; and, the all this Extent of Water is covered with Bulrushes, which gave it the Resemblance of a Labyrinth, the Inhabitants are, notwithstanding, so well acquainted with all the Turns and Doubles, that they never sail of finding the Place they aim at, somewhat in the manner of travelling on the Canals in Holland; whereas a Stranger shall lose himself a hundred Times, before he lights upon the right Track he ought to follow.

There is in this City a College of Jefuits, who have a Dispensary, which is a thing very rarely to be met with in this Country. Beside these it is inhabited by all forts of People, of disferent Religions, especially Greeks, and a great Number of Jews, who have a Synagogue. The Inhabitants of this Province are, likewise, more laborious than essewhere: and the Manusacture of Russa Leather at Pinsk, is essemed the finest in the Kingdom.

Never Army before had dared to penetrate so far; the most antient Histories of Peland mentioning no such thing; and the People were so generally convinced, that it was impossible to surmount the Difficulties, which such a continual Succession of Marshes must offer upon a March, that they were under the greatest Astonishment to see the Swedes within their Borders,

The King was serve alighted off his P p 2 Horse,

Horse but he ascended the Steeple of the Jesuits Church, to examine the Situation of that strange Country, and, observing that continual Succession of Water, till the very Eye-sight sailed, he said smiling, See my non plus ultra. It was, in Effect, absolutely impossible to penetrate strait on from hence into Volbinia, either by the Help of Bridges, or Barks, as his Majesty had at first proposed.

The King, therefore, refolved to remain some Weeks at this Place, to wait the Arrival of the rest of the Regiments, which were as yet sar behind. During which Interval, he ordered the Roads to be repaired with all Diligence, and Bridges to be thrown over several Places, to render his Egress more commodious than his Entrance had been.

Colonel Creutz, who was left in Arrear to continue the Blockade of Lacowitz, having received Advice that fome thousand Russians and Cosaques seemed inclined to march to the Relief of that Fortress, detached certain Parties for more exact Information: who not only confirmed the Arrival of the Enemy in the Adjacencies of the City of Kletsk, at three Leagues Distance, but, likewise, that they intended, after taking one Day's Repose, to set out towards the Evening, in order to surprize him, under Covert of the Night.

That Day the Colonel had received a Re-inforcement of four thousand Dragoons, commanded by a Major, which his Majesty had detached, while upon his March, to join him, and, therefore, resolved to take the Advantage, and be before-hand with the Enemy. Accordingly, he set out at eleven o'Clock the same Evening, having left Lieutenant Colonel Traut-fetter to watch the Blockade.

But, whatever Care the Colonel had taken to conceal his March, it was discovered by the advanced Guards of the Enemy; who, having had Time to range themselves, he found them, at Day break, in order of Battle; part in the City of Kletsk, and part on the other Side, and beyond a Marsh covered with a Bridge: beside which the Streets were filled with Ressault Foot, and the Cofaque Cavalry.

Notwithstanding all which fine Difpositions and Preparations, Creutz began the Attack in several Places, especially, where he believed it most to his Advantage: and though the Enemy returned a violent and continual Fire, he had the good Fortune in less than half an Hour's Time, to push all the Infantry into the Marsh, where, not being able to advance or retire, they were all cut to pieces. At the same time, the Bridge, which, as observed before, led out of the Marsh, was so choak'd up with the Bodies of Horses and Men, killed and wounded, that Creutz could hardly get over to attack the rest of the Troops on the other Side, which made their utmost Efforts to dispute the Passage.

Our Squadrons, however, having gained Ground by little and little, and, at last, arrived to the End of the Bridge, those who passed first attacked the Enemy, Sword in Hand, with such Impetuosity, that both Horse and Foot were repulsed, and driven off in Confusion to the Distance of a quarter of a League.

Creutz then lengthened out his Line, to give them chace in Platoons:

because

because it was difficult to advance in large and close Bodies in such a boggy Country: and, in this Order, put to the Sword, all they could overtake for half a League together; when, not caring to pursue them any farther, he returned towards the City, and sent out his Parties, on all Sides, to destroy all the Russians and Cosaques who had hid themselves in the Houses, and Ovens; above four thousand of whom perished in the City, and the open Field; among which was Apostol Andres, the Cosaque General, sent hither by Mazeppa in his Place.

The Russian General had the Happiness to escape with a Wound in his Arm; and no Quarter was given but to one Cosaque Colonel, one Captain, and seventy men, who were made Prisoners. We took, beside, four pieces of Brass Cannon, sixteen Standards and Ensigns, and sour pair of Kettle-

Drums.

The Besieged, in the mean while, no sooner observed that a large Body of the Besiegers were marched off, but they endeavoured to make Use of the Opportunity, by making continual Sallies; and, as their Number, likewise, continually increased, Trautsetter saw himself obliged to send Advice to Creutz by an Express; who, having received it, staid but two Hours after the Action of Kleisk, before he returned without loss of Time, leading the Way himself, and being sollowed only by a Handful of his Men.

The Besieged perceiving the Return of these Troops, took it for granted the Swedes were beat, and even signified their Joy upon the Occasion, by sounding their Trumpets and Kettle-Drums: but it lasted no longer than till the Arrival of the rest of the Detachment, who posted thitner as fast as possible: for the Besieged, then seeing the Trophies which were spread before them, and hearing the Discharge which the Swedes made upon the Castle, with the Assistance of the four pieces of Cannon just taken, while, on another Side, they raised Batteries, and opened the Trenches, lost all Courage, and beat a Parley in order to capitulate, which being refused, they surrendered at Discretion, May 2. 1706. to the Number of one thousand, three hundred and sixty one Men, Officers, and Subalterns, included, who all laid down their Arms. We likewise took nine Pieces of Cannon, and nine Enfigns and Standards.

King Stanislaus, who, as hath been observed, followed with his Column that of his Swedish Majesty, passing near Zabirs, summoned the Governor to furrender, who, not only refused, but fired upon our Troops; which the King of Sweden being made acquainted with, detached thither immediately Major-General Meyerfeld to reduce him to Reason: but he receiving no other Answer, than had before been given to King Stanislaus, his Swedish Majesty repaired thither himself, and, after having made the Tour of the Fortress; as well as the Marsh would give him Leave, returned to Pinsk, to order the Artillery. Upon which the Governor, who, till then, would listen to no Proposal, began to change his Tone, especially, when he was threatened with the utmost Rigour, if he persisted in his Obstinacy, and surrendered at Discretion with all his Garrison, which consisted of seven hundred Men, As this place belonged to Wifziowiski, it was levelled with the Ground, the forty pieces of Cannon on the Ramparts were burst, and all the Flouses, together with the Magazines, burnt to Ashes.

King Stanislaus then wheeled from Gomok near Zabirs, more to the Right, towards Poland, and, after having passed through Opolia, and the City of Motol, reached Molodowa, four Leagues and a half from Pinsk, where he took up his Quarters, April 27.

It was about this Time, that the King received the News of the Defeat of the Russian and Cosaque-Succours at Kleisk by Colonel Creutz, but as he was yet ignorant of the Reduction of the Fortress of Lacowitz, he ordered thither the Artillery, destin'd for Zahirs, under an Escorte of fifty Dragoons, and, without faying a Word to any body of his Design, stole from his Quarters, May 2. at two o'clock in the Morning, without so much as a Servant, accompanied only by the Prince of Wurtenburg, whom he had advertised over Night to be ready to follow him.

They rode twenty Leagues on a Stretch that Day to Lacowitz, and found the Place already given up. Upon which his Majesty ordered it immediately to be raised, which was done so effectually, that, except the inner Castle, which belonged to the Sapiebas, all was laid level with the Ground.

The King then repaired to Kleisk, to survey the Field of Battle, and, upon his Return, decamped from Lacowitz with Creutz and his Detachment, and marched over to Niezvice, where Lieutenant-Colonel Trautsetter had deseated fifteen hundred Cosaques, as hath been already related, and set Fire to the City; only a Lieutenant-Colonel, and certain Troops being lest at Lacowitz, as well to guard the Prisoners, as compleat the Demolition of the Ramparts and Walls which surrounded the Castle.

When the King was arrived at Niezvice, the Garrison of which consisted of two hundred Men, beside the Burghers and Populace, he immediately summoned it to surrender, by Adjutant General Rosenstierna, and, upon the Commander's Resusal, ordered him to be told, that he should be hanged with all his Garrison, if he obliged the Swedes to handle one Shovel, or discharge one Cannon: upon which, not caring to put his Life to such a Hazard, he resolved in an Hour's Time to comply, and surrendered at Discretion to his Majesty.

That Fortress, which was esteemed one of the finest in Poland, was secured by four Stone Bastions, strong Counterscarps, and every thing capable of Defence, without any one Defect. The seventeen pieces of brast Cannon, and the four of Iron found there, were all melted down, and his Majesty gave Orders to blow up the Fortifications, and raise the whole Pile, because it belonged to Prince Radziwil.

Several parties were detached to lay waste the rest of the Possessions of that Prince, which lay in that Country, and which were of such an Extent, that they equalled the finest Principality. Those of many other discontented Lords underwent the same Fate. The King then, May 12. repaired, with the Prince of Wartenberg, to Slucs, the Castle of which, belonging to Prince Charles Philip of Neubourg*, in the Right of his Wife, threw open its Gates immediately to receive him. His Majesty made no Stay in this City, which is one of the largest in the Country, and, after having given Orders to Colonel Creuiz, to keep a strict Eye on the whole Province, as well as to burst all the Cannons of Slucsk, which carried above eight Pound Ball, and might serve the Enemy for Field-pieces, he returned without any Escorte to Pinsk.

It was fix o'clock in the Evening, May 13. that the King fet out on Horseback from Slucse, leading in his own Hand, as well as all those in his Train, a spare Horse, for a Change in case of need; and, by four o'clock the next Day, arrived fafe at his Quarters, having rid, across Marshes and Rivers, thirty Leagues upon a Stretch. The Prince of Wurtenberg, Major-General Meyerfeld, and two others, were the only Persons able to support the Fatigue; the rest remaining behind at different Places. When they were almost at their Journey's End, they came to the Side of a Lake, and, not feeing any Person to ferry them over, were greatly embarrassed, till chance led them to a small Skiff, which they resolved to make use of themselves, for that Purpose.

The King took Charge of the Helm, the Prince held the Horses, which were to swim by the Side, and the others rowed. At first all went well; but when the Horses discerned no Land on the other side, they stopped all at once, and would proceed no farther. The Prince then stood in need of all his Strength, to hinder them from over setting the Skiff, or dragging him into the Lake: which he both accomplished, and, likewise, so pacified them at last, that they swam the rest of the Way quietly, and, thereby, contributed to the Ease of the Rowers: by which Means all got safe to Land, and reached the Head-quarters, without any ill Accident whatever.

In this Interval, Creutz executed the Orders he had received, and, after Niezvice was totally burned and raised, rejoined the Army with his Detachment. As to the Garrison of that Place they were set at Liberty, together with their Commander, with Menaces, however, to hang them all up, in case they ever more bore Arms against King Stanislaus, or the King of Sweden.

The King now prepared to leave Pinsk; but before his Departure, ordered a Sort of Castle or Palace, at the Entrance of the Suburbs, because it belonged to Wisniowiski, to be blown up. At the same Time he commanded the Suburb itself to be burnt for the same Reason, and it was reduced to Ashes accordingly.

His Majesty, in his March, inclined to the right, to avoid the largest of the Marshes; and May 23 reached Duboi, a Place belonging to the Jesuits of Pinsk. The same Day he likewise made a Tour to Zabirs, to see what Progress was made in the Demolition of it; and, by the way, the Prince of Wurtenberg had the Missortune to tumble into a Marsh, from whence he was dragged out with great Difficulty, but lost his Horse irrecoverably.

The 25th, the Army passed the River Pina, and came to Dolski, where they halted till the 28th, when they reached Lubiszowa, or Dubieski, a City which had the Guilt of belonging to Wisniowiski, and therefore was reduced to Ashes.

The 29th, we marched on to Horonize, and, afterwards to Serviza, from thence, the 30th, to Novaruda, where we continued till June 2. both to refresh the Army, and wait for the Baggage, which was still behind: the Bridges, thrown over the Marshes, not able to support such a Number of Carriages, being broke down in several Places.

June 2. the Army advanced to the City of Holuwka, from thence the 3d, to Zokulof, and the 4th, by the River Ster, to Rosicze, where his Majesty ordered the Bridge over that River to be repaired. After which the 6th, the Army entered into Volbinia, and marched on to Klockzyn, from whence, passing by the City of Luko, the 9th, it reached the Castle of Jari-slowice.

Here the King continued some Time; and, to facilitate the Arrival of the rest of the Army, he ordered them to march in several Columns, and by various Routs; the Rear having it in Charge, to burn and spoil all the Estates of the Enemy in their Passage.

Major General Meyerfeld was detached, at the same Time, with four Regiments towards Brefwizie, a noted Pass, situated on the Bug, bordering on Lithuania and Poland, it being advised that Pocziei was posted there with a large Number of Poles. Meyerfeld hastened his March as fast as possible to surprize them, but his Diligence was of no Use: no Enemies being yet arrived. He therefore posted himself in the City to expect them, which is samous for the University the Jews have there, who repair thither in Crowds from Germany, Italy, Moravia and Silesia, to study and take their Degrees. The whole Palatinate, likewise, takes its Name from this City, though by some it is called Polesia.

During the Time that Meyerfeld waited at Breszizie, partly by Gentleness, and partly by Threats, he induced the greatest Part of the Nobility of that Country to declare for King Stanislaus, and all that refused were punished with the total Ruin of their Estates.

Some little Time after this, the Troops of Sapiebas amounting to four or five thousand Men, joined him, which he employed with Success to scour the Country. They returned one Day with eleven Companies, and a Regiment of Polish Infantry, which they had taken Prisoners, and who, afterwards, entered all together into the Service of King Stanislaus.

That Prince, likewise, quitted his Quarters at Molodowa, together with his Court and his Column of Troops, May 24. the Day after the King had quitted his, and marched as tar as Bronitza, where the Regiments halted one Day. The 26th, they proceeded to Balandize, through the Marsh, and the Pass near Nieszisse, which is a Branch of the River Pina. The 28th, the Regiments repaired to Dolsky.

The next Day they passed the Pina, and marched within half a League of Luboschow, to Wola. The 31st they removed to Sczerwitza, and having halted there one Day, they marched through the City of Trojanacka to Holunka, the 5th, to Zanucki, and the 6th, to Rockize, where they threw a Bridge over the River Ster, and where the Regiments of the Artillery, de Rank, and de Clerk, continued of the other Side, and did not pass the Bridge at all.

The oth, King Stanistaus with Lieutenant General Stromber, the Court, the Guards, and some Horse, repaired to Kolizin, where he took up his Quarters. The rest of his Column marching the 10th, to Doroboistai, and to Targonitze, which was but one League from the Head Quarters of Jaristawice.

On the Approach of our Army into Valbinia, the Inhabitants hurried off on all Sides, and the King immediately ordered Magazines to be established for the Refreshment of our Troops, after the dreadful Fatigues they had undergone.

This Country appeared to us quite a Patadife, in comparison with the Province which we had left behind us; the Fertility being so great, and the Plenty of Corn so extraordinary, that the Inhabitants could not consume it, to our very great Satisfaction.

While we took our Repose in this charming District, several Parties were sent out to levy Contributions, and compel the Malecontents, by plundering their Estates, to pay what was exacted of them: being the best Method imaginable to reduce the Poles to Reason. In the Course of which Execution, these Detachments extending themselves as far as the Adjacencies of Kiow, the Russians were so alarm'd, that they assembled the Body of an Army; dreading an Attack, from the Nearness of the Neighbourhood.

The Nobility of the Country, likewife, who were Friends to Augustus, concerned for their Estates, were in the utmost Consternation to see the King of Sweden among them. Having never been able to fancy, that an Army incumbred with Baggage and Artillery, could traverse fifty Marshes, such a Number of Passes and Desiles, believed, till then, impracticable, and penetrate, at last, into a Country, where an Enemy had never been known.

Prince Radziwil, Grand-Chancelfor, appeared above all others the most sensibly touched; for, beside, that his Estates in Lithuania were already ruined, and his Towns laid in Ashes by the Swedes, he had still the Chagrin to see them on the Point of dividing the rest of his Possessions: the King of Sweden being quartered a few Leagues only from Olyka, a fine City of his, where there is an Academy, thought it proper to fend thither a Swedish Garrison. Major General Meyerfeld, being also posted in the Adjacencies of Biala, another fine Estate belonging to that House, but a little Way from Baeszizie, so that it was impossible for either of them to avoid the like Fate, which had visited all the rest.

Count Jablonowski, Palatine of Rajfia, and his Brother, the Standardbearer of the Crown, appeared, likewife, greatly embarrassed at our Arrival: for, though they were Uncles by the Mother's Side to King Stanislaus, their Inclinations were for King Augusus, whose Friendship they preferred to the nearest Ties of Blood, whence it was easy to conclude, what fort of Treatment they would receive.

The Grand-Chamberlain Lubomir-Tki, together with his Nephew, the Oboizni Coronni, or Quarter Master-General of the Crown, who had already submitted to King Stanislaus, importuned them incessantly to follow their Example, and do the same to avoid the Chastisement, which the King of Sweden would certainly inflict: and which would be so much the feverer, as that, having once acceded to the Confederacy of Warfaw, they, nevertheless, a little after the Election of King Stanislaus, changed Sides, and, together with the late Grand-General Lubomirski, went over to King Augustus,

These Noblemen, as well as several others, studied all manner of Expedients to play their Parts dexteroully, in this critical Situation, and behave themselves in so nice a Manner, as to leave it in their Power, afterwards, to follow which Faction they pleased. The first Step they took, therefore, was to infinuate themselves into the good Graces of King Stanislaus, to whom they protested an Infinity of Zeal and Sincerity, in the most respectful Terms, and with all the Humility possible: which had so good an Effect on that Prince, always gracious, and condescending, that he not only took them into his Protection, but even promised to procure them Access so the King of Sweden.

But his Majesty, who had several Times already experienced the inconstant Humour of that Nation, would not suffer himself to be won so easily, and demurred for some time to the Sollicitations of King Stanislaus. At last, however, giving way to the reiterated Importunities of that Prince, he agreed to fix a Term for those Noblemen to accede to their Duty; which he insisted should be done in a Body, and with an unanimous Submission to the new King.

Ĭ,

Prince Radziwil was the only one who made a Difficulty to comply, and he suffered the Time limited to elapse before he came to a Resolution. last, however, having received repeated Commands to come in, and acknowledge his fovereign Lord, he obeyed, and did Homage to King Stanislaus. The rest of the Nobility of Volbinia, among whom was a Prince of the illustrious House of Czatorinski, then followed his Example, and did the fame; having first met in full Asfembly, and fent Deputies to acknowledge him in Form for their legitimate Liege-Lord. In this manner did the King of Sweden, in a very short time, finish the Affairs of Volbinia, that he might, with the greater Celerity, proceed on to compleat what yet of his Plan remained imperfect.

King Augustus was still at Cracous, where he had constant and indisputable Advices of all that passed in Volbinia to his Disadvantage; neither did he believe himself in Security there, when he learned that Field-Marshal Rheinschild was making his Approaches to Warsaw, and made certain Motions which indicated he meant to inclose him there: to prevent which, he took a Resolution to return into Lithuania, as likewise to be nearer the Czar, and, if possible, draw the King of Sweden out of Poland, far from the Frontiers of his hereditary Dominions.

Leaving, therefore, at Cracow a Garrison sufficient for the Defence of the Place, with the Residue of his Troops, and certain Russian Regiments, he marched Night and Day; and, near Radom, fil'd off towards the Vistula, which he passed without a Moment's Delay. After which, having joined the Crown-Army, he made a feint to attack General Meyerfeld who was posted at Breszizie: but, having halted on the Side of the Bug, twelve Leagues from Breszizie, all at once, he passed the River, the Water being then very shallow, and repaired first to Tykozin, and then to Lithuania, where he distributed his Troops in the Neighbourhood of Novogredeck, expecting, with much impatience, what Measures the King of Sweden would take; and whether he would follow him, or not.

His Majesty, however, was far enough from being amused any longer by an Enemy, who flew before him from one Province, Country and River ro another, only to millead him from his Purposes, and ruin his Troops in pursuing him by continual Marches, and intolerable Fatigues. On the contrary, he resolved to put a finishing Stroke to the War, by entring into Saxony, and consequently oblige King Augustus to abdicate the Crown, or, in case of Resulat, to reduce his Country to such a Condition, that it should not recover Strength again for Years, much less furnish out the exorbitant Expences of the War. His Majesty, nevertheless, kept his Purpose so secret, that no body knew what step he would take next, though all his Troops had Orders o stold themselves ready for a March.

The King's Birth day was celebrated at Zarislowice, before our Departure, after the usual Manner, without any distinction from other Days, or any Pomp whatever: we had not even heard the Sound of the Drums and Trumpets that day, if it had not been Sunday, and it was the Custom to call the Troops to publick Worship by that Signal.

Some Days after, his Majesty made one of the greatest Promotions that ever was upon Record, either in the Reign of Charles XI. or his own: Creating eight Senators, or Counfellors of State. which is the first Dignsty in the Kingdom. Count Otto Welling was named the first, and likewise appointed Prefident of the Tribunal of Abo, in Finland; Count Gyllenstierna, Counsellor of State, and Governor General of Breme; Count Rheinschild, Counsellor of State, and Field-Marshal of his Majesty's Armies: General Frolich, Counsellor of State, and President of the Tribunal of Darpt; General Niks Stromberg, Governor of Revel; Count Pale Governor or Sate. Holder of Stockbalm; General Nierosb, Counsellor of State, and President of the Tribunal of Zonkioping; Baron Arwid Horn, was created a Count, and Counfellor both of State, and of the Chancery. Count Magnus Steinbock was made General, and Governor of Scania. Count Adam Lowenbaupt, General and Governor of Rige; and Mr. Maydel, and Baron Arwid Axel Mardefeld were appointed Generals of Foot.

There were, moreover, appointed, thirteen Major-Generals of Infantry, and seventeen Colonels; not to mention Lieutenant-Colonels, Majors, and other Subaltern Officers.

July 7. 1706. All the Parties, which had been detached to levy Contributions, being recalled, the Army decamped from Zariflowice, passed over the River of Ster near Scheckne, and, leaving the City of Lusus on one side, reached Skurza, where they rested one Day.

The 9th, we passed through the City of Woinin in our way to Sainsitza, the next Day, marching by different Routs, we arrived at Podbaize. The 11th, we marched through the City of Wlodzimir to Horodla, in Red Russia, and the Palatinate of Beltz, where the King very easily passed over the River Bug, which, being there near its Source, is neither broad, or deep enough to be navigable. 12th, we reached the City of Dubinka, which belonged to King Stanislaus, and where a Part of the Army, which had taken a different Rout, joined us. After which, the 14th, we proceeded to the City of Chelm, the Capital of the Palatinate of that name, where we took one Day's Repose.

The 16th, his Majesty directed his Course to Moglize, the 17th, to Lenczna, having left the City of Lublin on the right; the 18th, Nazubow, the 19th, through the City of Korow, to Pulawa upon the Vistula, an Estate belonging to the Palatinate of Belsk, Siniowski, whom King Augustus had elevated to the Dignity of Grand-General of the Grown, in the room of the late Prince Lubomirski.

This March was made with fo much Diligence, that, before the Enemy were advised that the King of Sweden had decamped from Jarislowice, he was far off Volbinia, on the Banks of the Vistula.

Just at this time, Count Zinzenderff. with Mr. Adelshausen his Secretary, and the rest of his Train, being on the Point of passing the River, in Search of his Majesty on the Frontier of Volbinia, fell in with our Van, who informed him the King of Sweden was at Hand. Upon which, furprized at the Intelligence, he immediately repaired to Count Piper, and earnestly demanded a private Audience of the King: which having as foon attained, he represented to his Majesty, in the most lively Terms, that the Imperial Court was greatly alarmed at the Report which had been spread of his Swedish Majesty's Delign to enter into Saxony, which in the present Posture of Affairs, had given Birth to a thousand Apprehensions, with regard to the Empire; resulting from the strict Friendship which always had, and actually did subsist between France and Sweden. To which it was replied, That the Emperor might depend on the King's upright Intentions, who had nothing more at Heart than to preserve a good Intelligence with his most Imperial Majesty: That the Friendship, sublisting between France and Sweden, had no Relation to the Affairs of Poland and Saxony: And, finally, that he might be fatisfied his Majesty would never think of troubling the Repose of the Empire, to oblige any Power whatever. Upon receiving, which Assurances, the Envoy took his Leave, and returned to his Court.

During this Time, all the necessary

Preparations

Preparations were made for throwing two Bridges over the Vifula, one near Pulawa, and the other near the City of Casimir, that the Army might continue its March more commodiously, in different Columns, one of which was to be commanded by King Staniflaus.

As to the Detachment under Major-General Meyerfeld, and which, till then, had continued at Breszizie, it took the Road of Lukow in the Palatinate of Lublin, and repaired to the Visfula, which it passed over. Meyerfeld, in this March, had the Missfortune to lose a Captain and six Dragoons, who, having Orders to levy Contributions, was attacked by some Thousands of Poles, and killed with most of his Men.

When the Bridges were compleated, July 23. the King proceeded in his March from the Vistula to Zwolim, and the 24th, to the City of Radom, where the Army continued some Days. But, the next following Night at eleven o'Clock, his Majesty took a Resolution to push on eighteen Leagues farther, to Pionteck, where Field-Marshal Rheinschild was encamped with his Army. Chusing for his Companions only the Prince of Wurtenberg, Prince Charles Leopold de Mecklembourg, who joined the Army in Volbinia, Major General Meyerfeld, Adjutant General Canifer, two Drabans, and a Polish Guide, in all seven Persons.

Having travers'd a Wood, two Leagues from Radom, at dead midnight, they fell in, all at once, with one of the Enemy's Parties, confifting of three hundred Poles, who were posted at the End of the Wood, and in the Road on the other Side: who, at the first, imagining them to be of their own Party, and the King, on the other hand, believing them to be Swedist Valoches, his Majesty found himself almost in the middle of them, before any Explanation ensued on either Side. But when Adjutant-General Canifer, who led the Way together with the Polist Guide, and who was well versed in the Polist Language, had demanded the Word, and received no Answer, all were undeceived, and every one, putting Spurs to his Horse, thought of nothing but making their Escape.

At that instant the Enemy gave Fire, and pursued the King and his Train back into the Wood; however, without doing them the least Mischief, the Darkness, as well as the Trees, so effectually covering their Retreat, that they all happily repassed the Wood; and the Enemy, manifestly for fear of an Ambuscade, then gave over the Chace.

This Rencontre, nevertheless, so dispersed the whole Company that the King, being soon after thrown from his Horse, had no body near to give him Assistance; but, as he held the Bridle sast, notwithstanding his Fall, his Horse could not run away, and his Majesty had Time to remount. This Mischief, however, attended it, that he afterwards lost his Way, and was entirely separated from his Retinue.

The Prince of Mecklembourg, likewise, fell from his Horse; but he was not so lucky as the King, his Horse taking the Bit in his Teeth, and leaving him to shift for himself as he could: which obliged him to foot it back to the Wood, and there search out the most shadbwed Places to hide himself till the Morning.

The

The Prince of Wurtenberg and Major-General Meyerfeld kept the Road with the rest; and took it for granted, that the King, according to his usual Custom, had got the start, and was arrived at Radom before them.

But, when they came to the Camp, and heard no News of his Majesty, it occasioned an universal Uneasiness; upon which Count Piper, being immediately apprized of what had happened, ordered out Colonel Burenschild, with two hundred Horse, to go upon the Spur in Search of him, all along that Road.

But, though this Detachment dispersed themselves on all Sides, they sound only the Prince of Mecklembourg in an Equipage ridiculous enough, and which would have excited much Laughter on any other Occasion: he being mounted on a little Pad, he had sound near a Village, without either Saddle or Bridle, and labouring hard to put him on, to very little Purpose.

As to the King, after having wandered all Night, he had the good Fortune, at Sun-rife, to recover the Road to Radom, where he arrived alone: and, having learn'd that two hundred Horse were out in quest of him, he immediately mounted a fresh Horse, and, without stopping a Moment, hastened to join them, accompanied by Count Wrangel, Captain-Lieutenant of the Drahans and Major-General.

About two Leagues from Radom, his Majesty fell in with the Detachment, and selecting fifty of the Number, sent back the rest to the Army.

With these he continued his Journey, and arrived happily at Count Rheinschild's Quarters, who was greatly surprized to see his Majesty there, when he believed he had not yet passed the Vistula. His Majesty continued here but sew Days, during which, he visited the Regiments, and, having lest behind him the Escorte he brought from Radom, and taken another from Rheinschild's Army, returned to his own, July 28. which continued where they were, for a sew Days longer, till the Residue of the Troops had passed the Vistula.

Ц

The Russians now recommenced their Excursions, on the Side of Kiow, with large Detachments. Delivered from their Apprehensions, that his Majesty would conduct his Troops, into Russia, which they seared was his Design, in that painful March which he made through Polesia, and learning at the same time, that he had lest Volbinia, they believed the Opportunity savourable to reduce that Country anew to his Obedience; and so much the more savourable, as they had no Reason to expect the least Resistance.

There was, nevertheless, but one strong Party detached, among so many others, to fall in with our Rear, and harase us upon our March: And this had the good Fortune to furprize a Swedish Lieutenant, with forty H orse, at Lublin; who, having rambled about from Side to Side, to raise Contributions, and neglected to join the Army, before it had passed the Vistula, was attacked on such a Surprize, that, in spite of the brave Defence they made, almost all of them were put to the Sword: the Lieutenant himself being dangerously wounded, and escaping with the utmost Difficulty, together with a few of his Men, to the Army.

The

The Russians having no great Stomach to pursue us any farther, halted on the other Side of the Visula, where they became, in the Sequel, every where Masters: especially when Prince Menzikoss arrived there from Lisbuania to the Succour of King Augusus, with twenty thousand Men, as we shall see presently.

july 31. His Swedish Majesty departed from Radom, and, together with the Army, marched on to Novamiasto, having crossed the River of Pilsa in their way. Algust 1. they proceeded to Rowa, and the next Day to the City of Berezini, where they rested some Days, during which his Majesty celebrated a Fast, with Prayers suitable to the Occasion: many of which had that Year been observed in Sweden.

Aug. 6. The Army continued its March to Strikowa, which was but one League from Piontek, where that under Rheinschild had continued tilk then; both of which being now joined, comprehended all the Forces his Majesty had in Poland.

Aug. 11. The Army again decamped, and reached the little City of Luminers, the Column under Rheinfehild marching all the way a breast with that of his Majesty. The 13th, they proceeded to the City of Warts, the 14th to Blaski, the 15th, to Olstock, a Cloister so called; the 16th to Offrewice, and the 17th, to Solmerzine, a Place on the Frontiers of Silesia, belonging to King Stanislaus.

Here the King rested till the 27th, when his Majesty, in one Day's March, passed through the Cities of Zdan, Justin, and Goska, to Ravitz, where his Majesty had his Winter, Quarters the Year before.

The King had no fooner taken a Resolution to enter into Saxony, An. 1706. and to quit Poland for some Time, then he ordered General Mardefeld to post himself near Kakis in Great Poland, that he might have a continual Eye on the Motions of the Enemy, and keep those Parts under an Obedience to King Stanisaus, who had a considerable Party on his side.

The Body of Troops which the King left under General Mardefeld was composed of the Regiment of Horse three Regiments of Scania; German Dragoons: three Regiments of Foot, one Pomeranian, under the Command of Colonel Charles Horn: one Bavarian, whose Colonel was named Goerz; and a third confishing of two Battalions of French and Swiffers, which were taken Prisoners at the Battle of Fraufadt, and had fince, at their own Request, entered into his Majesty's Service. They had been commanded by a Franch Colonel of the Family of Joyeufe, who was killed by the first, and indeed the only Discharge of the Swedes, and now. John Funk was made their Colonel. The Polonesk were commanded by the Palatine of Kiovia, and Count Sepiebe. At the same Time, a Garrison was left at Posnania, defend that Town in case of an Ate mck.

The Ministers of England and Holland, the Sieurs Robinson and Haerfalt, who continued at Danizio, by the Order of their Masters, received at this Time the Copy of a Paper, containing Reflections on the Satisfaction destanded of Sanony by Sandan, and the Realons which obliged his Majesty to enter into this Electorate. The Minifiers writ to Count Piper, that he would divert the King of Sweden from invading this Country. The King, who had decamped from Rawitz, and advanced fix Leagues thro Hernstadt in Silesia, towards Odermuble near Steinau on the Oder, sent from thence an Answer to the Ministers of the Maritime Rowers, by a Delaration signed in his Name by Count Piper, who likewise writ to them at the same Time.

This Declaration and Letter contained the Reasons which induced his Majesty to tenter into the hereditary Dominions of King Augustus. They made it appear, That the Empire had no cause to distrust the Honesty of his Majesty's Intentions in this just Enterprize: That the Rumoters vaifed by the Enemies of Sweden on this Occasion were without Foundation: That France would have but little Room to congratulate berself shat he had imposed on the Estates of the Empire, and made them fear the Consequencies of this Inroad: That it was boped the bigh Allies would have fuch Assurance of, and Confidence in his Majesty's Sincerity, as would admit of no Umbrage: The obliging Carriage which his Majesty had supported to his Friends and Allies, fince the Beginning of this War, being a convencing Proof that be proposed no other End, than the obtaining a just Satisfaction, and bad taken no more than the necessary Steps to insure it.

The King passed the Oder at a Ford at Steinan, at the Head of the Cavalry, while they were busy in making a Bridge for the Passage of the Infantry, Artillery, and Baggage. King Stanifaus arrived the same Day with the Regiments under the Command. of Count Stromberg.

The Army having passed the Oder at Steinau, advanced presently two Leagues to Altstadt thear Lieben, where it halted that Night. The next Day, being the 24th of August, they marched to Gelezig near Kleinbaus, from whence, on the 25th, they arrived at Loisdorff, which is but a Quarter of a League from the Town of Lowenberg. On the 26th, they marched three Leagues towards the Village of Krummenoselfe, which is situated on the Frontiers of the Upper Lusace, near the Town of Greysfenberg.

Though the Count of Zinzendorff was advertised of the Necessity under which the King of Sweden lay to pass thro' Silefia, which was a sufficient Excuse of the Court of Vienna, and eltewhere, an universal Clamour was nevertheless raised, that his Majesty had infringed the Peace of the Empire, and made adreadful Inroad into Germa-

#y.

The feveral Courts were divided in their Opinion in this Affair, as these were guided either by Friendship or Hatred to the Swedes.

The Ministers of the interested Powers attended with great Vigilance to whatever might concern the Tranquillity of their Masters. As to those of England, at Ratisbon, at Vienna, and the Hague; they endeavoured to alarm the Emperor and the States of Germamy, to interpose on behalf of the Elector of Saxony, by affishing in his Deliverance from the Swedish Oppression. Their Representations on this Subject mee with fo much the more Attention, for that the Consequences of this Invation now were feen in a dangerous Light, particularly to the Empire, on Account Account of this strict Alliance which subfished between Sweden and France.

The Swedish Ministers were not backward on their Parts in their Affurances to the several Powers, that his Majesty, far from meditating the least Enterprize which should tend to the Disadvantage of the Roman Empire, thought of nothing more than to give her new Instances of his Friendship. That he proposed no other End by this Diversion, than to oblige King Augustus to give him at length a just Satisfaction, of which Intention he would give all necessary Assurances, though the Moderation which he had demonstrated in his late Expedition to Denmark, ought to be a sufficient Proof of that which he would promife to preserve on the present Occasion. That as King Augustus always employed the Riches of his Country to the Prolongation of the War, of which it highly imported his Majesty to see an immediate End, it was natural to have Recourse to the same Source, to make an absolute Conclusion of this facal and miserable Dissention, which had already endured so long.

These Ministers declared at the same Time, that Justice being on the Side of the King their Master, who had only repelled the Injury of an unjust Aggressor, his Majesty had taken a firm Resolution, while he was making Reprisals, to declare against all such as his Enemies, who should pretend, without any Necessity, to intermeddle in this Affair.

This Declaration being every where dispersed, gave some Check to their Spirits, who, nevertheless, heartily wished, that the King of Sweden had not taken this last Step.

Saxony was now under the greatest Consternation; an hot Alarm had already diffused itself at the Beginning of August, on a current Report, that the King of Sweden was on his March with fix or feven thousand Swedes only, but with an Army of upwards of twenty thousand Poles, to sack the whole Electorate. And though no body was able to prove or to give the least positive Assurance of this News, it was yet so generally believed through the Country, that the Minister of King Augustus transported thence hastily all the Archives and publick Acts, and every Individual thought of fecuring his Effects with all possible Expedition.

This Terror was considerably augmented by the Regency of Dresden, who, before they had received these Orders, which were soon after sent them by King Augustus, spread abroad an Ordinance, representing, in the most lively Colours, the dreadful Consequences which were to be apprehended from this Irruption.

But Saxony soon recovered from their Fears, when they perceived, in their Letters from Lower Lusace, by which they apprehended the King would take his Rout, no mention of any Hostilities. This encouraged them to revoke their Orders which they had given, to transport away the most valuable Effects of King Augustus and the Queen his Spouse.

As they now gave into a contrary Excess, and regarded all the former Reports as Fables only. The Assembly of those whom the Saxons call their Militia of Defence, and of the Body of Hunters, who had Orders to march with all those who were able to bear Arms, now proceeded but not flatter himself that they were capaflowly. They reinforced only, to avoid Surprize, the Garrisons of Dresden, Wittenborg, Leipsic, and the Caftle of Pleissenburg. As to the Rout of the regular Troops, they were ordered to assemble on the Frontiers of Lower Lusace, to oppose the Entry of the King of Sweden.

This State of Tranquility did not last long, for the King having taken quite another Rout by the Higher Lusace, was already on the Frontiers of Saxony, even before it was believed that he enter'd it.

King Augustus remained all this while with his Troops at Novogrodeck in Lithuania, where having learnt the March of the King of Sweden, and his Passage over the Vistula, drawing towards Great Poland, he had no longer Room to doubt but that his hereditary Dominions were about to become the Theatre of War. And his own Situation was at present so miserable, that he law no Hopes of his being in a Condition to prevent the Ruin of his Country, which now feemed to him inevitable.

Germany, which was now engaged in one of the most bloody Wars she had ever sustained, was in no Capacity of yielding this Prince any Succour. And the twenty thousand Men sent him by the Czar, rather embarrassed than affisted him. Nor could he hope from any other Ally a Force strong enough to drive out of his Kingdom the victorious Army of Sweden, entirely composed of Troops enured to War, nor did there appear any Possibility of his making in an instant any advantagious Diversion. As to the Poles who yet sided with King Augustus, he could ble of affifting him in this melancholy Conjuncture: so that, upon the Matter, there remained to this Prince no Glimple of Hope to recover his Polish Crown, whilst he saw his Dominions exposed to the Mercy of his Enemies. It was then the Dictate of Prudence to facrifice that which no longer existed: in Reality, to preserve that which did.

All these Considerations hurried; King Augustus to ask Peace of the King of Sweden, without communicating it to the Czar, who would not have failed to use all Measures to have diffuaded him. Augustus named two Commissaries for this Purpose, namely, the Baron Imboff, President of the Chamber, and the Privy Referendary They were fent in August Pfingsten. to Novogrodeck, with full Instructions to feek the King of Sweden, and enter into a Treaty of Peace with him.

These Instructions contained three principal Articles. First, That in case the King of Sweden would not hazard an Entry into Saxony, but remained? still on the Frontier, the Commissaries might take Advantage thereof, and propose Conditions more advantagious to their Master; but in case the Velt-Marshal Rheinschild, with King Stanislaus, had already entered into the Country, they should instantly seek out the King of Sweden, and begin the Treaty on fuch Conditions as he should think fit, even, by an absolute Cession of the Crown to King Stanislaus; and this they were to submit to, if, which was the third Circumstance, the King of Sweden should at their Arrival enter upon the Electorate.

King Augustus at the same Time sent Advice Advice by a Courier, to the Regency of Dresden, of the Negotiation which he was bringing on the Tapis. This occasioned the Regency to send a Trumpet to his Swedish Majesty, who was entered into Silesta, with this News, and to demand of him a Passport for the Commissaries, who were now sent in quest of him.

No Answer was given to this Meffage, before Psingsten was himself arrived at Glogau in Silesta, whence he dispatched a Drum, with King Augustus's Letter to the King of Sweden in his Camp. It was written with the King's own Hand, who testified an ardent Desire to recover the Friendship of the King of Sweden, and to strike up a Treaty of Peace with him, on such Conditions as he himself should think reasonable and agreeable to his Inclination.

The Chancery expedited for this Purpose the necessary Passports for the Commissaries Imboss and Psingsten, who received immediate Orders to proceed to meet his Majesty.

As Saxany was ignorant of all that was on the Tapis to these Purposes; and on the other Side, her Inhabitants could no longer doubt of the March and Approach of the King, their Spirits were seized by such a Pannick, that they betook themselves to a general slight, abandoning their Towns, their Villages, and Estates, each Individual endeavouring to carry away and save what they had.

It was remarked at this Time, that the Carriers received two Tons of Gold, or twenty thousand Crowns, for conveying away those Effects which were withdrawn from Leipsic only; and though no more than 1d. per hundred weight be paid at the Ballance in this Town, the Sum arising from the great Quantity of Goods which were weighed, amounted to upwards of two thoufand Crowns.

The Queen of Poland, with her Royal Highness the King's Mother, and the Prince Electoral, departed likewise from Saxony, with a great Number of the noble Families of the Country. The Queen went to her Father, the Margrave of Bareuth and Culmbach; the Prince Electoral, with her Royal Highness, retired to Magdeborough, thence to Hamborough, and so to Rendshorough in Holstein. As to the Moveables of Value, they were transported for Sasety to the Castle of Konigstein.

To restore the Spirits of the People, and deliver them from that Pannick which had seized them, the King of Sweden caused a Declaration to be published, in Favour of the Electoral Inhabitants of Saxony. The Tenure of which follows.

We, Charles, by the Grace of God, King of the Swedes, Goths, and Vandals, &c. do make known, that, whereas we have thought proper to enter into Saxony with our Forces, endeavouring to stifle entirely a most unjust War, which that Country had raised and fomented, we might with great Reason have retaliated that Treatment, which their Elector King Augustus bad in the Beginning of the War shewn to our Provinces and Frontiers. Notwithstanding which, we bave thought fit, for certain Reasons, to forget our just Resentments, and kindly to fignify by these Letters Patents to the Estates and Inhabitants of the Electorate of Saxony, of whatever Quality they be, that that all such as shall remain in their Houses and Dwellings, without sending away their Effects, and who shall voluntarily and without Opposition contribute what may be exacted of them for the Entertainment and Subsistance of our Troops, shall not only be taken under our Royal Care and Protection, but shall enjoy the most perfect Security in their Persons, Families, Goods, Houses, Lands and Effetts, nor shall any of our Officers or Soldiers offer either to their Persons or Properties any Injury or Violence whatever. On the contrary, those who shall put themselves in a Posture of Defence, who Chall abandon their Houses and Dwellings, and remove their Goods and valuable Effects, either hiding or burying them; likewise, those who shall revolt against the Imposts laid on by our Commissaries or Officers, or who shall refuse to execute that which is ordered them, of whatever Degree or Condition they may be, shall not only be cast from our Grace, but treated as Enemies without any Reserve, and with the utmost Rigour, wherever they or their Effects can be found, and they shall be pursued and punished by Fire and Sword. In consequence of which, we have signed these Presents with our Hand, and sealed them with our Royal Seal.

Given at our head-quarters at Krummenolfe, Sept. 5. 1706.

CHARLES PIPER.

The King, after this gracious Declaration, departed from Krummeneelfe, and entered the Higher Lusace in his Way to Sanony. He marched by the Towns of Greyffenberg and Narklissanear Schonberg, where the Army rester one Day. Here, having learnt that some Saxon Troops posted in the Lower Lusace, by which Road they had expected his Majesty to pass, had marched thrice to the Higher, in order to observe the Motions of our Army, he detached Colonel Gortz, who had formerly served in the Saxon Troops, with two hundred and sifty Dragoons, and some Valoches, in quest of them.

From Schonberg, the Army marched to the Village of Markersdorff, which stands half a League from the Town of Gorlitz, and on the morrow arrived at Boschitz, which is but half a League from the Town of Bautzen. On these two Towns Contributions were raised.

Septemb. 1. The King marched by Bautzen to Bischoffswerde. At his Arrival Col. Gortz returned with his Party, and reported that he had a brisk Encounter with two Saxon Regiments, each confifting of fix hundred Herfe, whereof ninety were left dead upon the Place, and more than an hundred wounded; that he had twice run through with his own Hand Major-General Fordan their Commander, so that he with great Difficulty escaped with those Wounds, of which he died the next Day; that we had only one inferior Officer and some Dragoons killed, and Captain Ebrenpreys mortally wounded.

At Bischoffswerd arrived Messieurs Imbess and Pfingsten, the Commissaries of King Augustus. As this Negotiation was to be carried on with great Secrecy, their Master being then in Poland at the Mercy of the Muscowites, from whom it was desired to conceal it with all.

all possible Caution, least this Prince should be exposed to the Vengeance of his Ally, they had no Audience of the King, but made their Declaration only to Count Piper, under Pretence that the only End of their Voyage was to beseech his Majesty to spare the Country, and to regulate the Contributions. It was likewise infinuated, that it was with this View that the Trumpet and Drum had been sent from the Queen and the Regency of Dresden.

The Conferences were very secretly held at Count Piper's, but the Partition of the Kingdom of Poland between King Augustus and King Stanislaus being proposed on the Part of Augustus, the Count absolutely refused to accept this Proposition, and assured the Commissaries, that the King of Sweden would never make Peace on any lower Terms than that the following Articles (which that Prince himself dictated to Count Piper, and were by him reduced to Writing) should be the Basis and Foundation of the Treaty.

- 1. That King Augustus should renounce the Crown of Poland for ever; that he should recognize K. Stanislaus for the lawful King of Poland, and should promise never to think of remounting the Throne even after the Death of Stanislaus.
- 2. That he should renounce all other Treaties, and particularly those made with Muscovy.
- 3. That he should send Home with Honour the Princes Sobiesks, and all those Prisoners he had been able to take.
- 4. That he should deliver all the Deserters, who had passed over to his Service, and namely, Rheinhold Patkuls and should forbear all Proceedings as gainst those who had deserted from his Service to the King of Sweden.

These were the Conditions on which Count Piper was charged to negotiate with the Plenipotentiaries of King Augustus; who, seeing the Impossibility of bending the King of Sweden, and of softning the Article which related to the Renunciation of the Crown, consented at last to what was demanded of them, so that the greatest Part of the Articles of Peace, and other Points thereon depending, were almost entirely regulated at Bischoffs-werd.

The King of Sweden departed the 3d from Bischoffswerd, and marched two Leagues for Radeberg, where Major General Meyerfeld was detached with three Regiments to mach on the other Side of Dresden towards Pirnu, and the Castle of Sonnenstein.

His Majesty decamped the next Day, and posted himself in the Vineyards under the Town, at half a League from Meissen near Weinbybl, so that he seemed to have a Design on Dresden, of which however the King gave over all Thoughts as soon as the Face of Affairs began to be changed.

Baron Printz, Minister of Prussia, arrived this Day in the King's Camp, to congratulate his Majesty on his Arrival in the Neighbourhood of Prussia, offering at the same Time the Mediation of his Master between his Swedissians Majesty and King Augustus: He was answered, that this Mediation would not be disagreeable to his Majesty is there was any Occasion for it. Baron. Grove, the Hannoverian Minister, came with Mr. Printz, with the same

Compliment to the King.

The 5th, the Army marched thro' the Town of Meissen. Here the Cavalry passed the Elbe at a Ford, the Water being then very low, the Infantry and Baggage filing over the Bridge. Hence the King advanced a League to Zheren, 'a little Village situated on the Elbe, with Hills on one Side, and Vineyards on the other. up his Quarters here one whole Day, which Time he employed in fending out his Orders to the Circle or Marquilate of Mi/nia, to contribute two thousand Crowns.

As foon as his Majesty had pass'd the Elbe, the Garrisons of Leipsic and Wittenberg, together with the Troops which had been posted in Lusace, began to retreat. This gave a sensible Pleasure to the Villages where those Garrisons had greatly incommoded the University as well as the Trade.

. The Town of Leipsic presently sent Deputies to the King, who was encamped at Zheren, submitting themfelves to this Prince, and imploring him to protect their Commerce, and not burthen them with a Garrison. These their Requests were granted, by a Declaration published within a few Days, and which was dated from the Quarters at Taucha, Sept. 10. so that the great Fair was held at Leipsic as ufual, the Merchants repairing thither with perfect Safety, nor did the Swe-' dish Soldiers, dare to give them the lest Trouble or Molestation.

From Zberen, the Army advanced fix Leagues to the Town of Grimm. The King having received Advice that the Saxon Troops, which had retreated, were not far off, he took nine hundred and fifty Horse, and all the Valoches to the Number of five Hundred, and being followed by Prince Wurtenberg, put himself in Pursuit of the Enemy. The Valoches, who were in the Van of this Party, fell, near-Wiessenfels, on their Rear-guard, of which they killed feveral, taking Prifoners, one Captain, one Lieutenant, and thirty-four Soldiers. The Colonel of the Valoches had the Misfortune to be killed in this Rencounter.

This Blow disheartned the Enemy, who, fearing least worse might follow, betook themselves to Flight. The Russians, with some Regiments of the Saxons, made a hasty March towards Naumburg and Erfurt, being pursued all the way by the Swedes.

The King followed the Pursuit no farther than one League beyond Naumburg, whence he returned by the same Road with the Prince of Wurtenberg. In the mean while he ordered Colonel Gortz not to quit the Pursuit till he came up with the Enemy.

During the King's Absence, the Army, which was ordered to decamp, left Grimm, and marched strait on to Leipsic. General Gyllenkrook, Quarter-Master, with all the other Quarter-Masters of the Army, being, with fifty Dragoons, in the Van, posted themselves, on their Arrival, in the Market-Place. The Magistrates were immediately affembled to confult on the Distribution of the Army in the Neighbourhood of the Town.

As there was still a Garrison of two hundred Men of the Country Militia in the Castle of Pleissenburg, not under the Command of the Town, Gyllenkrook summoned them to surrender. The Commandant made a Feint of Refistance.

fistance, for Form sake only; but seeing no Hope of Succour, he rendered himself Prisoner, together with all those under him. The King, a few Days afterwards, set him at Liberty, and gave the Soldiers leave to go Home.

The Regiments betook themselves to those Quarters which were assigned The Head quarters were settled at Taucha, a little Town one League from Leipsic, belonging to a Magistrate of that Place. Here the King staid one Day, in which he gave Audience to the Envoys from the Courts of Saxony and other Princes, and some Deputies of the Circle of the The King thinking pro-Electorate. per to change his Quarters, and being unwilling to lodge in a Town, he chose a Gentleman's Country seat, named Alt-Ranstadt, one League and a half from Leipsic, where Gustavus Adolphus had quartered in 1632, at the Time of the Battle of Luizen, which is a Town just by Alt-Ranstadt. Majesty found himself more commodioully lodged here than at Taucha, and this engaged him to fix his Abode here all the Time he remained in Saxony.

The rest of the Army, which sollowed, was cantoned in several Cities and Towns of the Country all round Alt Randastt. Major General Meyerfeld, who, with his Troops, had passed the Elbe above Dresden, received Orders to approach this City, and to shut it put on all Sides.

Colonel Gortz, of whom we spoke above, gave a brisk Pursuit to the Saxon Troops on the Road to Erfurt; and, as this City resused to receive them, General Schulenbourg, their Commander, was obliged to proceed farther to the City of Ilmenau, near the Wood of Thuring, where being arrived, he placed the Cavalry and Baggage in the Front, and stood himself with the Infantry in the Rear.

Gortz, at his first Arrival at Ilmenau, fell in with some Saxon Guards, whom he drove back, and pursued to the Wood, in which, having advanced two Leagues on the Road to Coburg, he met the Muscovites, who, by throwing down Trees, had so barricaded the Road, which is strait enough of itself, that it was impossible to advance two a breast.

Notwithstanding this Obstacle, Gortz dismounted his first Squadron of Dragoons, who attacked the Enemy with all imaginable Fierceness, but unfortunately repulsed, and that with so much Vigour, that many of them lost their Lives; two Captains were killed, and a third mortally wounded.

Gortz not judging it proper to push the Attack any farther on that fide, by which many brave Men must be exposed to perish without procuring any Advantage, turned another way, hoping to find out a Winding, by the Assistance of which he might fall on the Enemy. He met a Peafant, who for a small Reward conducted him another Way through the Wood, leaving behind him two hundred Horse to obferve the Enemy. Scarce had he marched an Hour, before he faw a French Battalion in full march. He immediately attacked them with his Dragoons, who were again obliged to dismount. The French defended themfelves so bravely, that Gortz judging it necessary to surround them, as the only Way to compel them to yield, detached detached two Captains of the Horseguards, with their Troops, to come at them in the Rear. These Captains, one of whom was named Tarnslycht, Brother-in-Jaw to Count Piper, having executed their Orders, dismounted their Party, and attacked the Enemy, who was now surrounded on all Sides.

The French, nevertheless, stood their Ground a full Hour, and then, throwing down their Arms, they ran with all Speed they were able across the Wood, leaving eighty dead on the Spot, and fifty Prisoners.

Schulenbourg made good use of this interval to save the rest of his Troops, for the Wood being extremel large, he had no Opportunity of joining his Forces, and besides, his Men were all separated in Platoons, and making the best of their Way to avoid the Pursuit of the Swedes,

Gortz, who saw how useless it would be to advance any farther, returned with his Detachment, and some days after rejoined the Army. As to Schulenbourg, he took the Road of Rhin with his Troops, and the broken Remains of that gallant Saxon Army. These Troops were to be employed against France as the Quota of the Electorate of Saxony.

After the King's Arrival at Alt-Ranftadt, this Prince, being defirous of feeing the field of Battle near Lutzen, where Gufavus Adolphus so gloriously lost his Life for the Liberty of Germany, went to the Place, with sew Attendants, taking with him two very antient Burgesses, who, by Tradition from their Fathers, were acquainted with the Particulars of that samous Day.

The Prince ran over with the most curious Eye all the little Eminencies, the Defiles, and the Fosses: he like-wise well recollected all that he had read thereof in History, on which he discoursed a long Time with the Prince of Wurtenberg, the Counts of Rheinschild, Nieroth, and others of his Train, to whom he recounted the Order and the Names of the Regiments which engaged on the one Side and on the other. At length he finished, saying to them in a most affecting manner: We have always endeavoured to copy our Life from him; perhaps, God may likewise grant us the Blessing of dying in the same Manner.

All this Time, the Negotiations for Peace went on, and though it was necessary to take all Measures for concealing it from the Ministers, and those who examined into every thing, there was however no Neglect of regulating all the principal Points, as well as those which were already concerted at Bischoffswerd. Secretary Cederbeilm made frequent Voyages to Dresden, to communicate to the Regency whatever came on the Carpet on this Occasion.

The Peace was figned on the Part of the King of Sweden by Count Piper, Senator of the King, and Great-Marshal of his Court, and by Hermelin Secretary of State: and on the Part of King Augustus, it was figned by Baron Imboff and Sr. Pfingsten.

The Treaty could not, however, be yet fent to King Augustus, because as the Renunciation of the Crown by this Prince was specified therein, King Stanislaus had naturally so much Concern in Treaty, that it was fit to communicate it to him. Mr. Cederbielm was therefore dispatched for that Purpose to Meissen, where that Prince then was likewise to demand of him what Arricles concerning Poland he designed should be inserted in the Treaty.

When all Matters were regulated with the Saxon Ministers, the Treaty was engrossed and signed on the Part of King Stanislaus, by Count Jablono-ski, Palatine of Russia, and Uncle on the Mother's Side to this Prince; and by the Count of Sapieba, Marshal of Litbuania, who both repaired to Leipsic on that Account.

This Negotiation 'was so secretly transacted, that the Court itself had not the last Intimation of it. Thus was the Peace concluded to the Glory and Satisfaction of his Majesty, after a War no less just than long and bloodv.

It is very astonishing, that a Negotiation of this Importance, which decided in this Manner the Lot of an entire Kingdom, could be carried on so fecretly and kept fo long concealed. Both parties, indeed, seem to have equal Reason to prevent the Disclosing it. For the King of Sweden was pleafed to bring about his End without the Assistance of a Mediator, who would only have retarded the Conclusion of a Peace; And King Augustus was interested in the concealing this Affair, till he could separate himself with his Troops from those of the Czar, who were extremely superior to his own, and had it in their Power to serve him a very unlucky Turn.

As the most effential Point of the Treaty was to cause an entire Cessation of Hostilities, the Peace was no sooner signed, than the King of Sweden, with a view of keeping it a Secret, caused a Truce of six Weeks to be proclaimed at Alt-Ranstadt to the Sound of Trumpets and Kettle-drums, by the following Ordinance.

CHARLES, &c.

ME have thought good to suspend all Hostilities in the Electorate of Saxony, and the Country thereon depending, and to consent to a Truce of fix Weeks, we order and command for that Purpose all the great and inferior Officers of our Army, and all those who are anywise under military Command, as also to every other of our Subjects, to abstain, during that time, from all Hostilities against the Electoral Country of Saxony, ber Troops and Subjects, and to do them no manner of Wrong or Damage, but rather to treat them favourably and amicably on all Occasions; enjoining them at all Times to avoid holding any Conversation or Communication with the Militia and Troops of Saxony. The whole to be observed under Pain of the severest Punishment, which shall be inflitted on those who dis bey, and on the Infringers of our Orders and Commands, to which it imports every one to conform bimself with perfett Obedience. In witness whereof we have sizned these Presents with our Hand, and have thereto put our Royal Seal.

Given at our Camp at Alt Ranstadt, Sept. 15. 1706.

Sr. Pfingsen prepared for his immediate Departure from Poland with the Treaty of Peace, in order to bing back the Ratification of the King his Master. Though the King of Sweden Ss gave gave him at the fame Time Letters for General Mardefelt and K. Stanislaus, and also charged him with one to the Palatine of Kiovia, by which they were enjoined to abstain from all Hostilities against the Saxons; this Minister was not, however, to remit them to these Generals before King Augustus had ratified the Treaty. He was at the same Time charged to regulate his Voyage in fuch a manner, as to return in fix Weeks, the Time stipulated in the Treaty, in Default of which his Swedish Majesty should think himself no longer bound by his Engagements. These Measures were taken before Pfingsten began his Journey.

The King, who had always caused the most exact and severe D scipline to be observed among his Troops, gave, some Days after the Publication of the Truce, a fresh Proof of his Love for Order, and of his Moderation, by an Ordinance signed the same Day with the Peace, Sept. 14. at Alt-Ranstadt, and which was communicated to all the Regiments. The Officers and Soldiers were obliged to conform themselves in Saxons to the Articles contained in this Ordinance, under pain of incurring the most rigorous Punish-

This Piece does too much Honour to the King of Sweden to be denied a Place here, and if his Soldiers have fometimes run counter to his Orders, this Prince has inflicted the most exemplary Chastisements on them. So that Saxony must complain with a very ill Grace, seeing that any Army but our own would have made another Use of the Right of Conquest. Here sollows the Ordinance I mentioned.

CHARLES, &c.

Hereas we have graciously refolved that the great and inferior Officers of our Army, the Soldiers and Troopers should receive their Pay regularly every Month, we ordain in Consequence thereof:

I. That no Soldier shall attempt to exact any Thing in his Quarters, without paying immediately for what he receives, excepting Forage, which is not to be paid for; and we order our Officers to take Care that no Village or any Inhabitant be charged above his Quota.

II. Since the Officers and Soldiers are to pay ready Money for their Victuals and other Things necessary for their Subsistence, we forbid any of our Army to invite any one whatever to his Quarter to the Prejudice of his Host.

'III. The Suttlers with their Domesticks and Horses shall exact nothing in their Quarters, but shall pay ready Money to their Hosts for whatever they receive, as well of Victuals, Drink, and other Things, as of Forage.

IV. We forbid all of what Condition, Rank or Quality foever, to exact for their own Use any Horses or Carriages from any of the Gentry. Clergy, Citizens or Peasants, without paying ready Money for the same; but in case it be for our Service, the Officer is to take Care that such Carriages be restored to their Owners, in the same Condition they were taken from them, in default of which he shall be answerable for all: the Damage, and all the Mischiess which may happen.

'V. When any Officer or Soldier is commanded on a Party, he shall not insist, at his Return, on any Money from his Host, on pretence of his having been absent, and that his Quarters were for that Time exempt from the Contribution of Forage.

'VI. We also particularly order, that no Person be forced to sell or exchange his Horses, much less that they should be wrested by open Violence from him, or by any Means taken without immediate Payment to the Proprietors.

VII. It is not permitted to any Officer or Soldier to chuse such Quarters as are most agreeable to him, or to change them in Detriment to any other, or in lieu of Quarters, to extort some other Thing under any Pretence from the Peasants or Owners; but it shall be lawful for the Possessor to arrest the Offenders, and to conduct them to the next Regiment.

VIII. All hunting, as well within as without the Woods and Parks, is absolutely forbidden; and all fishing with Nets, as likewise the gathering Fruits in the Gardens and Vineyards, without instantly paying for what ' they take in this manner.

'iX. Every one is strictly charged to forbear bearing his Host or Domesticks, or doing them any kind of Injury; much less may they rob or pillage in the publick and private Roads, in the Streets or Inns of the Towns and Villages, or commit any other Violence whatever.

*X. All Waste of Forage is most severely prohibited; those who are convicted of this, shall be compelled to make Amends, and this shall be flopt out of their monthly Pay.

*XI. The Officers and Soldiers are to take particular Care not to fet Fire to their Quarters; all the Mischief which shall arise thence will be placed to their Account, and they will be forced to answer it.

"XII. That we may be perfectly acquainted with the Behaviour of our Troops in their Quarters, we do expressly ordain that the Officers who command our Regiments, take, every Month, or on every Exchange of Quarters, Certificates figned and witnessed by the House keepers or their Substitutes, the Bailiffs and chief Officers of Villages, and that they fend these Certificates to our Commissary General, to the End that we may be exactly informed of the punctual Execution of this Ordinance; and we strictly forbid any Persons to extort by Force such Certificates as shall not be agreeable to Truth.

*XIII. All the written Evidences, Acquittances, and Papers which our Troops deliver to the Inhabitants of the Electorate, shall be written in High-Dutch, that they may plainly comprehend the Meaning of the Contents.

*XIV. At the same Time we forbid, under the most severe Penalties, all our Forces to stop and obstruct the free Passage of the Poss. our Pleasure being that the said ofts, Travellers and Traders, with their Merchandize, whether on Posthorses, Waggons, or other Carriages, may freely pass and repass:
much less will we permit any one to fearch any of the Posts, Coaches or Waggons. All Travellers, as well

This excellent Ordinance, which to the commander of that Party; and was immediately published all over Saxony, gave so much the greater Joy, as the Probity of his Majesty was known to be fuch, that he never broke his Word. Indeed, the many exemplary Punishments his Majesty had inflicted at his first Entrance into the Country *, in order to preserve a severe Discipline among his Troops, who

* A Remark of the Author. We will only give two Examples among many, which might be alledged. At Markersdorff, near Gorlitz, two Soldiers of the Guards had taken away by force a Dish of Milk Curds, and wounded a Child who endeavoured to refift them. The King, who passed by that Moment, hearing an Uproar, stopped, and having asked what was the Matter, the Father of the Child, a Peafant of the Village, brought the Child to the King in a very bruifed and mangled Condition. The King ordered the two Soldiers to be arrested on the Spot, and to draw Lots for their Lives, and he on whom the Lot fell was sentenced to be shot, which was instantly executed, notwithstanding the Intercession of all the Officers of the Regiment, he being a very fine Man. Some Days after, a Dragoon of the Regiment of Duker, having ill used his Host for attempting to prevent his killing some Fowls, the King coming accidentally by, and the Villager making his Complaints to him, his Majesty ordered him to be shot on the Spot. These two Executions, done in a manner at once, struck such a Terror into the Soldiers, that they durst not attempt any Thing against the Inhabitants of the Country.

were now Marching victorious into a rich and plentiful Country, had given a sufficient Assurance that he would not suffer the least Looseness of Manners or Discipline to infinuate itself on their changing their Situation.

The Ministers from different Courts flocked together to Alt-Ranstadt. Befides the Barons Printz and Grove, the Prussian and Hannoverian Ministers, the Emperor fent also the Count of Wratislaw. He was charged to affure his Majesty, (offering him at the same Time his Master's Mediation) that he would do all that was possible to perfuade King Augustus to make an absolute Cession of his Crown. This Minister soon departed from Alt-Ranstadt, very well fatisfied with the gracious Reception he had met with. Mess. Haerfolt and Robinson, the Ministers of Holland and England, arrived here likewise successively from Dantzic. Baron Jessen, Envoy from Denmark, who presented nine beautiful Danish Horses to his Majesty, arrived, at the fame Time, with Baron Goertz, Privy-Councellor and Envoy extraordinary from the Duke of Holstein-Gottorp. Here were also the Baron Ketiler, Envoy from the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and his Marshal of the Court, and Mr. de Rheinburg, Miniiter of the Elector of Mayence, not to number the several Deputies of the little Courts of Saxony, and the neighbouring Provinces, who came to compliment his Majesty, and to recommend themselves to his Protection.

Such was the Situation of Affairs in Saxony, when King Augustus marched from Lithuania for Lublin with his Troops, where, having joined the Muscovite Succours which the Czar had fent him under the Command of Prince Menzikof, consisting of Horse and Dragoons to the number of twenty thousand Men, he passed the Vistula at Casimir, and marched towards Great Poland, with an intention to give battle to General Meyerfeld, who, as we faid before, remained there with a Body of the Army.

Augustus was now advanced as far as the Town of Pietrekow, when Pfingften arrived with the Treaty of Peace figned at Alt-Ranstadt. This Prince instantly approved all that was contained in the Treaty, and dispatched Pfingfen with plenary Powers, to expedite all Instruments, and other Points regarding the Ratification.

It hath been pretended that Psingften did not clearly enough explain all the Points of the Treaty to the King his Master, hoping to be able to prevail on the King of Sweden to Sosten some of the hardest Matters, when that Prince perceived the ready Condescension of King Augustus to his Be that as it will, King Augustus sent him back instantly, whether this was to gain Time, or because he had no other Person with him whom he would intrust, with the Dispatch of ' the Ratification.

Pfingsten returned without Delay into Saxony; he was, at first, desirous to carry himself the Letters with which he was charged to General Mardefeld, and the Palatine of Kiovia, the Danger appearing the more evident, because the Russians, who were still advancing, had a perfect Information of the Weakness of the Troops under Mardefeld, and continually pressed King Augustus to attack and disperse them; but having afterwards confidered that it might stop him too long on the Road, having a large Compass to make, he sent the Letter another Way; this occasioned the Accident which afterwards happened, Mardefeld not receiving the Letters till the Blow was over.

As Menzikoff, ceased not to solicite King Augustus to go in quest of the Swedes, this Prince was obliged, least he should give Suspicion by his Slownefs in advancing, to march immediately with the Army, hoping however that the Swedish General was already informed of all by the Letters in Question and by Pfingsten. However, to act on a furer Foundation, and to avoid a Battle with the utmost Precaution, he gave the General Notice under hand, by means of a Person of Confidence to whom he had communicated the Negotiation. Augustus adviled Mardefeld to retire a little, affuring him if he did, he should have nothing to apprehend. The Express was ordered to represent to him at the fame Time how much the Ruffian Forces were fuperior to his own. Mardefeld, who was absolutely ignorant of , all that had past, concerning the Peace, and who had not yet feen the Letters, believed that all the Advice King Augustus gave him was only a Snare which they had laid for him, and resolved to take Measures directly contrary to what he was advised.

The two Armies having approached each other near Kalis, there was no longer any Possibility to avoid a Battle. General Mardefeld was encouraged to come to Blows with the Enemy, by the Behaviour of the Polonese under the Palatine of Kiovia, who appeared refolute to do their Duty, and gave possible.

tive Assurances that they would stand firm and fight to the last Drop of their Blood. These Protestations inspired the General with a Belief that he was strong enough to hazard a Battle with, and to repulse the Enemy.

He was posted on an advantagious Ground between the two Villages of . Dobresez and Koselnavisch, on the Road leading to Posnania. He had on his Flank the River of Prosna, which winds about Kalis, a Town but a quatter of a League distant from the Field of Battle.

The Swedish Troops were ranged in the Centre, in two Lines, the Cavalry and Infantry being intermixed. These Troops might amount to a few more than four thousand Men, and were commanded by Mardefeld himself. The two Wings entirely composed of Polonese were ranged on three Lines, the right being commanded by Kiewski, and the left by Sapieba.

It was between three and four in the Afternoon, on the 19th of September 17c6. when the Battle began. The Enemy, who was much superior in Number, gave the right to the Russians, and the left to the Sanons. At the very first Charge, our Polonese, after very little Resistance, turned their Backs and fled, one Party of them retreating within a Bulwark, which they had made of Waggons fastened together adjoining to the River, in the Rear of the Battle.

The whole Force of the Enemy then fell upon the Swedes, who exerted all imaginable Efforts of Valour, and repulsed them on several Attacks. The Battle having lasted till Night, and the Horse on all Sides suffering a terrible Execution, Darknels caused a Separation among our Equadrons, who being surrounded one after the other, and having defended themselves some Thime, each Regiment and Squadron apart, they were at last all cut to Pieces or taken Prisoners.

The Foot fustained the longest the redoubled Attacks of the Enemy, and one Party, with General Mardefeld at their Head, made so gallant a Desence in the Form of an hollow Square, that the Enemy were obliged to capitulate with them in the open Field, before they could be brought to surrender.

Mardefeld was made a Prisoner, after having done all that could be expected from Valour or Conduct. The Colonels Gustavus Horn, Charles Horn, Markschalck, Muller, and a great Number of Officers, shared the same Fate with their General. Major-General Crassau had the Happiness to escape in Sasety with some hundred Horse to Posnania, after having been cut off from the rest of the Troops in the Dark, without any Possibility of rejoining Mardefeld.

The Polonese, who were shut up in the Midst of their Waggons, and surrounded by the Enemy, were also obliged to furrender themselves. which Number were the Palatine of Kiovia, the Count of Tarlo, with the chief Officers of the Polish Army and their Wives. In the mean Time, the three hundred Men whom Mardefeld had placed as a Garrison in Kalis, and all those who were retreated thither from the Battle, were constrained to throw down their Arms, a Multitude of Calmucks and Coffacks having to closely shut them up, that it was impossible for them to escape.

The Affairs of King Augussus seemed within a bare Possibility of being reestablished after this Battle, and so much the more, as he was now Master of all Poland, excepting Possibila. It was likewise thought at first, that the Siege of that Place would be undertaken immediately after the Victory; nay, it was even doubted whether Swedish Pomerania would not become the Theatre of the War, in order to give a powerful Diversion to the King; of Sweden.

Whatever was the Intention of the Ruffians and K. Augustus himself, besides. the Peace which was ratified of his Part in all its Forms, it is moreover certain, as to the first Article, that the Enterprize on Posnania was very doubtful, that Town being provided with every thing necessary for its Defence, and a fufficient Garrison to make a stout and vigorous Resistance; on the other Side. King Augustus had only Cavalry with him, the Muscovite Infantry being as yet on the other Side of the Vistula, in the Province of Russia. As to the second Article, which was to invade Pomerania, King Augustus had all Reason to fear that the King of Sweden, who saw himself Master of Saxony, would use Reprisals in sacking the whole Country, and entirely cutting off his Retreat.

All these Considerations were but too capable of destroying the Joy arising from this compleat Victory which King Augustus had obtained against his own Inclination. He had yet Reason to apprehend the Rage of the King of Sweden, whose Sentiments on the News of this Deseat, he could not yet divine.

Augustus determined to write to the King of Sweden, to excuse the Necessity he was in of engaging, which he had not done, but to prevent any Suspicion of the Negotiation in the Russians. This Prince, instead of advancing farther after the Battle of Kalis, repaired to Warsovia, whither he carried the Prisoners with him, assigning the Russians Quarters in Volhinia, to put them at a Distance from his Person. His Saxon Troops marched at the same Time towards Cracovia, and took up their Quarters in the Neighbourhood of this Town.

That no one might imagine there was a Treaty of Peace on foot between the King of Sweden and King Augustus, the latter published a Proclamation at Warsovia, inviting the States of the Kingdom to hold a grand Council, and consider of Means to push on the War with Vigour, forbidding any, in the mean Time, to declare on the Swedish Side, but commanding them, on the contrary, to abandon it instantly.

As foon as Pfingsten returned into Saxony, an immediate Exchange was made of the Ratifications. He brought with him a Letter from King Augustus to the King of Sweden, purporting, That as the Loss of his Affection had given him more Concern than the Crown of Poland had given him Pleasure, the Loss of this was become indifferent to him, since he had thereby regained his Friendship. With which Letter the King of Sweden appeared so satisfied, that he answered it in the most obliging Terms.

They as yet knew nothing in Saxony of what had happened in Poland; but when, foon after, the Letter from General Mardefeld brought the difagreeable News of the Defeat at Kalis, there was just Reason to believe (supposing that he had received the King's Letter from Pfingsten) that all was done by Design, and that King Augustus had no Intention to perform what he had so sacredly promised in the Treaty of Peace.

This could not fail of fensibly affecting the King of Sweden; furmounting, nevertheless, his Passions on this Occafion, as he did on all others, and without suffering the first Starts of his Indignation to break forth, he refolved to inform himself with the utmost Exactness, before he would strike any great Blow, whether an Advantage had been designedly taken of the Confidence with which he had acted, or whether this Battle had happened by an Accident; and with a Temper which deferves the Admiration of Posterity, at a Season when he could naturally suspect nothing less than a Fraud, he ordered Secretary Cederbielm to repair to the Saxon Commisfaries, and to declare, without any Wrath, to them, that if this Hostility had been committed on purpose, and they hoped to reap any Advantage from this Victory, or if they hoped to carry on the War with better Success for the future, than they had hitherto found, his Majesty signified to them, that he was ready to renounce and deliver them up their Treaty of Peace, the rather, that he was now entitled to demand a just Satisfaction for the Wrongs and the Damages which his Troops had sustained.

It is not to be imagined into what a Consternation the Commissiaries were cast by this short and precise Declaration of a Prince, whose Justice they admired, as much as they seared his Valour. They employed all possible Methods to soften his Majesty, and to excuse what had happened.

This

This Suspicion appeared too well grounded, to give them Hopes of immediately essacing it in the King's Mind. In a sew Days however arrived the Letter from King Augustus to Psingsen, which we have before said he writ on the Assair: wherein he not only testified an extreme Mortification at this Accident, protesting that this Blow had been given contrary to his Inclination, but gave Assurances that he was ready to yield any Satisfaction agreeable to the King of Sweden, if he would not be contented with this Declaration.

This Letter written by King Augufus's own Hand, and shewn to the King of Sweden, had the desired Effect; that King demanding no other Satisfaction, than an immediate Delivery of all the Prisoners taken at Kalis.

To have a full Assurance of the true Intentions of King Augustus, and that he proposed a religious Observance of all Points of the Treaty, the Swedish Ministers began to press strongly the Execution of the Conditions of the Peace, one of the principal being the setting at liberty the Polish Princes. Many Weeks passed before any Thing was regulated with respect to this Article, and many others, the Saxon Commissaries always pretending that they could undertake nothing, without an express Order signed by King Augustus himself.

The Distrust was yet augmented by reiterated Advices from P land, of the close Friendship which subsisted between King Augustus and the Russians. These Advices added, that this Prince held continual Conferences with the Grandees of Poland of his Party, on the most efficacious Means to push on the War briskly with the Swedes.

When it was represented to the Saxon Ministers, how much his Majesty was offended at a Conduct to contrary to the strongest Assurances, which King Augustus had given; they anfwered. That their Master was obliged to act in this manner, to full the Ruffians and Poles, and to disembarrass himself of them without any Danger, that he might repair in Person into Saxony: They added, that it was necessary to keep the Peace concealed, as well as the Execution of the Points of the Treaty, to prevent exposing their Master to the Vengeance of the Russians, which he had great Cause to apprehend.

Notwithstanding these Reasons, his Majesty saw so much Dissimulation in this Affair, that he resolved no longer to retard the Publication of the Peace; the rather, for that it had been agreed at the Exchange of the Ratisications, to conceal the Peace no longer than eleven Days after the Ratisication; a Term which then appeared sufficient to give King Augustus an Opportunity of securing himself from the Power of his Allies.

On the other Side, the King of Sweden would not consent to amuse any longer the Ministers of so many Powers who resided constantly at Leipzic, labouring to sorward the Peace, and making continual Representations to his Majesty on that head; the Count de Zinzendorff, being just arrived from Vienna in the room of Count Wratislaw, with new Concessions on the Part of the Emperor.

What chiefly wrought on the King, was to take away by that Meafis all Opportunity Opportunity from King Augustus, to intangle himself with any new and more dreadful Intricacies, in taking fresh Measures, or seeking after new Pretences, to elude some Points of the Treaty which he had most at Heart.

The Peace was published four Days after the Exchange of the Ratifications, by the Ministers of his Majesty and by Letters. It caused the greater Surprize, feeing no one could have imagined, that it would have been so glorious in all Respects, and so advantagious for the King of Sweden. the Ministers of Saxony, who were at the Hague and other Courts, feemed ashamed to avow it, notwithstanding all that was shewn to them, and which they were forced to believe against their Inclinations, such Precautions had been used to keep this Negotiation fecret.

As King Stanislaus was the most interested in this glorious Peace, he did not delay sending an Embassy to the King of Sweden; his Ambassadors being Mr. Landskoronski Palatine of Cracovia, and Mr. Sczuka Under-Chancellor of Poland, to return Thanks to his Majesty for having at last procured Peace and Tranquility with such Advantage to King Stanislaus, and to the Kingdom of Poland.

These Ambassadors delivered their Speech in Latin, and Hermelin, Secretary of State, answered them on the Part of his Majesty, in the same Tongue. Some Days after the King of Sweden sent Count Otto Welling, Counsellor to the King, Senator and President of the Tribunal of Abo, with Secretary Hermelin, to K. Stanislaus, who congratulated this Prince on the compleat Acquisition of the Crown, in a very fine Oration in Latin, which was answered by the Under-Chancellor Sczuka. The Compliments of other Courts arrived likewise, sooner or later, as the several Powers stood better or worse affected to Sweden.

During these Transactions, the King applied himself to the Execution of the Articles of Peace, and to consulting. with the States concerned, and the manner of fettling the Contributions towards the Support of the Army. He had already appointed an Assembly of the Estates of Saxony, by their Deputies at Leipsic; and tho' the E. states of the Electorate of the Upper and Lower Lusace, of the County of Mansfeld, of the Bishopricks of Merseburg and Naumburg, were affembled in sufficient Numbers, great Disquietudes still continued at Dresden, and the Regency there were in all the Commotions imaginable, to render this Matter odious to the People, and to obstruct it as much as possible, or at least to bring in a Treaty there, rather than permit the Conferences to proceed above with the Estates of the Country.

A Declaration was published in the Name of the Regency, forbidding the Deputies affembled at Leipsic to enter into a Negotiation with the Swedish Commissaries, before they had spoke with Baron Imboss, President of the Chamber, and had received the necessary Instructions how to comport themselves on this Occasion. At the same Time that they endeavoured to protract the Affair, by throwing these Dissidulties in the way, the Regency attempted, on the other Side, to represent to the Swedes, that the Estates were very obstinate Persons, who would stubbornly defift from giving any thing unless compelled by Force. These Intrigues succeeded so well, that the Term elapsed before any Regulation was perfected, the President Imboff pretending himself to make Propositions to the Estates. As Count Stenbock, Director of the Commissary-General of War, was of a contrary Opinion; this Diversity of Sentiments prevented any Conclusion, till his Majesty issued a new Order to treat immediately with the Estates of the Electorate, to whom they then made the four following Propositions.

1. To specify what Quantity of Demesne Lands was in the Country, and how much each had paid in the two last Years, as well in ordinary Imposts as in extraordinary, such as the Entertainment of Ambassadors, Gratuities, and extraordinary Expences of the Militia; for the Reinbursements of Interests, on these Principal Sums which they had levied; for the Imposts on Corn, fuch Imposts as concerned the Defence of the Country, such as they had laid on Chimneys, those of Forage, of Drink, and all other Tributes or Taxes of every Kind and Appellation.

2. To specify by the pecuniary Edicts the Manner in which each particular Contribution ordinary or extraordinary had been usually levied.

3. To specify the Names of the Demesnes situated within the Country, how much they had paid the two last Years in Contributions ordinary and extraordinary, and to set down at the same Time the Names of the Ministers and Officers of their several Precincts, their Functions, and the Places of their Habitation. 4. To deliver in the Receipts of the Diets of the Country since the Year 1704.

At the same Time they enjoined the Bishopricks of Merseburg and Naumburg to transmit to the Commissaries an exact List of the Contributions, as well ordinary as extraordinary, which the Regency of the Electorate had exacted these two last Years.

The Estates of the Electorate presented their Explanations, but demanded at the same Time, if the Chamber was to be comprised within the Demesnes, saying, they could give no Account thereof. As to the rest, they specified the Circles of the Electorate, as those of Thuring, Misnia, Leipsic, Eriz-Geburg, or Mountains where there are Mines, Voegbiland, the Circle of Neustadt, the Higher and Lower Lusace, with all their Revenues, and the Sum to which they had amounted these last Years. They declared at, the same Time, that in the Year 1704 and 1705, the Country had granted twenty one and a half, and twentythree and a half Quatembres, and that they had been obliged to give twentyfour Quatembres extraordinary, which King Augustus had levied through the Country by military Execution.

Count Stenbock, who absolutely infisted on the Chamber's being comprised within the Demesnes, addressed himself for that Purpose to Baron Imboff, who answered, that he had already delivered the whole into the Swedish Chancery; but this was only an Evasion, with which the Count was however forced to be contented.

As to the Bishopricks of Merseburg and Naumburg, they said, they had never done Homage to the Emperor, nor T t 2 contributed Contributed to his Supplies; for that they were separate Fiefs holding immediately of the Empire, and did not depend on the rest of Saxony; that they had their own Ministers and Princes elected by the Chapter, to whom only they had taken an Oath, and to whom, according to their Laws and their Customs, appertained all the Imposts, and all the Gratuities which were granted by their Estates, assembled by order of their Lords; that if they had paid to the Elector the third Part of their Gratuities drawn from their Chamber, this had been done in Consequence of certain Conventions and Treaties, and of an Indemnity from all Charges payable to the Emperor, which the Elector had undertaken for all the Circles of Sanony.

President Imboff had obtained Permission to declare (Sept. 30.) to the Estates, that the Pleasure of the King of Sweden, reported by Count Stembook to the Privy-Council of Saxony, was, that as well for the hereditary Countries antient as new, as for the Bishopricks and Portion of Schwarzburg, and of the other Fiess of Saxony, there should be paid monthly six hundred and twenty-five thousand Crowns, whereof one hundred and twenty-five thousand should be deducted for Forage, and the rest paid in ready Money.

This Demand appeared at first Sight exorbitant to the Estates, especially to the Bishopricks, who, besides the Impossibility they fore-saw of supplying it, thought it hard to be comprized within this Tax, as being immediate Fiess of the Empire. They took upon them to make fresh Representations, with a very humble Petition, to be suffered to enjoy their separate Rights and Customs, as they in no fort belonged to the Electorate of Saxons, though the Saxon Princes were their Governors, afferting, moreover, that they never contributed to the War in Poland.

The Estates, on their Part, excused themselves on their Incapacity to furnish so large a Sum, and prevailed so far by their Entreaties, that his Maieity contented himself with five hundred thousand Crowns per month. But as they could not agree, and always hesitated at taking a sudden Refolution, under Pretence that they had not a Freedom of acting, his Majesty irritated by all these Delays, and the new Obstacles which the Regency of Saxony continually raised, at last lost all Patience, and ordered his Troops to take their Quarters in Proportion to and to levy the Contributions conformably. As the Lift of the Imposts had been carried out of the Country with the Archives and publick Instruments, as we have faid before, they were much embarrassed how to make a Distribution of the Quarters: several Lists were laid before them, but these were not congruous. At last one was found under the Cabiner Seal of King Augustus, in which a Quantity of was fet down, which they had not been capable of exacting fince 1628, and in which the Bishopricks, and above all Thuring, many other Places, were overcharg-As the King had no other Lift. he distributed the Quarters in all the Circles of Saxony agreeably to this, and he cansed his Troops to levy Contributions according to the same Lift.

Many Complaints apole on the Part of those Quarters which were the most opprest. The Members of King Augustus's Council were obliged themselves by a Declaration to avow that they were overcharged. But it was now done, and too late to be remedied; for as the Troops were already entered into the Quarters assigned them, and as every Thing was regulated, there was no Way open for an Alteration, so that for each ... the Saxons were obliged to pay by the Month sour Imperial Gros, for the Months of September, October, November, December.

Those Regiments, for which there was no Room in the Towns, were quartered in the Villages and other neighbouring Places.

We left King Augustus at Warsovia, making a Feint to eall a Grand-Council, with Intent to carry on the War; but this was only a Pretence to give him an Opportunity of escaping from Poland with his Saxon Ministers and Troops. In effect, as soon as he had ridded himself of the Muscovites in Volvinia, under Colour of Winter Quarters, he suddenly quitted Warsovia, and hastened to Leipsic to Baron Imbosf, having left his Saxon Troops near Cracovia till farther Orders.

The next Morning he notified his Arrival to the King of Sweden, and let out a few Hours after, at Noon, with a small Train, for Gunder florff, where Count Piper was lodged, and which was but a short half League from the Head quarters, in hopes of finding, the King of Sweden there, as he had been informed he should.

Count Piper immediately acquainted his Majesty, who rose on a sudden from Table, mounted on Horseback, and rode to the Count. King Auguflus met him on the Stairs, the King of Sweden prevented his descending lower, by hastening to go up. These two Monarchs embraced each other with all the Marks of a perfect Reconciliation and sincere Friendship.

After they had spent some Time together in a Conversation on indifferent Subjects, but in a most familiar Manner, they remounted their Horses, being accompanied by about a hundred Horsemen, most of them Officers, who came to see the Interview.

These two Princes proceeded to Alt-Ranstadt, the King of Sweden giving the Right to King Augustus all the Way. When they were arrived at the Head quarters, they had a Conference together which lasted near three Hours. After which King Augustus, being fatigued with his Journey, retired to the Bed-Chamber of the King of Sweden, where he reposed himself a short while in a great Chair till Supper was served.

During the Supper, King Augustus was placed on the Right, and was waited on by two Chamberlains. The King of Sweden being seated next him on his Left. The rest of the Table was filled by Count Pflug, Grand-Marshal of Saxony, who sate next to-King Augustus; by Count Piper, who sate by the Side of the King of Sweden; by Velt-Marshal Rheinschild, Count Poss; President Imbost; President Welling; and General Stromberg.

After Supper, which lasted not long, the King of Sweden conducted King. Augustus to his Bed Chamber, where after a short Conversation, the King of Sweden retired to another Apartment at the Top of the House, to repose himself; himself; twelve Drabans, during this Time, remained on the Guard before the Apartment of King Augustus.

On the next Day, the two Kings remained together till noon, when King Augustus returned to Leipsic, having sirst given the necessary Orders for the Enlargement of the Princes Sobieski. The King of Sweden, on this Account, sent Major-General Meyerfeld and Secretary Cederbeilm to Dresden, who were to receive these two Princes, first settling and reducing into Writing the Demands of King Augustus on the Princes, and those of the Princes on him.

As King Augustus had given Orders to restore the Trophies taken from the Swedes during the War, they were delivered in Pursuance of the Treaty, to General Meyerfeld; they consisted of three Standards, and two Pair of Kettle-drums.

The 11th of December, in the Forenoon, the King of Sweden paid a Visit to King Augustus at Leipsic. Two Days after which King Augustus came to Alt-Ranstadt, and returned the same Day to Leipsic, whence he departed the next Day to Dresden, where he fpent some Weeks.

These frequent Visits much augmented the Hopes which had been conceived of a perfect Union between these two Monarchs, who were also near Relations, being Cousin Germans. A Medal was struck on this Occasion, which represented on one side the Gods Mars and Hercules, whereof the former was made to resemble the King of Sweden, the latter King Augustus, taking each other by the Hand, in Confirmation of their Friendship, and trampling Discord under their Feet, with these Words of Virgil, Æ. XII.

On the Exergue were written these Words:

They struck another very beautiful Medal at Stockbolm, of which that famous and learned Antiquary, Affessor Keder was the inventor, and that great Medalist Carlsten the Maker. It represented on one Side the King of Sweden, with these words, Carolus XII. D. G. Ren Succiæ: On the other was a Palm-tree, on which was hung a Buckler; at the Foot of the Tree were Trophies of Arms, and round this Device these Words, Nexum Fecere Triumphi. Triumphs made the Union. one Line under the Palm-Tree were the following Words, Arma posta in Pago Alt-Ransfadt: They laid down tbeir their Arms in the Village of Alt-Ranstadt, Sept. 14. 1706.

On the 17th, the King mounted his Horse, attended by some Officers, and accompanied by the Prince of Wurtenberg, who was returned from a Visit he had paid to his Mother at Stutgardt, in the Company of Major-General Cruus. His Majesty's Design was to proceed to meet King Stanislaus, who was coming by the Road of Leisnitz to Alt Ranstadt, with the Princes Sabieski, who were now released.

The King of Sweden had not gone more than half a League when he met the King of Poland and his Train, who prefently alighted from their Coaches and mounted on Horseback. At Noon, they arrived at Alt-Ranstadt, where the two Princes Sobieski repeated their Thanks to his Swedish Majesty, on having procured them their Liberty, on which they were complimented by the Swedish Generals, the Court, and other Persons of Distinction.

At the Table King Stanislaus was placed at the upper End, on the right of the King of Sweden, having on his other Side the two Princes James and Constantine Sobieski, and next to them Count Jablenowski Palatine of Russia and Lemberg, Count Sapieba, Marshal of Lithuania, and Count Sapieba, Pifart of Lithuania. On the King of Sweden's Side, fate the third Prince of Poland, Alexander Sobieski, the Prince of Wurtenberg, Count Sapieba, Grand-Treasurer of Lithuania, and Count Welling, General and Counsellor of the King. About Evening King Stanislaus returned to Leisnik with his Train.

In the Beginning of the Year 1707. an Act of the King of Sweden's appeared to increase greatly the good Intelligence and Friendship which reigned between the King of Sweden and K. Augustus. This was his Swedish Majesty's Remission, (on the humble and reiterated Remonstrances of Saxony) some part of the Contributions which they had at first raised. Insomuch, that for the Months of January and February 1707, they demanded but three Gros, for March and April two Gros, and for the Month of May one only of each... for all but one Million nine hundred thousand Crowns payable at several Times.

The Estates, after having reflected on the Means of enabling themselves to levy this Sum, concluded at last to negotiate some Part on the Credit of the Country. In Consequence whereof they sent Deputies to Holland; but, unhappily for them, King Augustus ordered them at the same Time to negotiate also asum of one Million sive hundred thousand Crowns for himself; on which so many Difficulties were made in Holland, that the Busness was there at a stand, and they would not advance the Money in any Manner.

When this News came to Alt-Ranfadt, his Majesty resolved to maintain his first Resolution, and to levy the Contributions by his Troops. On which subject Orders were sent to the Commanders and Colonels of the Regiments, so that the Contributions moderated by his Majesty were uniformly regulated.

King Augustus seeing now the Fault which he had committed, set all his Engines at Work to procure the Direction of the Levy of the Imposts for this year 1707, But this Project succeeded not: for his swedish Majesty would would have the Money pass through few Hands, and those of his own Troops.

The Saxons then saw but too clearly the sensible Difference between the Payment of what the Swedes had at sirst demanded of the Estates assemblas at Leipsic, at the first Entrance of the King, and exposing themselves to the Choice of the Soldiers of what they liked best.

The City of Leipsic reaped confiderable Advantage from the neighbourhood of the King of Sweden's Court. Being not only full of foreign Ministers, who lived in a most sumptuous and expensive Manner, but likewise a great Number of Princes of the Empire, who came thither successively to make their Court.

On the new Year, the Duke of Saxe-Gotha, and all the Princes of the House of Saxony, came to pay their Compliments to his Majesty at Alt. Radstadt. There were likewise Duke Christian Augustus; Governor of Holstein-Gottorp, the Margrave of Anspach, the Landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, the Landgrave of Helle Homburg, the two Princes of Mecklenburg, the Hereditary Prince of Woolffenbuttle, two Princes of Bevern, and many other Nobles, who being there with their Families, joined to a large Number of Ladies, who were, by his Majesty's Permission, arrived from Sweden, to see their Husbands, made the Assemblies extremely agreeable and brilliant.

Some Polish Lords likewise arrived, who had been the most obstinate in refusing to recognize King Stanislaus. In which Number were reckoned the Bishop of Warmia, General Brand, and some others.

As the King of Sweden defired that all the World might have a free Access to fee him at Dinner, Alt-Ranftadt was every Day filled with an infinite Number of People, and the Hall where the King dined was often so crowded, that the Pages and Domesticks found it difficult to wait at Table; the Spectators, for want of Room, were forced to stand upon Chairs and Windows, to get a Sight of the King; and this continued during his whole Abode in Saxony.

King Augustus had published the Peace with a Thanksgiving to God, on the first Day of the Year, in all the Churches of Saxony. The King of Sweden had also caused the same to be done in his Kingdom. As several Pamphlets were wrote at this time in Poland, with an Appearance of being published by the Order of King Augustus, raising Doubts concerning the Peace, this Prince disavowed them publickly at Leipsic, by a Paper which was Printed and dispersed every where.

The King of Sweden went a Staghunting the same Day with King Augustus, but spent only a few Hours in that Exercise. These two Princes vifited each other often, and there appeared a perfect Harmony between them. As to King Stanislaus, he had bad no Interview with King Augustus. They met only one Day at Leipsic, and King Augustus Horse making a false Step at the Moment they came up to each other, this Prince whipping his Horfe, past swiftly by King Staniflaur; faluting him with his Hat, who, on his Side, very politely returned the Salute.

Whilst these Phings patt, the Swe-

difb Officers were very bufy in recruiting their Regiments, and remounting their Cavalry.

The national Swedish Regiments received their Recruits from Sweden, and the new Regiments of Dragoons raised in Prussia, as we have noted before, 1704, made their Levies in divers Places, especially at Breslaw, and the other Towns of Silesia, with such extraordinary Success, that they were compleat in a short time, the young Fellows quitting in Throngs their Father's Houses to enter into the Service of the King of Sweden, so that our Officers had nothing to do more than to

Colonel Gertz having had Orders in Ozeber last Year, to raise a Regiment of Dragoons, he raised one consisting of three thousand Men, all well made, well mounted, and well drest. These, after the Death of their Colonel, were divided into three Regiments, as we shall see hereafter. The Queen of Poland, King Augufus's Consort, returned from Bareith to Leipsic the 25th of January. Three Days afterwards, the Prince Electoral arrived there also, on which Day the King of Sweden entered into Leipfic with King Augustus, who had been with him at Alt-Ranftadt, and made a short Visit to the Queen of Poland. The 31st, the Prince Electoral came to Alt Ranstadt to make his Court to the King, who received him with much Grace and Distinction. young Prince fet out thence for Lichtenburg, where her Royal-Highness the Electress his Grandmother was arrived from Holftein.

All these fine Hopes of Friendship and Confidence on all Sides were on the very Point of vanishing, by an unforeseen Accident, which had like to have caused a new Rupture.

King Augustus had invited the King of Sweden to a grand Hunting of wild Boars and Stags, which was to be, Feb. 7, 1707, at Liebenwerda. Majesty promised to come thither. The Prince of Wurtenberg was already there with several Swedish Generals and other Courtiers and Officers of Distinction. But the King of Sweden, at the end of three Days, during which he had paid a Visit to the Electoress his Aunt, the Mother of King Augustus, at her Castle of Lichtenburg, where he held a Conversation of three Hours together with her after Dinner, changed his Mind all of a sudden, on some certain private Whispers which came to his Ear, and seemed not ill-grounded, and fent an Excuse to King Augustus, who had expected him with Impatience, by Major General Lagercrona, desiring him to begin the Hunting without waiting for him.

These Whispers perhaps had not prevented the King of Sweden's going to Liebenwerda, if at the fame Time they had not shewn him certain Letters, which had been intercepted in Poland, and by which he faw with Astonishment the original Orders of the Court of Saxony to their Partisan Smigelski, to secure the Palatine of Kiovia, made Prisoner at the Battle of Kalis, and who was fet at Liberty by the Treaty of Peace at Alt-Ranstadt. He was likewise ordered to engage the Poles, to publish an Interregnum, to proceed to a new Election, with Assurances that whoever was elected should be supported.

There were likewise Letters to the U u Czar,

Czar, to his Ministers, and to the Grandees of Poland, by which it was plain, that King Angustus intended to amuse the King of Sweden in Saxony, till an Opportunity presented itself to break the Peace, and to shake off the Yoke of the Swedes by the Assistance of the Russians.

The Discovery of all these Intrigues joined to the above mentioned slying Reports of a Plot formed against the Person of the King of Sweden, put a Stop to the Journey of this Prince to Liebenwerda; and as certain Instructions intercepted in Saxony contrary to the Tenor of the Peace were to be produced, the King of Sweden's Friendship must of Necessity cool, and so much the more, as King Augustus deferred every Day to sulfil the rest of the Points stipulated by the Treaty of Peace.

The Court of Saxony endeavoured to excuse this last Article, as well as it was able; but the King of Sweden irritated with these affected Delays, together with the late Discoveries, resolved at once to put an End to the Affair.

Secretary Cederbielm, who had continued all this Time at Leipsic to press the Ministers of Saxony to an entire Execution of the Articles of the Peace, and who could obtain nothing by all his Instances, was made choice of to mention the Matter to King Augustus himself. He set out for Dresden with Orders to propose to this Prince to issue a solemn Proclamation for the Suppression of all Writings which had been published since a certain Time, and were in Opposition to the Peace. He was likewise charged to demand an Accomplishment of all those Articles which had not been yet executed, and to declare at the same Time that his Majesty was only zealous to put an End to this Affair for the Sake of Saxony, which he could not quit before these Matters were entirely concluded.

Cederbielm, at his Arrival at Drefden, found King Augustus and all the Court on the Point of departing for the grand hunting at Liebenwerda, so that he could get nothing determined. He received Orders, however, to attend this Prince, who gave him in the mean while the Draught of an Instrument for the Suppression of the Writings in Question signed by himself, reserving the rest till the End of the Hunting, which was very sine, a hundred and ninety-nine wild Boars, and more than sive hundred Stags being killed.

What retarded most the entire Execution of the Treaty of Peace was the Article of Paikul, whom King Augustus had great Reluctance to deliver up to the Swedes, seeing that this Prince had promised the Czar, to whom Patkul was General and Minister in full Power at his Court, never to agree to This very Point produced so many Difficulties, that though Cederbielm followed the Court from Liebenwerda to Torgau, where the Queen of Poland then was, to press this Affair, he could not, however, possibly obtain a final Answer, and was obliged to return with nothing concluded on a his Swedilb Majesty dispatched him instantly to Dresden, giving him Orders not to come back till every Thing was fettled...

Cederbielm found, on his Arrival, the whole Court in a terrible Alarm; the King of Sweden's failing his Appointment pointment at the Hunting caused very serious Resections, as he was the most religious Observer of his Promise; several Accounts likewise arrived one after another, which gave Reasons to apprehend some Resentment in the King of Sweden, perhaps an open Rupture from the Jealousies which might have grown in that Court on several Proceedings, as liable to Suspicion as those of the Court of Saxony; what increased these Fears was, that they were entirely ignorant of the true Sentiments of the King of Sweden on these Matters.

These Anxieties, however, were soon dissipated, and after some Eclair cisements on each Side, all seemed to be forgotten, without the least Spark of Resentment remaining, as soon as King Augustus had declared that he would punctually execute all the Articles of the Treaty.

The Article purporting the Surrender of the Jewels and other Ornaments, and Enligns of Royalty to King Stanislaus, was, next to that of Patkul, one of the most disagreeable to King Augustus. What retarded the Execution of this was, that the King of Sweden adhered strictly to the Letter of the Treaty, that all these should be delivered to King Stanislaus himself, which King Augustus absolutely declined, desiring to deliver them into the Possession of his Swedish Majesty. This Affair was at last determined to the Satisfaction of King Augustus, and the Jewels were placed in the Hands of the King of Sweden.

Another Article, which stuck much with King Augustus, was that by which he was to be despoiled of the Arms and Title of the King of Poland;

though he might, during his Life, retain the Name and Honours of a King. Many Representations were obliged to be made to him, before he could be brought to this; for long after the Exchange of the Ratifications, he was continued to be prayed for in Churches without any Change in the Forms, being there always called King of Poland; the same Title still remained on his Arms and his Coin. However, this Article had the Fate of the others, and this Prince at last gave up the Title of King of Poland.

One Thing gave the Swedes fome Trouble, which was, that no Printer in Saxony would print the Instrument of the Peace. This gave a Suspicion of a secret Order from the Court of Dresden. Our Dragoons soon removed this Difficulty, and set the Press a going in the finest manner in the World.

All these Circumstances, which were perplexing enough, occasioned a longer Stay of the Army in Saxony than was intended; for his Swedish Majesty, without obtaining an effectual Execution of the Treaty of Peace, resolved by no Means to quit those glorious Advantages which his Arms and his Valour had procured him, after so many Battles and Victories, and the Loss of so much Blood.

Patkul was taken the 28th of March out of the Fortress of Konigstein, and being delivered to a Swedish Detachment, was strongly guarded to the Army.

The next Day, King Augustus recognized King Stanislaus by the following Letter which he writ to him.

SIR, my Brother,

WE did not answer sooner that Letter which we had the Honour to receive from your Majesty, because we thought there was no Necessity of our entering into a particular Correspondence of this Kind. Nevertheless, to please bis Swedish Mojesty, and that it may not be - imputed to us that we make a Difficulty of complying with his Demands, we congratulate your Majesty by these Presents on your coming to the Crown, and we wish at the same Time that you may find in this Country more faithful and more obedient Subjects than those whom we bave quitted. All the World will do us the Justice to own, that all our Kindnesses, all our indefatigable Cares bave been repaid only with Ingratitude, and that the greatest part of them made it their whole Business to form Parties against us to our Ruin.

Recommending your Majesty to the divine Protestion, we wish you may not be exposed to a like Reverse of For-

Given at Dresden this 29th of March, 1707.

Sir, my Brother,

Your good Brother and Neighbour, Augustus R.

The Direction was to bis Majesty the K. of Poland.

King Stanistaus answered this Letter a Month afterwards by a Letter somewhat longer, containing in Substance, that the Correspondence of his Majesty was a new Obligation that he had to the King of Sweden; that he was sensible of the Compliments which he made him on his coming to the Crown; and that he hoped his Subjects would have no Occasion to fail in their Featty, since he should observe the Laws of the Kingdom.

This Prince had already been acknowledged in the Month of February by the King of Prussia, who was also recognized in the same Quality by King Stanislaus. As the King of Sweden always kept up a firm Union with the Houses of Lunenbourgh, his Majefly engaged King Stanislaus to write a Letter to the Elector of Hanover, and to the Duke of Woolfenbottle, to notify his Accession to the Crown. These Princes by their Answers acknowledged him to be King of Poland: As did the King of France, who fent an Officer of his Swifs Guards into Saxony, to compliment him thereon.

Thus the King of Sweden obtained his Purpole, and put an happy Issue to an Affair, the Success whereof had appeared impossible to the whole World. No Person being able to imagine seven Years before, when three Enemies drew their Swords against him at once, that he would bring the Business to so glorious a Conclusion; and that one of his Enemies, a Prince otherwise rich and powerful, should be obliged to resign his Crown to one whom the King of Sweden should chuse to fill his Place.

All the Differences being thus adjusted, by the sull Execution of all Points of the Treaty, a new Incident retarded the Departure of the King of Sweden from Saxony, and had perhaps caused an open Rupture between him and the Emperor, if they had not found Means to remedy it in good time.

Baron

Baron Stralenbeim, Envoy from Sweden to Vienna, being at an Entertainment at one of the Emperor's Ministers with Count Zobor, an Hungarian, and Chamberlain of the Emperor, a petulant little Man, and Sonin-law of the rich Prince of Lichtenfein, this Count took upon him to utter some Words not very respectful, which glanced at the King of Sweden, in comparing him to two others, who, he said, troubled Europe, Stanislaus and Ragosski, and he would not name the third.

Upon this very high Words arose between Baron Stralenbeim and the Count, tending towards a Challenge, Baron Stralenbeim held forth his Hand to the Count to accept the Challenge, on which the Count who sate opposite to him gave him a great Blow, after which the Company prevented them from any farther Violence.

The Baron complained against the Count of Zobor, and demanded a Publick Satisfaction for the Affront offered to the King his Master. The Emperor, to appeale him, ordered the Count to be arrested, and a Process exhibited against him.

This did not satisfy the King of Sweden, to whom Stralenbeim repaired immediately, without taking his Leave of the Court of Vienna. To augment the ill-blood which this might occasion, he met in Bobenia, in his Way to Saxony, Parties of twenty and thirty Muscovites, who belonged to that body of fifteen hundred Men, who fled from Saxony into the Empire, and whom the King of Sweden had some Time since demanded at Vienna-to be delivered to him, and concerning which that Court had affected much Slowness in its Answer. To know in Reality if these Men had escaped with the Connivance of the Imperial Court, Stralenbeim ordered his Servants to tell the Muscovite Officers, that he was the Count of Wakerbath, a Saxon, a Fiction which made them avow the Truth, but very much irritated the King of Sweden, as soon as the Baron had reported it to him.

Befides all this, there had been a Quarrel at Breslaw, where some Insults had been used to the Swedes who were recruiting there, and in which a Corporal was killed.

The Imperial Court alarmed at the sudden Departure of the Swedish Minister, and the other Circumstances, dispatched an Express to Count Zinzendorff, with a Letter from Count Wratislau to Count Piper, by which Count Wratislau signified, that if he might be permitted to approach the King of Sweden, the Emperor, his Master, had fixed on him to testify the Dispositions of his Imperial Majesty, to preserve continually a good Understanding with his Majesty of Sweden, and to give him all possible Satisfaction on those Causes of Displeafure which he might imagine himself to have against the Emperor.

The Count de Zinzendorff was ordered at the same Time, to acknowledge King Stanislaus under three principal Conditions:

1. That King Stanislaus should engage to maintain inviolably all the antient Treaties concluded between the House of Austria, and his Predecessors the Kings of Poland.

2. That he should not intermeddle directly nor indirectly with the War in Hungary.

3. That

3. That he should guaranty the Emperor from all Damages' which he might suffer on the Part of the Musco-vites.

These three Points being conceded a short time afterwards, King Stanislaus was recognized in form by the Emperor.

The King of Sweden infifted too strongly in the Conferences between Count Piper and the Count de Zinzendorff, on the Article of the sisteen hundred Muscovites, and the re-establishment of the Grievances in Religion in Silesia, where he claimed a Restitution of the Lutheran Churches, which had been seized since the Peace of Westphalia, whereof his Majesty was Guarantee by Right of Succession, as King of Sweden.

It was then proposed to the Imperial Minister, to remit that Quota of the Subsidies which Sweden was either to pay into the Cheft of the Empire in Money, or to supply an Equivalent in Troops for the Army of the Germanick Body, in Consideration of the heavy War in which Sweden had been engaged. The Limitation of the right of Primogeniture in Holftein, and the Confirmation of the Bishoprick of Eutin to the Descendant of the younger Branch of Gottorp, made another Point. The Delivery of the Count de Zobor, and of the Officers of Breflau, which his Majesty demanded as a Preliminary. was likewise an Article absolutely necessary to the Admission of Count Wratillau. Count Piper writ some Days afterwards a Letter to Count Zinzendorff, transmitting to him at the same Time the King's Declaration touching the Muscovite Troops. We shall see hereafter, what Measures the Imperial Court took to lay that Storm which was ready to burst on its Head.

In this Month of April, 1707, an Envoy from France appeared all of a fudden in Saxony, this was the Baron Bossenwald, who had passed thro' the Empire under the Disguise of a Merchant, and arrived safely at Leipsic. where he presently appeared with an eclat, though this gave a Subject for Murmurs at Ratiforn to the Allies. whose Distrust was encreased by a Bavarian Minister's presenting himself at the same Time in Saxony. But the Arrival of the Duke of Marll orough at the King's Quarters, and the Affurances which he carried back, foon removed all Jealousies conceived of the King of Sweden.

The Duke of Marlborough landed, from England in Holland the 5th of April, and presently set out for Saxony, to assure himself precisely of the King of Sweden's Intentions.

He arrived the 17th of the same Month at Hall, where Mr. Robinson the English Minister, with the Imperial and Dutch Envoys, came to meet him. While he was on the Road from this Town to the King of Sweden's Quarters, he was informed that his Majesty would not give him an Audience till the next Day. This News prevailed with my Lord Dake to repair directly to the Quarters of Count Piper, who affured him on the Part of his Majesty, how agreeable his Arrival would be to him. The Audience was fixed for the next Day at eleven, being the 4th Day of Easter, as foon as his Majesty came from Church.

The Duke went from Count Piper to Kolfebau, a little Village which they had prepared for his Quarters, and which was but a short Quarter of a League from those of the King. In the Morning, he arrived at the appointed Hour at Alt Ranstadt, where he was received by Mr. Duben Comptroller of the Court, and other Officers. Count Piper received him in an Antichamber, and conducted him to the King's Apartment, where he found his Majesty in the midst of divers Princes, Senators, Generals, Gentlemen and Officers.

The Duke made a short Compliment to his Majesty in English, which was interpreted in the Swedish Language by Mr. Robinson, who spoke that Tongue in great Perfection. The Substance of it follows:

I bave the Honour to present your Majesty a Letter from ber Majesty the Queen of Great-Britain, my most gracious Mistress; not from ber Secretaries, but written with ber own Hand and Heart. She would have a most singular Pleasure in seeing your Majesty, as a Prince who is the Admiration of all Europe, if so long a Voyage bad been proper for ber Sex. However, I esteem my felf bappy, to bave the Honour of affuring your Majesty of my Respects, and should account it my great good Fortune, that my Affairs would permit me to learn, under the command of so great a General as your Majesty, such Particulars of the Art of War as I am at prelent ignorant of.

Count Piper answered in the Name of the King of Sweden in the following manner, which Mr. Robinson interpreted in English.

The Letters of the Queen of Great-Britain and your Person are very agreeable to me, and I shall always shew the greatest Regard to the Mediation of her Britannick Majesty, and the Interest of the Grand Alliance. It is against my Will that I have been constrained to give the least Umbrage to any of its Members, but your Excellence must perceive that I bad just Reasons for my March bither, with my Troops. On the other Side, you may assure the Queen my Sister, that my Design is to leave this Country as soon as I have received the Satisfaction I bave demanded, but not before. Nevertbeless, I shall do nothing against the common Cause in general, or the Protestant Religion in particular.

The Duke afterwards spoke in French, which his Majesty understood though he did not speak it, answering always im Swedish, which Mr. Robinfon interpreted to the Duke. The Conversation was afterwards general during an Hour. After which his Majesty went into the Hall to Dinner, ther the Duke followed him with the other Generals and Ministers. Duke was placed on the right of the King, Count Piper being on his left. There was no Conversation at the Table; only the Duke discoursed with Count Welling, who fate by him, to whom he spoke French, but in a very low Voice.

After Dinner, which lasted a little longer than ordinary, and during which Advice came that King Augustus was on his Return from Dresden to Leipsic, the Duke returned with the King to the Chamber of Audience, where most of the rest of the Company soon retired.

Tho

The Dake then spoke amply on the Subject of his Commission, the Tendency of which was, to assure himself of the true Intentions of the King of Sweden with Regard to the Affairs of Europe. His Majesty listened with much Satisfaction and Attention, so did Count Piper and Secretary Hermelin, who were present. Count Piper answered on the Part of the King. This Conversation turned on the War in Brabant, the Bittles of Hochstedt and Schellenberg, and other Matters concerning the War.

The King enlarged much on all these Matters, and discovered so deep a Knowledge in the Art-Military as furprized the Duke.

This Conversation lasted near two Hours, till the twelve Trumpets sounded the third Time, being the Signal for Vespers. The Duke then less the King, who went to Church, while the Duke visited the Countess Piper, and had afterwards a long Conference with the Count. He went afterwards to Wistersdorff, to wait on the Countess of Rheinschild, Wise of the Vest-Marshal, from whence he returned to his Quarters.

The next Day the King of Sweden came early to Leipfic, to visit King Augustus in the Garden of Apel. These two Monarchs talked together near two Hours in a very friendly Manner, which finally removed all Suspicions of a Misunderstanding, which had reigned ever since the hunting Party above mentioned. After this Interview the King of Sweden returned to Alt-Ranstadt.

In this Interval, my Lord Duke went to the Garden of Jocher, whence he paid his Respects to King Augustus, immediately on the Departure of the King of Sweden, and had a Conversation of half an Hour with that Prince. He returned from thence to Guntersdorff, where he dined at Count Piper's with Count Zinzendorff, Mr. Robinson, Count Pfug, and the Baron Goertz. After Dinner, the Duke, Count Piper, Mess. Robinson and Goertz, had a long Conference on the Affairs of Holstein. In the Evening, the Duke supped with Velt-Marshal Robinschild.

The next Day King Augustus, accompanied by Count Pflug, Velt-Marshal Ogilvi, General Robel, General Wakerbarth, the great Falconer Count Vitzthum and Count Lognasco, repaired to Alt Ranstadt. The two Kings remained alone together in the Closet till Dinner, at which King Augustus took the Right, as usual, having next him the Prince of Mecklembourg; none of the Swedish Generals, save Count Rheinschild, were present.

Their Repast being over, which lasted but one Hour, King Augustus returned to the King of Sweden's Closet, where the two Princes discoursed for some Time, and then the former returded to Leipsic, the King of Sweden, with Count Rheinschild and other Persons belonging to the Court, accompanying him half way.

At the King of Sweden's Return, the Duke of Marlborough, who had in the Morning received the Vifits of the Counts Piper, Rheinschild, and others, and had afterwards dined with the Baron de Goeriz, came to take his Audience of Leave of his Majesty. During which, it was told the King that King Stanislaus, with Count Sapieba, Marshal of Lithuania, were in the antichamber. The Duke said, that he had nothing nothing to communicate to that Prince, fince the Queen his Mistress had already complimented him by Mr. Robinfon. His Majesty then went to receive King Stanislaus, and conducted him into his Chamber, between whom and the Duke many Civilities past.

The Duke having taken Leave of his Swedish Majesty, departed for Leipsic, and thence, without stopping, continued his Journey towards Berlin, which the King of Prussia invited him to take in his Way by a Letter under his own hand. He returned to the Hague the first of May, where he declared openly how much he was satisfied with his Journey to Alt-Ranstadt, and with the Person of the King of Sweden, of whom he always spoke with great Commendation.

April 21. King Augustus with his Train set out from Leipsic for Dresden, thereby putting an End to all the Conferences which he had had with his Swedish Majesty, touching the Peace.

Some Days afterwards a Report caused great Amazementat the Head quarters at Alt-Ranstadt. This was the arresting the Plenipotentiaries Imboff and Pfingsten in their Houses at Dresden. and very shortly conducting them to the Fortress of Konigstein. The Ministers of King Augustus pretended, that they were very justly seized for not having faithfully followed their Instructions; that they had exceeded their full Powers, and concealed fome Articles from King Augustus, on a vain Expectation that they might prevail with the King of Swelten to soften the Rigour of them.

Be that as it will, this Step plainly demonstrated the Intention of King Augustus, who, by this Publick Disapprobation of the Peace he had just concluded, shewed that he intended to break it on the first Reverse of Fortune that should befal the King of Sweden, and the first Opportunity which should present itself of breaking it with Safety.

This, however, gave little Pain at Alt-Ranstadt; and as soon as the Queen of Poland, Wife of King Stanislaus, and Madam-Royal the King's Mother had left Leisniz, his Swedish Majesty began to visit his Troops in their different Quarters. The Drabans were first reviewed, and all those who saw them, averred, that they had never seen Troops so sine and so warlike at the same Time.

The King went next to Voightland, to see the Regiment of Ofrogoths, who were quartered in and about Plauen. King Augustus was present at this Review, as he was at that of many other Regiments, together with Monfeigneur the Duke Governor of Holstein, and Prince Wurtenberg, who always attended on the King.

The Regiments were all found in excellent Condition, it being impossible to add to the Beauty of the Men and of the Horses, any more than to the Uniformity as well as Adroitness of the military Exercises and Evolutions. The King satigued himself so much on these Occasions, that one Day, during the Review of a Regiment of Cavalry, he killed two Horses, who both fell stiff under him. The same happened also to Prince Wurtenberg, who always kept up close to the King.

But it is now Time to return into Poland, and take a View of the Motions of the Czar, and a new Party which had formed itself during the Stay of the King of Sweden, and King Stanislaus in Saxony.

The Czar was violently irritated at the first Report of King Augustus's being retired into Saxony, and his folemn Abdication of the Crown of Poland by a Peace with the King of Sweden. The Articles of the Delivery up of Patkul enraged him above all the rest, and he fent forth his Complaints into all the Courts where he had any Commerce. Matucof, his Ambassador at the Hague, ient the Duke of Marlborough a Letter from his Master to the Queen of England, filled with Invectives against King Augustus. The Ambassadors sent at the same Time to the Duke, and fome Days afterwards to the States, a Memorial of the 4th of January, O. S. containing great Bitterness, and insisting that the State should not recognize King Stanislaus. But whilst the Czar was busied in fruitless Endeavours in foreign Courts, to hinder their recognizing the new King of Poland, which only tended to illustrate the Power of the King of Sweden, whom they durst not offend; he was not remis, at the fame Time, in providing by all the Measu es which Prudence could dictate, for the warm Reception of the Swedes, against whom he was shortly to stand alone.

His Army, in the Beginning of the Year 1707, confifted in Poland of thirty thousand Foot, and as many Dragoons, exclusive of the Troops in Livonia and Courland, and thirty Regiments which were expected from Ingria and the neighbourhood of Moscow. This Prince entring Poland at the Head of so considerable an Army, saw himself in the same Condition of giving Lawthere, as the King of Sweden had been before him.

We have said before that there were two Primates in Poland; one named Szembeck, formerly Bishop of Cujavia, of the Nemination of King Augustus, whom he had crowned; the other nominated by King Stanislaus; whose Name was Dzielinski, who had before been Archbishop of Leopold.

The first, searing that if Stanislaus remained on the Throne, he should be compelled to give up his Dignity to his Competitor, implored the Protection of the Czar. At the same Time he put himself at the Head of those who had stood firm to King Augustus's Party, and would not acknowledge Stanislaus, thinking to proceed to a new Election. They obtained a Promise of Prince Menzikoss, that the Czar would not abandon them, but would assist them with the same Subsidies, and the same auxiliary Troops which he had before furnished.

This Primate wrote to Ratifon, to intreat the States of the Empire, to recognize no other for King of Poland but him, whom the unanimous Confent of all the Republick should elect. He then published circular Letters to convoke a general Diet of the Senators and Deputies of the Nobility at Leopold, Jan. 27. to deliberate on the present Situation of Affairs, and the most conducive Methods to proceed to the Election of a new King.

Whilst the Czar was drawing toward Leopold, to give more Weight to the Diet which was to be there held, he lost Smigelski, formerly a strenuous Partizan of King Augustus. This Officer, who had in his Custody the Palatine of Kiovia, and the Count de Tarlo, taken Prisoners at Kalis, being piqued at some Haughtiness in the Behaviour of Prince Menzikof towards him, abandoned the Russians, and setting his Prisoners at Liberty, went into Saxony and acknowledged King Stanislaus, carrying with him a hundred and fifty Russians whom he took from Prziemille.

The Czar arrived at Zolkiew at the Quarters of Prince Menzikof, where many Polish Grandees, especially those Dignitaries who held their Employments of King Augustus, and could not hope to keep them if they submitted to King Stanislaus, came to make their Court to the new Protector, before they went to Leopold. They agreed instantly to furnish this Prince with one hundred and forty thousand Pounds of Bread a Day for his Men, who amounted to seventy thousand.

The better to intimidate the Friends of Stanislaus, the Czar detached the Generals Ronn and Heinsk with a flying Party of Dragoons, the first on the Side of Prussia, and the second of Grand Poland; these proceeded with Fire and Sword, not sparing one of those who sided with the new King.

The great Council of Leopold opened, Jan. 28. and was adjourned to the first of February. It was composed of the Primare Szembech, and of many Senators, Bishops, Palatines, Castela lans, and Dignitaries of the Kingdom, of King Augustus's Appointment, of which Number were General Siniawski. and Prince Wisnipwski.

To this Assembly the Czar sent the Knez Dolgorucki in Quality of his Ambassador. It was debated under what Form they should proceed, and they at length agreed to entitle their Council, the Sequel of the Confederacy of Sendomir, to which Council they would make the necessary Additions on the present State of Affairs. They then put this Question, If they had a King or no? which was carried in the Negative, after they had examined into the Flight of King Augustus, his Treaty with the King of Sweden, and his Abdication of the Throne. A Motion. was then made to declare the Throne vacant, and they resolved to assemble a Diet at Lublin for the Month of May, after they had affembled the Members in the Palatinates. In the mean time it was resolved to exhort those who had taken, the contrary Party, to be prefent, that they might concur in the common Defence. Lastly, it was agreed that the Primate should dispatch Letters to inform foreign Powers of the Rights and Liberties of Poland, and to defire them to recognize no Perfon as King of that Kingdom, unless he be elected and recognized by the free Suffrages of all the Orders of the Republick.

The Czar promised the Members of this Assembly, by his Letters to Siniawki, that he would never abandon them, by making a separate Treaty with the Swedes. He repaired some Days afterwards to Leopold, where he arrived the 9th of February, followed by the Czarowitz his Son, Menzikof, and other-Ministers. In the End he affifted himself at the Debates, using all his Efforts to quicken them to the Election of a new King.

Whilst these Things were in Agitation, a Mufcovite Party commanded by General Ronn surprized Dzielinski, Primate by the Nomination of King Stanissaus, and Archbishop of Gneine, who had wandered for some time in X x 2

the Habit of a Peasant, with a Design to escape in that manner into Saxony. He was very severely dealt with, and the opposite Primate took great Pains with the Bishops assembled at Leopold, to get him delivered as an Ecclesiastick. The Czar, without any Regard to their Sollicitations, caused him to be carried Prisoner to Kiow, where he was kept in a very vile Prison.

The Debates at Leopold being ended, after many Conferences between the Senators themselves, and between the Czar and his Ministers, it was resolved that as foon as they should have settled the Foundations of a strict Alliance with his Czarish Majesty, and have taken the necessary Measures to maintain the general Confederacy of · Sendomir, they should endeavour to obtain of that Prince a Remission of the Ukrain to the Republick. confirmed at the same Time, the Commissaries who had been named by the great Council, to receive this Restitution; as likewise those who had been chosen for the Observators of military Discipline in Conjunction with the Deputies of his Czarish Majesty.

This Resolution was accompanied with two Declarations or authentick Promises, that the Czar and the Confederates would mutually confide in each other, that neither Party would separate their common Interests. These Declarations were signed on each Part, March 20. by the Czar on the one Side only, and by eighteen Senators on the other, at the Head of which was the Primate Stanislaus Szembek, and the great General Siniawski.

The Czar then returned to Zolkiew; and as the Poles feared that this Prince would propose his Son to the Diet of Lublin, to be elected to the Crown of Poland, as it was then generally credited, he fent him back to Molcow. After which he paid eight hundred thoufand Florins to the Polish and Lithuanian Troops, according to his Agreement at Leopol.

King Stanislaus, attentive to all the Motions of the Primate, faw with Grief, that the Troubles, far from being brought to an End in Poland, were now renewing with the utmost Violence, by that headlong and giddy Spirit which so apparently ruled in this factious Assembly at Leopol.

This Prince having already issued his Proclamations through Poland in the Beginning of the Year, published a new Memorial at this Time, by which he represented to all the Orders of the Republick, the Concern which he telt at the insolent and vile Behaviour of this Affembly, who would precipitate themselves into the last of Misfortunes, by their obstinate Adherence to the Czar of Muscour, who was laying waste the Kingdom, and endeavouring to difunite the Members, in order to gain an Advantage in the War which he intended against the King of Sweden, with whom the Treaty of Peace had been happily concluded in Saxony, and signed at Alt-Ranstadt; in Consequence of which, Tranquility had been re-established by King Augustus's Renunciation of the Crown. and that absolute Cession which had been made in Favour of King Stanisla-That his Majesty would repair to Warsovia, and would endeavour to restore quiet in the Kingdom. In the mean Time, he exhorted them all, as well Nobility as the Soldiery and others, to concur with him in this good Delign,

Design, and to unite themselves in Defence of his Person against the Enemy: that he declared all such who adhered to the Council of Leopol to be Traitors to their Country, and as such would pursue them with Fire and Sword on his victorious neturn into Poland, when he should be supported with the glorious Arms of the King of Sweden, that he would confiscate all their Goods to the Crown, and instict the most dreadful Punishments on their Persons.

Poland was at this Time every Day the Theatre of the most tragick Scenes. Provinces depopulated, Towns reduced into Ashes, the Inhabitants oppressed, trampled on, and driven from their Houses, sometimes by one Party, sometimes by the other, presented every where the most horrible and most hideous Spectacles.

The Czar caused his Troops to make feveral Motions, not only for the more easy procuring their Subsistence, but to form imperceptibly a Body of the Army round Lublin, to cover the Diet which was affembling. On the other Part, the Body of Swedes which were in Lower Poland, composed of those Regiments under Mardefeld, who had obtained their Liberty by the Treaty of Alt-Ranstadt, and were now compleatly recruited and re-established, fortified themselves in Posnania, and gathered together a Magazine for his Majesty's Army, when it should re-enter Peland.

During this Situation of Affairs, General Ronn, who was encamped about Thorn with a Body of twenty thousand Men, most of them Dragoons, received Orders from the Czar to enter into the Lines of Danizic, which after long Warning had at last declared for the Swedes and King Stanislaus.

The Muscovite General proposed to the Regency of this Town, the following very hard Conditions:

- 1. To renounce the Interest of King Stanislaus.
- 2. That they should withdraw the Cannon from the Ramparts, when it was of no Use against the Desenders of Polish Liberty.
- 3. That they should deliver up all the Adherents to King Stanislaus, especially a Swedish Commissary, named Kniper Crona, who should be found in the Town.
- 4. That they should no longer delay the Payment of certain Contributions which had been already demanded.
- 5. That the Town should furnish them with a great Quantity of Powder and Ball.
- 6. That as they could not help acknowledging the Russians to be the Defenders of the publick Liberty, so the Town could not refuse to admit for some time a Garrison of Russian Troops.
- 7. That they should provide Horses to mount sisteen hundred Dragoons, and Tents for ten thouland Men.
- 8. That they should furnish Bread for the Troops.
- 9. That they should make a Present at their Discretion to General Ronn.

The Town of Dantzic, which was too firm and too full of Zeal to accept fuch hard and dishonourable Conditions, resolved, after a short Debate, to defend herself against Force, and having sent a Colonel with twelve hundred Men and some Cannon into the Lines, Lines, they made Holes in their Banks, by which General Ronn was obliged to retire with Precipitation, and with so much the more Confusion, as he had menaced what he was not able to execute.

In the mean time, the Czar, fearing least the Pope, since Augustus had renounced the Crown of Poland, should recognize King Stanislaus, whose Election he had disapproved, determined to send the Knez Boris Kurakin, as his Minister, to Rome. This Minifter, under a Shew of re-uniting the Greek Church to the Holy See, a Proiect with which Rome had always flattered herself, was ordered to use all imaginable Efforts to dissuade his Holiness from recognizing King Stanistaus: In which he was the more likely to succeed, as Pope Clement XI. was the more averse to this Proceeding, on account of the Protection which the King of Sweden gave to King Stanistaus, the former of these Kings being regarded by the Pope as a terrible Heretick, against whom he was violently irritated, on his having fided with the Lutherans of Silesia against the Catholick Powers.

Whilst the Czar took these Measures at Rome, to prevent the Loss of his Adherents in Poland, and the Overthrow of all his Projects, which might be brought about by a single Letter from the Pope to the Clergy of the Kingdom in Favour of King Stanissaus, he caused his Troops to make terrible Waste in the Lands and Goods of those who were in the Service of that Prince, to give the rest to understand what they were to expect if they deserted his Party. But as the Soldiers, from whom all restraint was taken off.

in executing those dreadful Commands, were not obliged to know the exact Bounds of those Lands which were prescribed by the Assembly of Leopol, it often happened that his Friends suffered by bordering on his Enemies; this excited bitter and continual Complaints, which were brought to the Czar's Court, whilst universal Exclamations ran through the Kingdom, against so severe an Ally and Protector.

The new Diet was fixed to be held at Lublin, May 13. Few of the Grandees appeared at the Opening, though this was conducted with great Magnificence, and many fine Harangues. The Czar saw that the Poles made a Difficulty of entering into his Views, and only sought to gain Time. In effect, they only dispatched a few Passports with the Czarish Ministers, and regulated some other Affairs of little Consequence.

This Conduct in the Poles extremely incensed the Czar, especially when he law that Wisniowiski had abandoned his Party; which Prince, tired with a War of which he could promise himfelf no good Issue, and being moreover distatisfied with the violent Barbarities exercised indifferently by the Rushan Troops, under Pretence of spoiling the Lands of the Adherents to Sweden, judged it his Interest to change Sides: and as he saw himself at the Head of the Party in Lithuania, he led it entire into the Camp of General Count Adam Lowenbaupt, whence he went forward to Saxony to submit to King Stanislaus, who found Means to reunite this powerful Lord with Sapieba.

The other Lithuanian Generals soon. followed followed their Chief; there remained only General Sieniki, Great-Master of the Artillery of Lithuania, whose March was cut off by the Russians, by whom he was obliged to throw himself into Bichow, a strong Place, where he was soon belieged, and forced to surrender himself at Discretion, together with his Brother, and several other Grandees of the Kingdom.

Sieniki endeavoured to excuse his Conduct by representing to the Czar, that he had no Intention to quit his Party; that he had only obeyed the Orders of Wisniowiski, without knowing the Correspondence he maintained with the Enemy; but the Czar being piqued to the last Degree, and likewife much displeased at the slow Proeccings of the Assembly of Lublin, sent Sieniki to Prison at Moscow: The Czar published at the same time Proclamations against Wisniowiski and his Wisniowiski answered by Adherents. circular Letters, in which he deplored the miserable State of his Country, which was become a Prey to its Friends as well as Foes; declaring, that he would not have forfaken the Part of the Confederates, had he not feen the Ruin of his Country inevitable, if it remained thus divided, and under the Protection of two fuch powerful Monarchs, who were Enemies to each other.

The Impatience of the Czar at the Irrefolution which reigned in the Affembly of Lublin is hardly to be believed. He was yet at Solkiew, where there is a fine Castle and three beautiful Walks. These could in no manner ease his Disquietude. The Assembly took Notice of the taking of Bichow, and concerted with the Knez Dolgorucki the Means to regain the Lithuanian Army. As to the Demands of the Polonese of having Bichow restored, with the Artillery which had been taken, a Reparation of all the Wrongs and Damage done by the Tartarian Calmucks, and the Delivery of Staniflaus his Primate to the Assembly; the Czar consented, on Condition that Bichow should be razed, or at least have no more Garrisons thrown into it; that the Artillery should be restored at the End of the War; that the Damages done by the Calmucks should be repaired and paid; and lastly, that the Primate should be indulged in his Prison with all forts of Conveniencies, till the Decision of the Holy See arrived.

On June 10. the Czar went to Lublin with an Escorte of three thousand, Men, hoping to bring the Assembly to some vigorous Resolution. This Prince had in his Train the Ministers of Denmark and Prussia, and Count Berezini Envoy from Prince Raguiski, who came on behalf of the Malecontents of Hungary, to demand a Supply in Money from his Czarish Majesty, and to offer the Crown of Hungary to the Czarowitz. But he obtained neither the one nor the other.

At his first Arrival at Lublin, the Czar saw, that he could have no Dependance on the Resolutions of this tumultuous and wavering Assembly. To sound them therefore, he made them these three Propositions.

1. That they would publish the Interregnum and elect a King.

2. That they would draw up the Formulary of a new Oath, by which the Grandees should oblige themselves to continue inviolably and faithfully attached to the Czar.

3. That in pursuance of their Engagements they would give Sureties of their Alliance.

The Members of the Assembly answered to these Demands, that they. had no Certainty of the absolute Renunciation by King Augustus; they must be allowed Time therefore to lend into Saxony, to know the true Intentions of that Prince, the rather for that Pfingsten and Imboff had been put under Arrest, which gave them Room to judge that he disapproved the Treaty which these Commissaries had made... They added, that, in the mean time, the Czar might, if he pleafed, take Measures to drive the Swedes out of Great Poland, to the End, that if they came to an Election, it might be tranfacted with the greater Freedom. They demanded, lastly, of the Czar, Sureties of the Performance of his Promiles, in favour of him whom they Should elect.

The Czar replied, that their pretended Ignorance of King Augusus's Dispositions was a palpable Evasion, and without prejudice to the Freedom of their Election, he proposed to them as Candidates to the Crown, the Great-General Siniawski, who had been long in their Favour, the Palatine of Mazowia Chementowski, Vice-Chancellor Srzembeck, and the Count de Dabnbof, under Sword-Carrier, and Marshal of the Confederacy. Adding, that who-soever of these four should be elected, might be assured of his Protection and Assistance.

The old Primate, charmed with the Thoughts of putting the Crown on the Head of a Person who should owe his Advancement folely to him, without reflecting on the mischievous Consequences of this Election, seconded the Propositions of the Czar, and succeeded so well by his Menaces, that, in Spite of the Opposition of many Mem²: bers, the Crown was declared vacant, and the Interregnum published; and whereas some Grandees of Lithuania had held an Assembly where they had taken particular Resolutions, it was agreed to hold a Council at Novogrodeck, to reunite the Interests of the two Nations, under the Protection of the Czar.

We should certainly have seen very shortly three Kings on foot at once in Poland, had not the Czar, who was full of Penetration, discovering that he could by no means rely on those Persons, taken a Resolution entirely different: for having no way but openforce to make Head against the King. of Sweden, who was now preparing to re-enter Poland with a flushed and victorious Army, he abandoned for this time all Thoughts of a new Election. and Meditating only how to draw the War into a foreign Country like this of Poland, he divided his Troops into feveral Bodies, one of which he fent into Polish Prussia, a second into Lithuania, another into the Neighbourhood of Warlaw, giving Orders at the same Time to his Generals to watch the Motions of the Swedes, and in case they attempted to pass the Vistula, to break down all the Bridges; that if after this they were not able to dispute their Passage of the River, they should lay waste by Fire and Sword, all the Country on this side, in their Retreat, by whice means all Sublistence might be taken from the Enemy, and at the fame Time to fatigue them continually with Marches and Counter-Marches.

This terrible Order was so punctually executed, that the Soldiers, greedy of Booty, acknowledging no Law, as soon as the Bridle was taken off, committed the most shocking Barbarities in Poland; to which, of all others, the poor Town of Lissa, belonging to King Stanislaus, was the most exposed. To give one Example.

A Russian Colonel, whose Name was Schultz, entered into Lissa, July 5, and after having exacted the most excessive Contributions, he plundered the Town, with the Calmucks and Tartars, from the 6th to the 19th of that Month; during which Time they committed Violences unheard of, and almost incredible, had not a printed Account in form of a Journal set down in particular all the dreadful Circumstances.

After this cruel Execution, he set fire to that beautiful Town, and not contented with reducing it to Ashes, after having committed more than Birbarian Cruelties, he took away with him a Company of the Citizens who were Clothiers, to be employed in the new Manusactury erected at Moscow, where they were obliged to work during their Lives. Some of the Inhabitants, not amounting to the twelsth Part, had the Happiness to save themselves naked and stript of every thing in Silesia, the rest having been all massacred.

The Town of Ravitz, the fine Castle of Reissen or Ridzin, and many other Places, shared the same Fate. These Actions so alienated the Minds of the People from the Muscovites, that thro' all Poland no Wish was heard but to see the Swedes and King Stanislaus enter into the Kingdom, to deliver the Inhabitants from their cruel Protectors.

Most of the Members of the Assembly at Lublin retired at the same Time. The Count of Dabnbof made lively Complaints to the Czar, shewing him the ill Effect of the Conduct of his Officers. At first, he recommended more Moderation to them, but in Effect, they only changed their Manner of ruining the Polonese, whom they stript of whatever they had that was valuable, in order to adorn and enrich Russia.

The Czar himself caused the rich Moveables to be taken out of the Cassile of Warsaw, even to the fine Orange-Trees which were there, and every Thing that he liked best to be removed from the finest Palaces of the Town. These he afterwards transported in Quantities to Moscow, or St. Petersbourg.

We shall see hereaster the Conclusion of the turbulent Diet of Lublin. Let us at present return to Saxony, and take a View of the Determination of the Differences between the King of Sweden and the Emperor.

As divers Powers apprehended the Consequences of his Swedish Majesty's Resentment, they offered their Mediation to reconcile him with the Emperor. The Queen of England was particularly zealous by her Envoy Mr. Robinson, as was Holland by Mr. Haersolt, to calm the King's irritated Temper, who threatned nothing less than an Invasion of the Emperor's Dominions, unless he received Satisfaction.—The following is the Answer from his Swedish Majesty to the Queen of Great-Britain's Letter.

MADAM,

SINCE the Letter which your Majefty writ me on the 30th of May, bath discovered some Concern for those Subjects of Diffatisfaction which the Emperor bath given me, offering to employ your good Offices, to bring about an Accommodation; I cannot forbear thanking your Majesty for the Marks you bave thereby given me of your Zeal and Attention to my Interest. It is much against my Inclination that these Differences had Birth, and when any one reflects on the Manner in which the Imperial Court bath behaved to me, they will easily judge that bitherto she bath been little disposed to render me any real Satisfaction; on the contrary, it appears that she was desirous of heaping new Offences on ber first Stroke.

Your Majesty is not ignorant that after the Wrongs which have been done me at divers Places and Times, . Some Months are past without my being able to obtain the Satisfaction I have a Right to. What gives me Room to doubt that they will make the greater Difficulty to give it me, is, that it was determined, while they were debating thereon, to fuffer the Muscovites to escape, and leave them an open and free Passage through the Estates of the Empire, notwithstanding the Right which I had to claim them, and contrary to the Hopes which they had given me of delivering them into my Hands. This will suffice to justify my Anger and my Resentment, and if I have not just Satisfaction made me, I think myself obliged to seek it in the hereditary Provinces of the Emperor, a Step which no one can blame in a like Conjuncture.

Alt Ranstadt, July 28. 1707.

Baron Groth arrived at Hanover, in order to forward the Business in Conjunction with the other Ministers. The allied Courts were much alarmed at the Part which his Majesty was going to act. The Emperor having all things to fear in the present Situation of his Affairs, resolved at last to accommodate himself entirely to the King's Will, and this the more eagerly, as they had received News at Vienna of the Approach of several Swedish Regiments to the Frontiers of Silesia.

As foon as the Conditions were regulated, on which Count Wratislaw was to be received in the Character of Ambassador, this Minister appeared in Saxony, furnished with very ample Powers, but the King could not admit him to an Audience, till all the Articles in Question were agreed on. The Ministers of the maritime Powers, and above all Baron Groth, who was extremely well at the Court, contributed much to the Success of this Affair.

Count Zobor, in conformity to the Preliminaries settled for the Reception of Count Wratislau, was already delivered to the Swedes, and conducted to Prison at Stetin, where he was treated with much Civility by the King's express Order. He was soon after sent back to Vienna, as we shall see presently, together with Adjutant Breslau, who had caused the Disturbance which happened on Account of the Swedish Levies, and who had likewise been delivered livered up. The Town of Breslau was condemned to pay four thousand Crowns to the Widow of the Corporal, who had been killed in that Scuffle.

The Count de Wratislau had offered to the King of Sweden at the Conferences, by virtue of the full Powers with which he was intrusted, the little Territory named Hadeler land on the Elbe, near the Dutchy of Bremen, in lieu of the Article of the fisteen Hundred Russians; but the King, out of his Generosity, instantly refused it, being contented to obtain in its stead, as Guarantee of the Treaty of Westphalia, the Restitution of the Lutheran Churches in Silesia, a Matter on which he had so long set his Heart.

The Preliminaries were no fooner thus regulated, but without delay, they proceeded to draw up the Articles of the Convention, the first of which regarded the Matters of Religion in Silesia; the second contained the Confirmation of the Convention in 1647, in which the Chapter of Lubec had promised to chuse her Bishops and Coadjutors till the fixth Generation from the most serene House of Holstein-Gottorp; there was a Paragraph inserted likewise, respecting the Right of Primogeniture of Eldership in the same most serene House. By the third Article, the Emperor remitted Sweden all military or pecuniary Subsidies, and all other Contingents. The 4th submitted it to his Swedish Majefly, to chuse such Guarantees of the Convention as he pleased.

The Minister promised at the same Time that this Convention should be ratified by the Emperor his Master in a a Fortnight. This appears more plainly in the Treaty itself, with the Emperor's Ratification, which here follows, with the Promises of the King of Sweden, translated from the Latin.

I. It is promified on the Part of his Imperial Majesty, that the free exercise of Religion, accorded by the Peace of Osnabrug, to the Princes, Courts, Barons and Nobles of Silsia, who are of the Confession of Ausbourg, to their Subjects, and to all Suburbs, Villages and Places thereon depending, shall not be only conserved to them without any Molestation or Hindrance, but every Innovation which can be found contrary to the natural Sense of that Treaty, shall be redressed.

'II: The Temples and Schools of the Principalities of Lignits, Briga, Monsterberg, and Oelsna, as also of the Town of Wratislau, and the other Places thereon depending, which have been taken away since the Peace of Westphalia, whether these have been employed to the Use of the Catholic Church, or whether they have been simply shut up, shall be restored to those of the Confession of Aufbourgh, with all the Rights, Privi-'leges, Rents, Funds, and Goods, which are attached or belonging to them, and this within fix Months at farthest, or sooner if it may be.

'III. It shall be lawful for these 'Churches which are built near the 'Walls of the Town of Swinitz, Jawerin, and Glogau, not only to entertain what Number of Clergy shall be necessary for divine Service, but also to build and have near to these 'Churches, Schools for the Education of Youth.

'IV. In

* IV. In Places where the Publick Exercise of Religion is forbidden to those of the Consession of Ausbourgh, no Person shall be prohibited from attending divine Worship peaceably and quietly in his House, for himself, his Children, his Servants, and the Strangers there lodged, nor to send his Children to foreign Schools of the same Religion, or to keep private Preceptors to teach them at Home.

' Nor shall any of the Confession of " Ausbaurgh in Silessia be forbidden to be prefent at the divine Service of the Catholicks, nor to frequent their Schools, or embrace their Religion, or to serve Catholick Cures for the . ecclefiaftical Functions of Marriages, Baptism, Funerals, and such like. But every one shall be at liberty to convey himself to those neighbouring "Places where there is any publick Exercise of Religion according to the Confession of Ausbourg, whether with. in or without Silesta, and to employ the Ministers of the Place conformable to antient Usage. In the same Manner, the Ministers of the Confession of Ausbourg shall not be hindered, when called, from vifiting the Sick of their Religion, who live under the Jurisdiction of Catholicks, nor from affifting condemned Priloners, by communicating with them, advising them and comforting them.

* advising them and comforting them.

* V. The Nobility and others of the

* Catholick Religion who shall live in

* the Parishes where the Confession of

* Assurg flourishes, or have Goods

* there, shall be obliged to pay to the * Minister the Tithes and other Rents

* appropriated to the Cure.

VI. Tutors or Guardians of a different Religion shall not be assigned to Pupils or Orphans who are born of Protestant Parents, of whatever Sex or Degree they may be, much less shall they be obliged to enter into Convents, to be instructed in the Principles of the Catholick Religion; and as the Tutelage and Education of Insants belongs of natural Right to their Mothers, they shall be permitted, when they have no lawful or testamentary Tutors or Guardians, to procure others who are of the Confession of Ausbourg, and to join these to them.

'VII. If any Dispute shall arise on Account of Religion, no Warrant of Execution shall be granted by any President, or inserior Judge, before the Person against whom the Process is directed, may have Opportunity of addressing the supreme Regency of Silesia for Justice. For which Purpose the Estates of the Confession of Ausbourg shall be permitted to maintain Procurators and Mandatories at their own Charges at the Imperial Court.

thers concerning Religion, either shall not be carried at all to the Catholick Consistory, or shall be decided by the Canons received in the Religion of the Confession of Ausbourg; and with regard to the Principalities, where they have had Consistories of that Confession from the Peace of West-phalia, the antient Usage shall be refessioned, and they shall decide the said Causes, saving always the Appeal to the Sovereign.

'IX. Moreover, none of the Churches or Schools where the Exercise of Religion of the Confession of Ausbourg hath been maintained, till the present Time, shall be supforested; whether such depend on the 'Collation of the Emperor, or other ' Catholick Patrons, but shall be conferved and protected, together with their Pastors and Masters. As to the Right of naming Preachers and Mi-'nisters of the Confession of Ausbourg, for the Service of Churches and Schools, it shall belong entirely to ' the Patrons of those Churches, without being impeached by the Contra-"diction of the Catholicks, who may have a common Right; and in cafe they should shuffle, and not declare the Preachers, &c. in the usual Time, the University may depute such Preachers or School-masters, fhall think convenient, without Pre-'judice always, to the Right of the Patron.

'X. The Nobles, nor their Vassis and Subjects of the Confession of Ausbourg, shall not be excluded from such publick Charges, as shall be necessary; nor shall they be molested or hindered in the Sale of their Goods, or in their Retreat into any other Country, when this shall be lawful by the Scipulations in the Treaty of Westphalia.

*X. His facred Imperial Majesty *will not refuse to give Place, in Purfuance of the Request of the Treaty for Westphalia, to the Interventions and friendly Intercritions of his facred royal Majesty of Sweden, and the Princes and States of her Religion, to obtain a greater Liberty of the Exercise thereof in these States.

'XII. His Imperial Majesty shall likewise ordain, in the usual Forms, not only that what hath been here agreed on, be executed at the appointed Time, but also that all and singular of the Articles here comprised be sincerely and exactly observed and accomplished, at all Times, seeing that the Force of a Law, not to be altered by any Commands or Edicts to the contrary, is attributed to them from this Time forth for ever. Finally, his Imperial Majesty promises, that the Minister of Sweden may artend the Fxecution thereof, to which Purpose, he may communicate with those who are entrusted in conducting it.

'XIII. As his Royal Majesty of Sweden hath declared, that he hath extremely at Heart the Interests of the most serene House of Holstein Gottorp, his facred Imperial Majesty promises, that after the previous Knowledge of the Fast, and after having been duly required on the Part of the said Ducal House, he will within four Months confirm the Convention of 1647, by which the Chapter of Luber promised to take all her Bshops and Coadjutors out of the said most serene House, till the sixteenth Generation inclusive.

* XIV. His Imperial Majesty farther declares, that he is favourably disposed towards the Continuation of the Right of Primogeniture, according to the Order introduced in the House of Holstein-Gattorp by Duke
John Adolphus, Jan. 9. 1608, inasmuch as it hath been successively confirmed by all the Emperors. So that his Imperial Majesty will not only confirm, in the best Form used at the Imperial Court, the Convention already mentioned, and that Order for often affirmed; but will also conferve

ferve in all its Force to the most serene House of Holstein Gottorp, the Right which it hath by that Order acquired, without ever permitting any Determination to the contrary.

'XV. His facred Imperial Majesty fremits to his facred royal Majesty of Sweden, all military or pecuniary Subfidies, and all other Contingents with which he may be bound to fup-• ply his Imperial Majesty and the Emon Account of his German Provinces, by virtue of a Decree of War against France, as well the past as the ' prefent, and during the whole Course of that War, in such fort, that his Royal Majesty of Sweden, his Succeffors, or the Kingdom of Sweden and her said German Provinces, shall not be troubled nor molested at any Time, nor under any Pretence on this Subject. Provided nevertheless, that every other Engagement or Obfligation wherein these Provinces are, or hereafter may be bound to his Ime perial Majesty and the Empire, remain entire and untouched.

*XVI. And lastly, The more to confirm what hath been here agreed on, and to give the strongest Assumer rance that all and every the Points herein contained shall be most holily and inviolably observed, it shall remain in the Power of his royal Majestry of Sweden to name and appoint such Guarantees as he shall approve of.

'In witness of all which Articles, the Minister of his sacred Imperial Majesty, instructed and surnished with full Powers for that Purpose, hath signed with his Hand, and sealed with his Seal this present Convention, with a Promise that within the Term of a Fortnight to be counted from this Day, that his Imperial Majesty shall ratify the same, and that he will deliver an Instrument thereof in a proper Form.

Wencelaus Count de Wratislau.

"We Charles, by the Grace of God, "King of Swedens of the Goths and "Vandals, do make known, whereas the most serene and most puissant Prince and Lord, Joseph, Emperor of the Romans, ever Au-'gust, &c. our dear Brother, Cousin and Friend, having fent to our Camp, the illustrious John Wencestaus Count of Wraiislau, his Privy Counsellor and Chancellor, of Bohemia, hath by that Minister composed the Differences which had arisen between us, on Conditions amply express'd and comprized in the above Instrument, ' passed the 22d of August last, which hath been remitted to us by the said 'Minister, signed with his Hand; and whereas we are not less disposed to emaintain and affirm the antient Alli-'ance which we have with his Imperifal Majesty, and the August House of Austria, and to prevent all Occafions of Enmity which might happen 'hereafter, we have been pleafed to certify and declare, and we do certify and declare, fincerely and faithfully, by the following Articles.

I. That we will faithfully and inviolably maintain the Peace of Osnabrug, as a common and perpetual Law

Law between us, his facred Imperial Majesty, and the Roman Empire. That we will sincerely preserve a Friendship with his facred Imperial Majesty, and as we have received Satisfaction on Account of the Differences which lately fell out between us, so we abolish all Pretensions which we might have on this Subject, being desirous that they may remain buried under perpetual Oblivion.

'II. In like Manner, we promise to 'withdraw,' without Delay, all our Troops, as well Foot as Horse, out of his Imperial Majesty's hereditary Countries in Silesia, as soon as the Ratification of what hath been pro-" mised shall be delivered to us, and the Orders for putting these Promifes in Execution shall be issued in the proper Form; but if we should be obliged, in the mean Time, to cause our Troops to remain in Silefia, they must be there provided with Subsistence, and we proinife, on our Part, that they shall observe good Discipline, and that we will not fuffer them to commit any Acts of Violence.'

'III. But, if contrary to our Apprehension, the Promises on the Part of his Imperial Majesty, shall not be accomplished within the appointed Time; in this case, we reserve a Power of keeping our Troops in Silesia, till they shall be accomplished. In witness whereof, we have signed this present Instrument with our 'Hand, and have ordered our Royal' Seal to be affixed to the same.'

CHARLES.

(L. S.) C. PIPER.

At Stockbolm a fine Medal was fruck on the Redress of the Grievances of Religion in Silesia, regulated by this Treaty or Convention.

This gave very great Pleasure to the Queen, his Majesty's Grandmother, who caused publick Rejoicings to be made thereon.

After his Swedish Majesty had thus gloriously put an End to all these Disficulties which had retarded his Departure from Saxony, the Regiments which had long since received Orders to hold themselves ready to march at a Minute's Warning, were now put in Motion. This Prince having reviewed them, as we have before said, found them in excellent Order.

The March of some Swedillo Regiments towards Silesia had much accelerated the Convention which his Majesty had concluded with the Emperor touching the Restitution of the Lutheran Churches and Service in Silesia. As nothing now remained to keep them any longer in Saxony, the King gave positive Orders of decamping, these Orders were issued, Aug. 21. 21 fix in the Evening.

The foreign Ministers, after having had their Audience of Leave, were

^{*} The Report of the Emperor Joseph's Answer to the Pope's Nuntio, who reproached him in a very strong Manner, on the Part of the holy Pather, on his having granted all that the King of Sweden demanded, touching the religious Grievances in Silesia, is most undoubtedly true. It is well for you, answered the Emperor smiling, that the King of Sweden did not propose to make me a Lutheran: for if he would have exacted it of me, I know not what I could have done.

already departed, faving that of France, and the Swedish Ladies, who had, by his Majesty's Permission, come to see their Husbands, now returned home.

Our Regiments were compleat by the Recruits railed at Francfort, Ratifbon, Ingolftadt, Brunau, and other Places in Bavaria, but above all by the Levies in Silefia, where the Forwardness to serve was very remarkable. At last, after having celebrated a Day of Fast and Prayer, the next Day, which was Aug. 22. the King ordered the Signal of Decampment to be given by the Trumpets and Kettledrums.

This Prince marched from Alt Ranfladt by four in the Morning at the Head of his Drabans, followed by the Regiments of Dragoon-guards. All the other Regiments were ordered to march, each feparately, towards Steinau on the Oder, where they were to affemble and enter Poland in fix Columns.

The King past by Leipsic about Noon, accompanied only by the Prince of Wurtenberg and three other Persons. He stopt a few Moments in the Castle of Pleissenburg, where he gave Orders to repair all the Damage sit had suffered. He dined afterwards at Liber-volckowitz, which is three Leagues from Alt-Ransladt, and here he passed the Night. In the Morning he went to Grimm, the Day following to Mygeln, whence he marched to Grantzigk, thence to Meisseu, having passed the Elbe at Oberau and Nidera.

The same Diy, the King, accompanied only by the Duke of Holstein, and by some Officers and Drabans, to the Number only of six, to whom he had not mentioned his Design, turned about all at once towards Dresden; where he entered on a Gallop at four in the Afternoon, and went directly to the Castle. He there surprized King Augustus, who was in Dispabille, being very far from expecting this Visit; and without giving him Time to recover himself, or letting him quit his Sight, he took his Leave of him in less than half an Hour, as he did likewise of the Electress, Mother to King Augustus, and his own Aunt, and of the Electo-After this Visit he reral Prince. mounted his Horse, and having rode round the Rampart together with King Augustus, he lest Dresden under a Discharge of the Cannon, and proceeded to his Quarters at Nussdorff.

On the 28th, the King marched to Bischosswerden, and on the next Day to Katewitz, near the Town of Bautzen in Lusace, whence he went to encamp at Lautzig, and the Day following at Reichenbach, near to Gorlitz, His Majesty having learnt that the Muscovites made a Shew of intending to oppose King Stanislaus, who had led the Van on the 16th of August with his Polish and several Swedish Regiments, ordered fome Regiments to advance to reinforce him. During all this March the most severe Discipline was observed in the Army. The Officers and Soldiers were obliged before they quitted their Quarters, to pay to the last Penny of their Debts; and the Colonels had Orders, during the March, to do Justice on the Spot to all those who should have the least Reason of Complaint. The 2d of September, the King pass'd by Gorlitz, and encamped at Lauban. On the 4th he entered Silefia, and lay at Bunzlau.

The

The Day of the King's Arrival in Silefia, the Count de Zinzendorff came from Vienna to his Majesty's Quarters, with the Ratification of the Treaty concluded for the Reparation of the Grievances in Religion. He followed: the Army even to the Frontiers of Poland, being very earnest on every Occasion to give Instances of the most extraordinary Respect to his Majesty, during his Passage through the Frontiers.

It was at this Time that Count Zobor was fent back to Vienna, the King having belought the Emperor to restore him to his Post, which was done accordingly.

On his Majesty's Entry into Silesia, the Prince Palatine, who was Governor-General, published the Treaty concluded with the Emperor, touching the Restitution of the Churches of the Confession of Ausbourg; this threw all the Monks into a great Consternation, and especially alarmed the Jesuits, who were obliged, among other Restitutions which they made, to quit their fine College of Lignitz, and the Church of St. John, notwithstanding the Endeavours which they used with the King by their Requests and Supplications, which were not liftened to.

The King continued his March on the 5th, from Bunzlau to Luben, where he halted the next Day, and on the 7th marched to Ramsen, which is a Village half a League from Steinau on the Oder. Now the whole Army being drawn together, was ordered to pass the Oder, and then to march in fix Columns. The King with his Column encamped at Leubus, a Cloyster three Leagues beyond the River, whence he went on the next Day to Great and Little Streus, i where they stopt one Day, and afterwards proceeded to Sworowa, where the Kingdom of Poland begins.

- During the King of Sweden's March an, infinite Crowd of People, young and old, ran together from all ... Parts to see this Monarch, their Protector, and the Restorer of their most precious Liberty, who observed, that this great Prince caused Prayers to be folemnized twice a Day, as of Custom, in the open Field, where incomped. the Soldiers, forming a Circle round, the Minister, being all on their Knees. together with the King. This admirable. Example of Piety made such an Impression on the Children, that they afterwards imitated it in many Places with such extraordinary Circumstances. that Numbers of Persons came from far to see these Assemblies, which occasioned them to be so often repeated. that for fear of some evil Consequences, they were a while after forbidden; as the publick Acts printed at Breslau, testify.

The King marched from Sworowa to Jatrochin, whence he proceeded to Krotochin, and encamped the Day after at Buden, marching afterwards two Leagues more to Chocz, whence he marched to Sawerowa. On the 19th, he came to Varta, and fixed his Headquarters in a little Bourg, called Slupza, one League from Laudeck. His Majesty remained some Time till the Recruits were arrived at the Army from Sweden, which were to be distributed in the national Regiments.

Our Troops met on no fide with any Resistance, as they had at first expected; but, on the other Hand, they fuffered extremely with the Want of $\mathbf{Z}\mathbf{z}$

Forage

Forage and Water, the Rustians having infected with Carcasses most of the Springs and Wells which were on the Road, and burnt, sacked and carried away, as we have before said, every Thing on which the Army might substitute, retreating still backwards, though they were upwards of a hundred thousand strong.

What was still worse was this, that the Russians had destroyed all the Mills; nor could our Valoches hinder the Enemy from committing these Desolations, nor could they, though they sted about the Country, do any more Mischief to the Russians; than by carrying off here and there a few Men and Horses.

The Council of Lublin dispersed, Sep. 22. in a very tumultuous Manner, without appointing either Place or Time for their meeting again, in spite of all the Pains which the Czar took to transfer it to Warsaw.

It was only agreed, 1. That as the Council had not named any Place for the Continuance of their Session, the Marshil of the Confederacy, the Principal Ministers, and some Nuntios of the Palatinates should be obliged to remain with the Primate, to concert with him whatever may be judged expedient for the common Cause. 2. That the Primate should publish a Proclamation, ordering the inferior Nobility to mount their Horses on the second 3. That the Crown-army Order. should be promised those Arrears which are due to them, exhorting them to continue faithful to the Republick, and to affift her in proceeding to the Election of a new King. 4. Lastly, It was agreed to give the Command of the Army in Lithuania to the Under-Marshal, in case he would return to his Obedience to the Confederated Republick, giving him six Weeks Time to consider thereon.

After this Affembly had fettled these Articles, all the Deputies departed from Lublin the 24th of the same Month, Confusion and Consternation on all sides pressing hard on the Primate and his Adherents.

On the other Side, the Czar having been informed of the advantagious' Treaty which his Swedish Majesty had concluded with the Emperor, and that he had entered Poland at the Head of a brave and numerous Army, to support the Crown on the Head of Stanistaus, and seeing the Irresolution, the Timidity and the Confusion which had reigned at Lublin, whence the Confederates were at last dispersed, he, who was advanced as far as Grodno and Tykozin, returned hastily to-Warfaw, where he held a grand Couneil of War, in which it was resolved that he should trust the Conduct of his Armies to his General Menzikof and Scheremetof, and go himself to Petersbourg, as well to give his Orders for the Dispatch of every Thing necessary for his Troops, as to put forth his Fleet, in order to make a Divertion for the Swedes in some other Place.

It was resolved in this Council of War, that the Generals, each at his Post, should defend the Passage of the Vistula, and that in their Retreat towards Lithuania, they should ruin the whole Country; which they had already begun, as we have said, sacking and burning the Lands, &c. of Friends and Enemies, without any Distinction.

Menzikef took his Post at Padwak, General General Ronn at Prague, the Suburbs of Warfovia, and General Hayn at Blonia. After this the Czar fet out for his own Dominions, passing thro Tykozin, Grodno, and Wilna, where he staid some Time.

The Court of King Stanisaus encreased daily at the Head-quarters of the two Kings at Slupza. Prince Radziwil, Great-Chancellor of Lithuania, one Luhomirski, the Prince Wisnowiski, and Potoki, Palatine of Kiovia, and Great-General of the Crown, were assembled here with a great Number of Lords, and many of the Nobility. The Army of the Crown was at the same Time reinforced every Day, after King Stanislaus had published a Proclamation. There was an universal Appearance of Satisfaction in all Faces on their Delivery from the Russians, their pretended Protector, who did them more Mischief in a very little Time, than they had suffered in many Years from the War.

It was at this time that the famous Patkul was executed, near the Conventand little Town of Casimir, which is but eight Leagues from the Town of Pasnania, being situated between this last named Town and Slupza. He was broke alive, his Quarters were set upon the Road, and his Head on a Post.*

* This unfortunate Gentleman was a Native of Livonia, a Province which formerly belonged to the Knights of the Teutonick Order, and had been fince contested for by the Muscovites, the Poles, and the Swedes; which last enjoyed it fince the reign of Gustavus Adolphus, and now claimed it by a folemn Cession at the Treaty of Oliva. The Livonians had their share in the Severities by Charles XI. on his Subjects, and had been by him robbed of their Privileges, and of Part of their Estates. Patkul was on this Occasion deputed by the Livenian Chiefs to carry their Complaints to the Throne of Sweden, where he represented them in a very respectful Speech, but which was at the same Time delivered in a nervous Stile, and adorned with that ungrateful Eloquence which is generally the Language of Bravery in Distress. Charles XI. concealing his Resentments, struck Puthul gently on his Shoulder, and faid to him, You have spoke like a brave Man, and I esteem you, proceed as you have begun. Notwithstanding which he, a few Days afterwards, declared him a Traitor, and as such condemned him to die. Patkul, who perhaps was not without Suspicion, got timely Information, and conveyed himself safe into Poland, where he was favourably received by Auguflus, to whom, after the Death of Charles XI, he represented Livonia as an easy Conquest, from the Male contentment of the People, who vehemently defired to shake off the Swedish Yoke, and the Incapacity of the young King's tender Years, to defend himself there. The Measures taken to this Purpose and their Success, our Author hath well disclosed in the foregoing Part of his History. Augustus made him a General in his Armies, but as he could not accommodate himself to the fiery Temper of Flemming, who was the Favourite of that King, and had the Ascendant in his Councils; he past afterwards into the Service of the Czar, who presently made him a General, and afterwards employed him in an Embaffy to King Augustus. Whilst he was in this Character, he discovered that the Views of Flemming and of the Chancellor of Saxon, were to strike up a Peace with Sweden at any Rate whatever, he therefore formed a Defign to be before hand with them, by procuring an Accommodation between the King of Sweden and the Czar. This Project was detected by the Chancellor, who presently procured an Order from King Augustus to arrest his Person at Dresden; a Step, which as it was against the Law of Nations, surprized all Europe, and violently incensed the Czar, whose Commissary Prince Galiozin very loudly exclaimed against it at the Court of Saxony: however, Augustus found Means to satisfy the Czar, (at least in Appearance) and to persuade him that Patkul had traiterously sacrificed both their Interests. Patkul was conveyed a Prisoner to the Castle of Konifting in Saxony, where he remained till the Peace was figned between Charles and Augustus, in which his Delivery to the King of Sweden was expressly stipulated: but Augustus, when he found the King of Sweden obstinate on this Point, thought to fatisfy Charles XII, and his Honour at the

The same Month died also Colonel Gortz. He had been in the Service of Saxony, from whence he had passed to that of Sweden, as we have mentioned before, having raised in Saxony a Regiment of Dragoons consisting of three thousand Men. As soon as the Army entered Poland, the Dragoons of this Regiment deferting in great Parties, this Colonel, of his own Authority, thought proper to hang fome Deferters whom he caught. This, joined to many violent Exactions committed by him in Saxony, and which were reported to his Majesty, was the Cause of his been laid under Arrest, but he

fame. Time. He fent Guards therefore to deliver him, up, after he had dispatched private Orden to the Governor to fuffer him to escape. Pour Patkul's ill Fortone converted the Measures which were taken for his Preservation into his Ruin: for as the Governor knew him to be very rich, he was defirous of making him pay for his Liberty; but as the Prifoner yet relied on the Rights of Nations, and was li-ewise informed of King Augustus's Intentions, he refused to buy what he exprofest to obtain gratis. In the mean time, the Guards arrived, and delivered him to four Swedife-Captains, who carried him directly to Alt Ranfladt, where after & & ... y of three Months, during which he was fullened to a Stake with an heavy Iron Chain, he was conducted to Cafmir. Charles: N.I. having didered the Council of War to judge him with the last Rigour, he was by them condemned to be broke alive on the Wheel, and his Body to be quartered. A Chaplain came to inform him of his Death, without acquainting him with the Manner, when this unhappy Man, who had brav'd Death in fo many B tiles, having his Courage no longer supported by Glory or Anger, the only Sources of Intrepidity, thed Abundance of Team in the Chaplain's Bosom. He was contracted to a Saxon Lidy of Birth, Merit and Beauty, and to whom he expected shortly to be married. when he was delivered up. He defired the Chaplain to go and comfort her with Affurences of the Tenderness for her in which he died. When he came to the Place of Execution, and faw the Wheels and Instruments prepared, he fell into Convulsions of Fear, and threw himself into the Arms of the Minister, who embraced him, covering him with his Cloke and weeping. A Swedil Offic.r then read the following Sentence with a loud Voice; 'Be it known, that it is the express Com-* mand of his Majesty our most merciful Prince, that this Man who is a Traitor to his Country, bebroke on the Wheel and quartered, for the Reparation of his Crimes, and for an Example to others; that every one may cautiously skun the Commission of Treason, and serve his King faith-At the words most merciful Prince; where is his Mercy? faid Patkal; and at those of Traytor to bis Country, alass, said he, I have served it too well. He received fixteen Strokes, and suffered t'e longest and most dreadful Forments that can be imagined. I have thought a short Account of this harsh and cruel Act, which was committed in open Defiance of all Virtue, Humanity, and the Law of Nations, would not be difing eeable to the Reader, as our Author draws the Curtain as much as possible over it; and this consistently enough with his Respect to the Memory of his Hero, which will contract a Stain from hence not to be washed away by all the Blood spilt in his Victories. And I shall be excused (at least by the Superstitious) for observing, that all his Successes ended with it; and whoever confiders the Remainder of his Life, may perhaps doubt whether the Fate of poor Patkul on the Scaffold was not more eligible to a wife Man, than that of Charles at the Head of his then victorious Army. Pathul's Quarters remained exposed on Stakes, till the Year 1700, when Augustus reascended his Throne. He then ordered these Evidences of the Necessity to which he had been reduced at Alt-Ranflade to be brought to Warfago, where he feid to the French Envoy, pointing to the Box which contained them, there are the Members of Patkal, without adding any thing either to reflect on, or lament his Memory. Nor did any one there picient dareoffer his Sentiments on to delicate and melancholy a Subject.

^{*} It may be proper to inform the English Reader, that it is the Custom of those Countries where Torments are used, not to discover to the Prisoner the Manner of his Death till the Day of his Execution, in the Marning of which he is conducted before his Judge, where his Sentence is read to him, and he is from thence directly ted to Execution.

died some Days after of a violent Bleeding. His Majesty sent his Physician to see him, but he found him dead. His Corps was sent to his own Home, which was four Leagues from Berlin, and the King at the same Time assured the Widow of his Protection. The D sterences which he had had with the Officers of his Regiment were likewise determined by a Sum of Money afterwards paid them. His Regiment was divided into two, Colonel Aibedybl had one, and Colonel Gyllenstierna the other.

As foon as the Recruits, who were all chosen Men, were arrived by the Way of Pomerania from Sweden, the Army was entirely compleated by the End of Ottober.

The continual Rains which had fallen, and which had render'd the Roads impassable, being ended, and succeeded by a great Frost, the King gave the Orders of decamping. In conformity to which, they marched the 30th of Ottober, five Leagues to Lubstowa. The next Day they encamped at Birtzwinno, where they halted a Day, and on the 2d of November marched two Leagues and a half to Dhodecz and Lubinetz.

During this March, the Count de Dobna, Envoy of Prussia, had a publick Audience of his Majesty in the open Field before his Tent. The Officers and Drahans formed a large Circle round the King, who entertained the Minister for an Hour with his Hat under his Arm, nor did the Snow which fell in great Flakes, and covered his Head, seem to incommode him in the least.

The Army having decamped, No-cemb. 3: marched to Glogova, where it halted one Day, and then encamped about Wilksvice, Puruf, and Grabowa. The King took up his Head-quarters at Wienniez, which is half a League from Brzest Cujarski, and two Leagues from Grabowa.

As foon as his Majesty arrived at Wienniez, he went the same Day, attended by Prince Wurtenberg, and his usual Train, together with some Valorches to Wladistaw on the Vistula, and ordered ten Men in the Night to pass the River to reconnoitre the Enemy. These reported that they were already retreated, on which his Majesty ordered his Regiment of Guards to advance, which was quartered in this Town.

At this Time a Turkish Minister arrived at Wienniex. He was instructed to congratulate King Stanislaus on his Accession, and to renew the antient League with Poland. As his Instructions extended likewife to compliment his Swedish Majesty, he had an Audience in Count Piper's Quarters. He presented his Letters of Credence covered with Cloth of Gold, and made a Discourse, which when interpreted, was in Substance: That the Fame of the great Actions of his Majesty being come to the great Sultan his Master, he had fent this Minister to offer hime his Friendship, and to assure him that he received, great Pleasure, from the Success of his Arms; and moreover, to thank his Majesty for the Goodness. he had shewn two Years since, in setting at Liberty some Turks who were Prisoners at Leopold: He added, that the Sultan his Master, to testify his Acknowledgment of that Action, had caused more than a hundred Swedes to: be fet at Liberty, who had been taken Hermelin, Secretary of State, anfwered in Latin in the King's Name, That his Majesty was entirely disposed to maintain, on his Part, a good Correspondence with the Ottoman Porte, and that he would explain himself more amply on the Subject of his Commission. A Polander, who was in the Service of the Turkish Minister, interpreted this Answer to him. This Minister was lodged in the Town, and had his Expences defrayed all the Time that the King was at Wienniez.

This Envoy received at his Audience of Leave, the Present which is usually given at the Court of Sweden to Turkilb Ministers, namely, six hundred Ducats. He was also magnificently entertained by King Staniflaus, who permitted him to chuse his Present. He returned Home highly satisfied, and principally with having obtained a Promise from the King of Sweden, that he would never abandon King Stanislaus.

The Marquess de Rochegude, French Refugee, dispatched by the Protestant Cantons, had likewise Audience of his Majesty at Slupzia, where he entreated him to use his good Offices with the King of France to obtain. the Liberty of the Reformed condemned to the Gallies, and detained in Dungeons on Account of their Religion. He had his Audience of Leave at Wienniez, some Days before the Departure of the Army, much charmed with the Compassion which his Majefty had testified for those unhappy poor Wretches, and with the Instructions he had ordered to be fent to his Minister at Paris, to intercede

At last, Orders being given to decamp, the Army was put in Motion. Decemb. 18. on which Day and the 19th, they approached the Vistula by Duninows and Brzillno, in Order to pass it at several Places. As great Quantities of Ice were then floating on the River, they could not pass it till the 28th, when it began to bear. His Majesty, who remained at Wienniez, had passed some Days before with a fmall Train, to make a Visit to the Bishop of Cracow, whose Estates lay on the other Side of the River. cember 30. the King with the Court. having left Wienniez, the Army paffed the Vistula with great Ease, very few Men and Horses being drowned. The Army, on the first Day, proceeded two Leagues and a half to Grokowalk. The next Day they marched to Borzewo, and the first Day of the Year 1708. O. S. came to the Town of Drobin. The following Letter written by the Author himself to a sovereign Duke of the Empire, will explain this better.

My Lord,

Have the Honour to acquaint your Serene Highness with the Departure of the Court the 30th of December, O. S. whence the Army took its Rout by the Town of Wladislaw, where the Regiment of Guards was quartered, and whence it had marched the Day before, to give Room to other Regiments who were to follow the same Way.

The Passage, my Lord, was chearful enough, and every one was pleased to find bimself on the other Side of the Water. It was a fine Day, and we continued passing all the Morning without any Danger; but towards Noon, what with the wearing of the Ice with Horses and Carriages, and with the Sun's thawing it, notwithstanding all the Precaution which could be taken by passing in different Places, some Waggons sunk under the Ice, which was not three Fingers thick; and as it was worse near the Shores than in the Middle, they were compelled to use Planks, which had served them to pass the other River.

The King spent most part of the Day in marshalling and facilitating the Passage. He then proceeded towards Grokowalk, and marched that Day two Leagues and a balf. The Baggage did not arrive till near the Morning, that of the Drabans is not arrived yet. Major General Wrangel's Coach unfortunately sunk, nor could it be drawn out of the Water till the next Day. The General lost a great many sine Cloaths by this Accident.

On the 31st bis Majesty continued bis March to a Village named Borgewo, where we expected to rest the next Day. being the first of the new Year, but the King willing to make Room for those Regiments which were to follow, decamped at four in the Morning, when she Body of Drabans being affembled, congratulated the King on the new Year with the Sound of Kettle-drums and Trumpets, which gave great Life to the March. We went three Leagues that Day to the Town of Drobin, where being arrived, bis Majesty celebrated the new Year with a Sermon and divine Service. We are at a great Distance from Prussia, three Leagues from Plosko, twelve from Pultowsk, and fourteen from Thorn.

All the Army is at present past, tho with Difficulty. His Majesty bath learns that the Regiment of Meyerseld, which passed near Plocko, being on the River, the Ice separated itself from the Land in a very singular Manner, and floated along with all the Soldiers, &c. on it; this caused a great Consternation both among the Men and Horses, who divided themselves for their Safety into small Parties. It is, however, at length stops, and they continue to pass again, in spite of all the Danger which bath threatened them.

The Artillery crossed the River before Wladislaw, and very successfully, by the Care which the Colonel took in covering the Passage with Planks in Form of a Bridge; for the Ice had almost sunk to the Bottom, and rendered the Passage otherwise impracticable in that Place.

This is, my Lord, an Abridgment of our Passage of the Vistula, nothing remains for me to tell your Serene Highness on this Head, but what the King remarked in this Passage, that four of his Major Generals had had the ill-Luck to fall into the Water, namely, Lagercrona, Roos, Meyerfeld and Creutz, the Ice having broke under them, but none of them were drowned.

Yesterday, being the 1st of January, a Party of our Valoches baving penetrated five Leagues on the other Side of Minsko towards Lublin, surprized three Companies of the Crown Army, whom they entirely defeated, taking their Colours, which were this Day prefented to the King with their Commanding Officer, to whom they gave Quarter. We have News also, that another Polish Party bath been defeated by our Valoches on the other Side of Pultowsk, and we expect the Prisoners to arrive incessantly.

The

The Great General Sapieha is arrived from Lithuania. I have the Honour to be, with profound Respect.

My Lord.

Your Serene Highness's

most obedient Servant,

Deshin, Jan.

GUSTAVUS ALDERFELD.

The King having decamped from Drobin on the 4th, marched to Cze-kanowa, where he stayed till the 7th, for the coming up of his Army. He had left some Regiments in the Dantz g r Warder, and the Neighbourhood thereof, to secure them from the Insults of the Enemy, and so cover the Town of Posnania.

On the 7th, the Army advanced three Leagues, to Pranitz, coasting along the Borders of Prussia, where they halted on the 8th and 9th. Hitherto the March had been supportable enough, fave for the violent Cold; but for the future it became very painful, by the Bogs which they met with every where, by the deep and almost impassable Roads, by the Flight of all the Inhabitants, who, notwithstanding the Rigour of the Season, saved themfelves in Woods, and had abandoned their Houses, where no kind of Victuals where found; and lastly by the Mifchievousness of the Peasants, of this Province of Maswia, being most of them Vagabonds and Robbers, who concealed themselves behind Trees and Coverts, whence they discharged their Fire on our People.

The Army having decamped on the 10th from Pranitz, entered the Wood in three Columns. It was this Day that the Bogs began, on which the Peafants kept themselves quiet. But on the next Morning, they began to molest us, killing some of our Horses, and wounding several of our Men: they had even the Boldness to throw themselves in the Night, into the Village of Brodowalenski, and getting in at the Windows, to kill a Horse in the Quarters of the Drabans.

The 19th, the King continued his March towards a Convent of the Jefuits, three Leagues distant from Bro-Jowalenshi, where he could not arrive, by reason of the continual Annoyances from the Peasants, and he was obliged to lie that Night in the open Field, near some Fires which they had kindled; on the 14th he marched by the Convent to the Village of Liepniki where his Majesty remained the 15th.

The next Day, we made a very long March, to the Town of Colno, where we remained till the 18th, when his Majesty removed two Leagues to a Village called Grabow, and on the 20th, to the Town of Wagasicz, where we halted a Day, to recover the Fatigue of the March, in which the Artillery had more particularly suffered with great Extremity, by losing a great Number of Horses, which occafioned us to burn several Pontons, for want of Horses to draw them.

On the 22d, the King past the River Naref, on a Bridge which was thrown across it, the Russians having destroyed that which was there. Hence he repaired in the Evening to Kramkowa, where he spent the next Day, the Army encamping along both Binks of the River. The 24th, his Majesty went to Karonino, a little Tow.

fome Leagues distance from Tykozin, and ten Leagues from Grodno, where King Stanislaus joined him with his Column. Here, our Troops first had Sight of the Enemy, who to the Number of some thousand Horse, were drawn up in Order of Battles, but restreated as snon as his Majesty, at the Head of his Einspanner only advances to attack them.

The Army suffered much during this March, especially at one particular Pass, where a Bridge of 1a/Quarter of a Mile long over a Morass being broken down, very much retarded us.

The King, on the first Notice that General Ross was detached by the Gzar with eight thousand Horse towards Augustowa, to attend our Motion, advanced with some Troops, hoping to cut off that Party; but the several Morasses, over which the Bridges were broken down, gave the Energy so much time to Retreat, that at his Majesty's Arrival he found the Town of Augustowa entirely abandoned.

On the 25th of January the Army advanced to Chorsel and Stras, thro vast Woods; the next Day they proceeded four Leagues to Zukolke, and on the 27th advancing four Leagues farther, they encamped at Nowidiow, and in the Neighbourhood of Dubnitza, being two Leagues distant from Grodno.

The Czar, on repeated Advices of the King's March, was returned the tenth of January from Moscow to Minsk, whence he had conveyed himself to Grodno, to consult on the Moans of disputing at least the Pass of Niemen; tho' he had not been able to prevent us, in Defiafice of so many Obstacles, from penetrating so far into a Country, which was so difficult to pais through.

The King of Sweden knew not that the Czar was so near him. We had Advice only that his Infantry, which was forty thousand strong, was extended from the other side of Niemen, from Kaven to Ursa; and that his Cavalry, consisting of thirty thousand Men, was distributed from Tykozin and Grodan to Novogrodeck. Prince Menzikos, who commanded all these Troops, was quartered in a Castle near the first of these Towns.

As to the Army of the Confederates of Lublin, commanded by Siniawski, we knew it was at Włodowa in the black Russia on the Bug; so that it could by no means affist the Muscovites.

The King having taken six hundred of his Horse Guards, with a small Detachment of Hielm's Dragoons, and being attended by the Prince of Wartenberg, Count Rheinschild; and some other Generals, advanced in the Evening to the Bridge of Gradna, which is on the Niemen, to reconnoitre it; and found that it was defended by some Works; secured by Cannon and a Detachment of Russian Dragoons. He attacked them with such Vigour, that they turned their Backs on the first Shock, and were pursued under the Walls of Gradna, and I have the Walls of Gradna, and I have the Shock, and were pursued under the Walls of Gradna, and I have the Shock of Gradna, which is on the Even-ing to the Shock of Gradna, which is on the Even-ing to the Shock of Gradna, which is on the Even-ing to the Even-ing the Shock of Gradna, which is on the Even-ing to the Even-ing the Shock of Gradna, which is on the Even-ing the Shock of Gradna, which is on the Even-ing the Shock of Gradna, which is on the Even-ing the Shock of Gradna, which is on the Even-ing the Shock of Gradna, which is on the Even-ing the Shock of Gradna, which is on the Even-ing the Shock of Gradna, which is on the Even-ing the Shock of Gradna, which is on the Shock of Gradna, which is on

The Night having put a Stop to his Majesty's Undertakings, he passed it in the open Field, thoroughly resolved to attack the Enemy in the Morning by break of Day.

The fame Day our Valoches encountered with a Party of the Enemy, confisting of seventy Horse, and drove them fighting to the Bridge of Grodno, which they expecting to pass, fell into the King's Hands, and forty of them were cut to Pieces; the remaining thirty, with the Lieutenant who commanded them, named Venediger, obtained Quarter by his Majesty's Orders.

In the Night a great Noise was heard in the Town, which made us imagine, those within were attempting. a Flight. In reality, the Czar, who thrice in twenty four Hours had back his Coach ready at the Door of othe. Cloyster where he lodged, to retire in case of an Attack, thinking that the whole Swedish Army was at Hand, departed hastily in the Morning at break of Day, with Prince Menzikof and his Court. and took the Road to Wilna The King of Sweden having successfully passed the Ice very early, entered the Town, which the Enemy had as bandoned two Hours before, and took Possession of it. After this Expedition. his Majesty sent Orders to the rest of the Army to hasten and join him.

The Czar being advertised by some of those who fled, what a small Number of Swedes had given fuch a Panick to the Town, and had driven him to depart with such Precipitation; and that the King of Sweden was there in Person, sent back presently Brigadier Mublenfeld with three thousand Horse, to retake the Town, and bring off that Prince. They arrived in the Night, and instantly attacked the Bridge with much Fury; but the Guard, which was awake, sustained the redoubled Efforts of the Enemy with such Valour, that it gave Time to the Picket to advance, and the rest of the Troops to draw together, so the Repulse of the Enemy, who was at last dispersed, put to Flight, and pursued for some Time.

We had but one Man killed, and one wounded in this Encounter; whereas, the Lofs of the Enemy was confiderable; besides which the Valoches who pursued them at break of Days returned with many Priloners.

The Prince of Wurtenberg and Count Rheinschild narrowly escaped being taken by the Enemy, in the Beginning of the Action; their Courage in the Darkness of the Night having carried them into the middle of the Miles vites, from whence however they wesy successfully disengaged themselves. en Asyth Brigactien Mublemfeld, having been acclifed of ill Conduct in this at tacks, the less put sunder Arrest at his Returni; but he had the Happiness to lave himself. as we shall afterwards relate. This same day several Regiments arrived at Gredue. Tho' the Enemy had so wasted this Country, that the Army fuffered extremely for want of Provision and Forage, the King, who was enflamed with the Desire of an Engagement, resolved to pursue them. till he could overtake and force them to fight:

The Army then continued their March in several Columns; that of the King, composed of a few Regiments only, led the Van, first turning towards Wilna, which they afterwards lest eight Leagues wide of them to go to Minsk. They were again obliged to change this Rout for want of Provision, that whole Country having been ravaged and laid waste.

Our Valoches, who marched in the Front, kept always at the Heels of the Enemy, and gained in this Rout several Advantages; hindering them at the same Time, as much as possible, from committing the most horrible Havock, in burning and sacking all the Houses, Lands and Villages, as they had done before.

A body of two hundred and fifty Valoches of our Troops surprized on the eleventh near Olfianni, a Rushan Party of two hundred Horse, the greater Part of whom they cut in Pieces; they took two Captains with fifty Dragoons Prisoners, and one hundred and fifty Horses. On the twelfth, the Staroft Crispin arrived at Smorgonia with thirty Companies of the Lithuanian Army under Wisniowski, after having given chace to the Russians, ever fince their Departure from the Frontiers of Samogitia, and taken on the Road two Parties detached by Gemeral Ronn to burn the Country, the one confisting of twenty, the other of thirty Horse.

The Czar, after his Retreat from Grodno, was retired to Wilna; in the Neighbourhood of which all his Court and Army were affembled. Prince had fent Orders to the Knez Repnin and to General Bever, who were in Polesia and Volbinia, on the southern Borders of Lithuania, to retire from Minsk towards Polocik, in order to be ready to join those Troops, which lying near Riga should likewise retire towards the same Place; pulling down all the Bridges behind them, which would certainly cut off all Courland and those Bodies under Count Lowenbaupt and Wisniewiski, which had been in a manner inclosed; and cut off all Retreat from the Muscovite Camps about Tykozin, which being abandoned by them, were now possesfed by the Heyduques of King Stani-

During the Retreat of the Russians, the Peasants and the lower Nobility of Litbuania made a considerable Booty, on all Sides, of the Effects which the Enemy left behind them; but this was a poor Reparation for the Damages they suffered, the Czar having given Orders to sack the whole Country. He now took the Road of the Dnieper, with an Intention to intrench himself on the Banks of that River, between Mobilow and Oursa, whence he might have an assured Retreat to Messilaw, and above all to Smolensko.

The Cossacks and Calmucks executed the Czar's Orders with all the Barbarity imaginable, in such Sort, that notwithstanding all the Care which his Majesty took to the contrary, between Wilna, Minsk and Berezina, nothing but Smoke and Flames were to be seen on all Sides.

The thirteenth, a Detachment of Russian Troops attempting to give Fire to the little Town of Lebelciowa. which is fix Leagues from Smorgonia, were prevented by our Valoches, who surprized them and cut them in Pieces, to the Number of above three hundred Men. They had gained a much greater Advantage, if they had waited the Arrival of the rest of their Body and of the Lithuanians, who were but one League off at the Time of the Action. Menzikof and Oginski were so closely followed by the Starost Crispin who commanded that Party, to which two hundred Swedish Dragoons under the Command of Colonel Traufetter were joined, that they were often on the very Point of being furprized in their Beds, which were not cold cold when they fell into the Possession of their Pursuers.

All the Swedish Army with the Artillery being arrived, on the fourteenth, in the Neighbourhood of Smorgania, the Regiments were cantoned at large in the Province, that they might retrein themselves after their satisfied March, and with Hopes to provide the more commodiously for their Subsistance.

This Hope foon vanished at the News which the Commanders sent his Majesty. Their Complaints were not only of want of Forage, but of Bread and other Victuals; and above all, of Beer, which would administer the chief Refreshment to the Soldiers, who had almost perished with thirst as well as Fasigue.

True it is, that we received some Supplies from Prussia, particularly from the Town of Konigsberg, whence several Merchants ran the Hazard to bring us Food and other Refreshments; for which they were largely paid; but this sufficed not for an whole Army; so that if we had not applied ourselves with as much Industry as we did some Years before in Lithuania, to discover those Magazines which the Peasants had hidden under Ground, and which we did with great Difficulty, we had all run the Risque of perishing with Hunger.

The Czar having quitted the Wilna, retreated towards the Dnieper, intending to post himself, at Mebilow. Lieutenant Colonel Dalbeim, who with a Detachment of Cavalry had penetrated as far as Minsk, whence the Russians on his Appearance had sted full Speed, confirmed this Report; adding, that the Enemy gave out that they intended to draw a Line along the other Side of the Dnieper, (otherwise called the Boristones) in order to dispute the Passage with us.

During this continual Retreat of the Enemy, some Gentlemen, with the Pealants whom they had drawn together and armed, carried off from Prince Menzikof three Waggons sull of Silver Coin, which was conducting to Konigsberg, and was apparently the Remainder of the last Campaign, plundered from the poor Polonese throw the whole Kingdom, to whom this Russian Prince was a true Blood-sucker.

While thele Matters were in Agitation, Brigadier Mublenfeld, who had escaped out of Prison, came to his Majesty at Smorgonia, and informed him exactly of the Czar's Defigns, of the State of the Ruffian Army, and the Rout they held. This Information engaged his Majesty to extend his Army in the Beginning of March, as far as the Town of Wilna; which, on Account of its obstinate Attachment to the Russian Party, was obliged to deliver in one Week thirty thousand Pound of Bread, thirty thousand Pound of Meat, two hundred Tons of Beer, two hundred Pots of Brandy, with a large Quantity of other Victuals.

At this Time the Differences which had subsisted between the Houses of Wisniowiski and Sapieba, were entirely extinguished by the Arrival of King Stanislaus at Lida, on the twenty-eighth of February. This Prince, with his Troops, took up his Quarters at Geranow, where he did not feel so much of the Misery of the Country as the King of Sweden at Smorgonia; all this Neighbourhood belonging to the Muscovite Mascovite Adherents, had come better off than their Neighbours, and were now able to afford us some Assistance, as well as the Territory of Minsk.

King Stanislaus on the eleventh of March made himself a Tour to Wilna, where the Magistrates of this Capital of Lithuania came forth to present him their Keys, and to recognize him for their Sovereign; humbly asking his Protection and Pardon for all their past Faults. At the same Time General Smigelski, who was posted at Zakrozin with his Troops, arrived at King Stanislaus's Quarters.

Whilst this Prince with his Column followed the King of Sweden's Army, the Affairs of Poland had put on different Faces, according as the different Parties in the Palatinate gained of lost the Ascendence. Siniauski, Palatine of Belfk, whom King Augustus had made Great General of the Crown, and who, fince his Abdication was always attached to the Czar, and had much contributed to the Support of the last Confederacy of Lublin, had great Part of the Army of the Crown strongly attached to his Person: This Lord, I say, notwithstanding all the Pains taken by Mr. de Bonac, the French Ambassador, who was then at Warsovia, to reconcile him and engage him in the Interests of the new King of Poland, flood firm, and would not even hear of this Prince, nor make him any Submission, especially since he had left the Frontiers of Poland to advance into Lithuania with the King of Sweden.

Siniawski having at length assembled all his Troops at Wlodowa, marched with them towards Leopol, in the Palatinate of Russia, in Order to execute the Decrees of that City, concerning the Payment of the Confederate Army. He wrote at the fame Time to the Primate of that Party, that he was retired from Poland into Silesia, with Design to return and assemble a General Diet of the Confederate Estates, observing to him that he had already dispatched circular Letters requiring to know the Sentiments of the Senators and Nobility on that Matter; that he had exhorted them to quit King Stanislaus, and enter into the strongest Measures with the Czar to unite against the Swedish Forces, by which they might be in a State to come to a new Election.

This General published at the same Time a Manisesto, forbidding any Respect to the Orders of the Palatine of Kiovia, whom he declared a Rebel, together with all other the Adherents of King Stanishaus. By all these Declarations, supported by a round Sum of Money which the Czar sent him, and with the Cossacks of Mazeppa, who advanced from the Ukraine to join him, he extremely strengthned his Party, and weakned that of Stanishaus, whom he made to sear a general Revolution, if he did not instantly return to Poland to conjure down the Storm.

King Stanislaus after having amicably determined the Differences which had so long raged between the Houses of Wisniowiski and Sapieba, sent the Palatine Jablonowski and Mr. Bronizz Marshal of the Consederacy of Warsovia, to the King of Sweden, to represent to him the Necessity under which he sound himself, of returning into Paland, to reduce the Malecontents, and re-establish Tranquility in the Kingdom, by holding a General Diet of Party had requested leave to do. The King of Sweden having confented to this, as he did also to the raising the Contributions which the Palatinate of Posnania and Kalis were obliged to pay, King Stanislaus prepared to leave us, taking with him that Body of the Swedish Army under Crassau, which was appointed to attend him, to act against Siniawski.

We have already observed, that the Russians on the Side of Riga had withdrawn to Polocik at his Majesty's Entry into Lithuania. It is impossible to express what Barbarities they committed in their Retreat, from Riga to the Frontiers, not having left one single House standing behind them; all was burnt, and lay in Heaps of Ruin and Confusion. All the Citizens of the unhappy Town of Dorps were led into Slavery, they beheaded two of the Council, and pillaged all the Houses. which were afterwards demolished together with the Fortifications. carried away likewise from Narva mamy of the richest Merchants with their Families, whom the Czar obliged to settle at Moscow to assist in promoting his Commerce.

The rest of these Wretches were banished into certain Places assigned them to cultivate the Land. carried off from about Mobilow, upwards of one hundred Waggons loaded with Polish Infants of both Sexes, to affift hereafter in peopling the vast Defarts of Muscowy. This spread an universal Terror over Poland and Livonia. At last General Baver, to give the finishing Stroke to the Miseries of this last Province, entered it at his leaving the Polifb Livonia, which he Pacification, which the Senators of his had in like manner facked, and plundered of every Thing, to form a great Magazine at Seiswegen, posting himself along the Duna, of which he contimued the Master, Count Lowenbaupt not having Forces sufficient to hinder or make Head against him.

The King of Sweden resolved to quit his Quarters of Smergonia, in the Palatinate of Wilna, and go to Mink, hoping to be the better able to support his Army, which wanted all manner of Necessaries. He decamped the fifteenth of March, and in two Days arrived at Radowskiewice, which is twelve Leagues from Smorgonia, five from Min/k, and seven from the little Town of Plessenize.

We were here again deceived in our Expectations, the Land being incultivated, produced nothing to refresh the Army, and the subterranean Magazines were very hard to discover; and even if we could have found them all, they would have been very insufficient for the supplying so many Troops. The Reader should know besides, that in Lithuania, there is generally speaking more Wood than manurable Lands. The Forests which present themselves on this Rout, are above one hundred Leagues in length without any Interruption, in which Parts there are but a few small miserable Villages all furrounded with Trees: whence it may be easy to conceive what the Troops suffered during that March, especially the Cavalry, who found not even Grass for their Horses.

In these Countries we met with an extraordinary Quantity of Honey, of which we made a Mead that was very Bees-wax is no where in delicious. such Abundance, nor so cheap as here.

To conserve the Trees which the Bees fasten on, and defend them against the Bears, who very diligently search after them, to devour the Honey, which they will climb to the very Top for, the Inhabitants place round the Trees, and under the Swarms, certain pointed Stakes, which they fix in Planks, and thus prevent these Animals from approaching the Trees. Here is Abundance of Game, and Fowls, the former of which gave agreeable Sport to the Huntsman.

The 31st of March Count Lowenbaupt arrived at Radowskiewice, give his Majesty an Account of the Condition of his Troops, which were in Courland and Livonia, and to receive the necessary Instructions to ioin At the same Time the Swedist Resident Knipercrona, who had been a good while in that Character at the Court of Russia, came from Stockholm with Propositions on the Part of the Czar, to fettle a Cartle with the King, and make an Exchange of those Prisoners already taken on both Sides: but these Propositions were not relished by the King of Sweden, who never would consent to them.

Our Army extended its Quarters towards Borissow on the one Side, and as far as Bobuseviza on the other. A Change his Majesty judged proper to make, in order to procure more commodious Subsistence for his Troops.

King Stanislans was quartered at Steli: There was at Borissow a body of 8000 Russians, under the Command of General Goltz, to defend that Pass, which is situated on the River Berezing.

General Baver continued to make great Waste in the Province of Live-

Leagues from Riga, by which he obliged Count Lowenhaupt to return after he had received his last Orders from his Majesty, whilst several Swedish Regiments advanced to be ready to support his Troops in case of an Attack. The Czar made this Motion to give an Apprehension of having a Design on Riga, and to oblige the King of Sweden to take another Rout; but this Feint produced no Effect, his Swedish Majesty never changing the Plan which he had formed.

The Czar who been had some Time at Polocsk, ordered his Army, which was said to be seventy thousand strong, to pass the Dnieper, resolving to go himself to Petersbourg, to press the sending out his Fleet; which was to be very considerable, and whence he had great Expectations: but falling sick at the instant when he was preparing to set out, he caused himself to be conveyed to Smolensko, leaving the Direction of all the Operations to the General Scheremethof, Menzikof, Gallizin, Goliz, Allard, Repnin and Pflug.

As these Generals were then at Mobilow, they held a Council of War, in which it was debated, whether they should make Peace or risque a Battle. Menzikof insisted much on the former, but the foreign Generals opposed him strongly, in spite of the panick Terror which reigned in their Army, and the great Desertion of their Soldiers, and even the national Troops who for the most part enlisted themselves in the Lithuanian Army; for this Reason the Czar had so passionately desired the Cartel, proposed by Kaipercrana, to which his Swedish Majesty would, not confent.

In the beginning of May such a prodigious Quantity of Snow sell, and the Cold was so very piercing, that we were for the most part obliged to keep to our Houses; but all on a sudden, towards the middle of May, so sudden a Change happened, that we might be said to be transported to a quite different Climate. This occasioned many violent Diseases to both Men and Horses: many of the latter and a great Number of Dogs ran mad, and such Men as had the Missortune to be bit by them died a sew Days after, in most terrible Torments.

Gount Lowenhaupt being returned on the fifteenth of May to Riga, made all necessary Preparations to join his Majesty with his Body of the Army, in Conformity to the Orders he had received, in order to act with more Vigour against the Czar, and to attack him in the very Heart of his Estates. We had the more Reason to hope for good Success in this Expedition, as this Prince was hated and made uneasy by his Subjects, on account of the Novelties which he introduced into the Government.

This was then the Language every whete, but the Sequel shewed they were mistaken who thought so.

The Czar had obliged his Subjects to dress themselves in a manner entirely different from that which they had before used, to shave their Beards; and besides the bloody War which they were to support, he likewise made them labour at the Building of Vessels and other publick Works, which they did much against their Will; this caused heavy Murmurs and a great Discontent throughout his Kingdom; nothing was heard of but Revolts, and scarce was one quieted before a fresh Sedition arose from another Quarter.

Besides all these Considerations, which encouraged his Swedish Majesty to enter Russa, the Advices which they had some Time since received from Mazeppa General of the Cossack Russans, were a powerful Motive of that firm Resolution which this Prince took to execute the Project he had formed.

Maxeppa, who had for a long Time had great Reason to complain of the Czar, was then on the Frontiers of Volbinia, with a Body of twenty five thousand Cossacks, with which he pretended that he would join Siniawski, at the same Time that he carried on a Correspondence by Letters with King Stanislaus, the Purport of which was to prevail on the King to enter the Ukrain, and deliver it from the Muscovite Yoke under which it grouned. The Fertility and Abundance of this Country, where the War might be continued with Vigour, and pushed into the very Bowels of the Czar's Dominions, where so many Malecontents waited only our Arrival to declare themselves, caused the King of Sweden to take a Resolution of turning his victorious Arms that Way, as foon as he was joined by Lowenbaupi's Army. We lest our Commissaries at Wilna, where they raised fifty one thousand Crowns of that City, twenty thousand of the Dutchy of Slucz, and a proportionable Sum of the other Palatinates, to be contributed towards defraying the War against the Czar. The principal Care was to get together all the Provision that was possible for the Subfiftence Subfiftence of the Army during the March we were going to make, and our Commissaries to that Effect made some Journeys to Gredno, Somogitia and Podlachia, to procure it from all Parts.

As foon then as the Regiments were provided for three Months with every thing necessary for their Sub-sistence, in a Country laid entirely waste, the Army was put in Motion the first of June, and marched towards Laboisk.

His Majesty had reviewed his Troops before he set out, and was entirely taken up during his Stay at Radofitionice, in teaching them a new Sort of Exercise, going on this Account from one Regiment to another, so instruct and form them.

On Jame the fixth the King of Sweden decamped, marching towards Berezina, where our Van-guard arrived that same Day. The Regiments marched closer together by reason of the Neighbourhood of the Enemy. That Evening King Stanislaus took leave of his Swedish Majesty, being on his Return into Poland, to bring the Confederates to reason by the Assistance of the Swedish and Lisbanian Troops, to which the Crown Army was to bejoined.

We marched three Leagues that Day to Trofnitz, where we passed the Night and the next Day. The Artillery followed in our Rear at the Distance only of two Leagues. On the eighth, the King continued his March through Grodeck to Minsk, being in Haste to arrive at Berezina, whither the greater Part of the Army had marched the Evening before. The ninth, we came to Smigelwicze, whence we past the next Day by Ibumain to Jurgewiza. On the sisteenth we arrived at the River of Berezina, near the Town of Bereza-Sapieska.

The King at his Arrival here, took with him his Foot and some of the Horse, and attended by the Prince of Wurtenberg, advanced to reconnoitre the Dispositions of the Enemy. His Majesty perceived that the opposite Bank of the River was much covered with Hedges and Bushes, and defended by near two thousand Muscovites, besides a great Number of Don Cossacks, who kept themselves concealed.

The King presently ordered his Foot to advance and fire on them, in order to disperse them; but as the River is not wide in this Part, the Cosfacks returned the Fire so well, that the Balls whistled round the King on all Sides.

The Prince of Wurtenberg fearing what might happen to his Majesty's sacred Person, who would not retire, and remained thoroughly exposed, took with him two Officers, and advanced with them on Horseback some Paces nearer the River, to divert at least their Aim from the King. The Enemy as that Instant fired three Shot at these three Persons, two of them passed by without doing any Mischief, but the third shot the Prince thro' the left Thigh. To prevent the Enemy's rejoicing, he concealed his Wound fome time, telling it only to the two Officers who were with him; he still kept his Seat, and went flowly to find the King, who was much alarmed at this Accident, and caused the Prince to be carried to a little Greek Chappel which was hard by, where they stopt the Blood, till the Arrival of a Surgeon with the Baggage.

The Youth of the Prince, joined with his good Habit of Body, foon restored him to a Capacity of mounting his Horse; till which Time he was carried in his Bed by twenty four Musqueteers, who were relieved from Time to Time during the March, and to whom the King, who took an extraordinary Care of the Prince, ordered a Crown a Day to be paid per Man.

His Majesty, to give a Diversion to the Enemy, had detached General Sparr with four Regiments towards Borissow, on the Berezina, where Lieutenant-General Goliz was posted, as we have faid, with eight thousand Men, to dispute the Passage, being perfunded that the King would attempt it there. But while Sparr was advancing on that Quarter, his Majesty, who was arrived, as we have just now mentioned, at Bereza Saphieska; ordered Colonel Gyllenkrok the next Day after his Arrival, to pils the River at the Head of two hundred Men. The Colonel had no fooner posted himself on the other Side, than the Rushans and Cossacks fled full Speed towards The King them caused two Mobilow. Bridges to be thrown across for the Paffage of the Army, which arrived a few Days afterwards on the other Side of the River.

The King in the mean time led the Van, and used the utmost Diligence to cut off General Goliz. This Prince was followed only by a Part of his Drabans, and likewise Part of his Regiment of Guards, of the two Ostrogoth Regiments of Horse and Foot, the Regiments of Horse of Smoland, and the Horse and Dragoon guards, with the Foot of Dabl-Carlia, &c.

General Goltz being timely informed by those who fled, of the King's March, retreated instantly from Borissow towards Mobilow. At the fame Time, Prince Menzikof who had left Detachments of twelve, fifteen, and eighteen thousand Men, at certain Distances, to stop us if possible, not thinking we could so soon pass the Bereza, by reason of the continual Bogs which were on the Road, had no fooner heard this News, than he ordered General Pflug, who guarded the Patsage of Odrucsko, to retreat hastily, after having demolished all the Bridges to hinder our Pursuit.

Notwithstanding all these Difficulties, the King advanced thro' a great Wood full of Morasses, and very difficult to pass, and where we could march but a few Leagues in a Day, the Bridges being all destroyed. We were obliged to pass ten Nights together in the open Field, where we were even glad to find some Place fit to encamp upon; at the End of which Time we arrived near Bialiemfia, where his Majesty hoped to surprize a Body of twelve thousand Men, who were there posted a but they very prudently retired on the first Advice of our Approach, having first cut down the Woods, broke up the Roads, and destroyed all the Bridges and Houses behind them.

The rest of the Army followed in the same Rout, passing thro Bialiemsia, which stands eleven Leagues from Bereza, where they surprized two Jews whom the Knez Repnin had sent as Spies, and who were presently hanged. His Majesty advanced from Bia-liemfia towards Holowszin, where he gave the Enemy Battle, an exact Description of which is contained in the following Relation.

A perfect Relation of what happened at the Battle of Holowizin, the fourth of July, 1708, hetween the Troops of his Swedth Majesty, and those of the Czar of Muscovy, written by the Author of these Memoirs.

That we may omit nothing conducive to a perfect Understanding of the double Encounter between the Infantry on each Side, and the Cavalry on each Side, which were fought distinctly one from the other; I will begin with the Situation of the Town of Hon low/zin, which is in the Middle of a Wood, on the Bank of the little River of Bobiecz, which running through Part of Lithuania, mixes with the Drutsch, with which it discharges itself into the Dnieper. This Town is five Leagues from Mobilow, and thirty The River Babiecz five from Minsk. is almost every where bordered by very marshy Meadows, which render its Banks almost impracticable to be approached, so that the Horse could not act, at least without the Assistance of Fascines and Bridges of Communication.

His Swedish Majesty arrived near the Town of Holowszin, the thirtieth of June, where he found a strong Purty of the Enemy's Dragoons; but as the Front of his Army was composed only of some Companies of his Footguards, he was not able to repulie them. The Dragoons retreating slow, (the River and three Bridges, of which they possessed the two last, being between themselves and us) fortified themselves with a little Entrenchment, extended equal with the Extremities of these three Bridges, which were separated from each other by three Arms of the River.

The same Day arrived the rest of the Regiment of Foot Guards, the King's Drabans, the Regiments of Horse and Dragoon-Guards, with that of Dabl Carlia, and our Artillery, who encamped on an elevated Piece of Ground near the Town. The Enemy posted about two thousand Dragoons, on a Hill directly opposite to us, and fired several harmless Shots from their small Field pieces. In the Evening, they gave a Signal by the Discharge of a Cannon, to found and beat a Retreat in their Camp.

The next Day, being the first of July, the Enemy's Cannon began to play before Day, and continued to do so till the Evening; their Show was very small, and did as little Execution as the Day before. We did nothing that Day, waiting the Arrival of the rest of our Troops. The Regiments of Foot of Sperling, (Ofrogoths) those of Horse of Rosenstianna, (Ofrogoths) and of Dabldorff, (Smolanders) arrived the same Day.

The second, the Enemy began to work at a grand Intrenchment lined with Chevaux de Frise, which reached the length of a great Wood, pursuing all along the Course of the River, and extended a Polish League and a half, or a good Swedish League, from their right Wing to their lest, being the whole Extent of their Entrenchment. Towards the Evening, their Horse were relieved by a Body of their Foot, after having been possed three Days Without without Forage, without drawing Bit, and without stirring.

The same Day the Generals Allart and Repnin arrived with eight thousand Foot, and we learnt from some Deserters and Prisoners, that the Enemy's Army was commanded by VeltMarshal Goltz, and who had under his Command the Generals Allart, Repnin, Ronn, Rensil, Heinski, Ischambre, Gallowin, Von Sweden, &c. &c. Nothing passed this Day except the Enemy's Discharge of eight Pounders, which did us no manner of Hurt.

On the third of July, the Enemy compleated their Entrenchment, which they fortified with fix different Batteries, and thirty thousand Men, chose out of their best Troops, which were again reinforced by the Arrival of Alexander Menzikof, Generalissimo, Czeremetof Velt-Marshal, and the Prince of Hesse Darmstadt.

The same Day eight hundred of their Cossacks and Calmucks threw themselves over the River, and sell openly on our Valoches; but after having killed their Captain Uchanowitz, and a Cornet, they were repulsed, and forced to return the same Way they came. In this Action several were killed, wounded, and taken Prisoners on both Sides.

Towards the Evening, Baron Axel Sparr, General of Foot, arrived with hss Regiment of Wesmanland in our Camp, and was followed by nine other Regiments who marched a little behind, but near enough to be brought up in case of Need.

In the Beginning of the Evening, Col. Bunau ordered the Artillery to be drawn towards the Village of Staraebella, half a League from the Camp, and placed twenty Pieces of Cannon and two Patereros, on a rifing Ground opposite to the Enemy's Entrenchments, and six other Pieces of Cannon below the River to the lest, to disturb the Enemy's Communication, and to hinder any Succours to be brought to their lest Wing from their right.

As Mr. Banau could not make this Motion with his Artillery fo fecretly but that the Enemy must perceive it, they gave a great Alarm, and discharged a Signal for every one to stand to his Arms.

The fourth of July, being the last Day of the Week according to our Stile, Mr. Bunan gave the Enemy a Salutation at half an Hour after two in the Morning, with his twenty Pieces of Cannon and two Patereros, which Serenade he continued till half an Hour after five.

During this Time the King, after having drawn up his Troops, rushed into the River, wading up to his Breast, holding by his right Hand Colonel Siegrosis, and by his left Charles Albrecht Adlerfelt, Captain of his Guards. His Majesty was instantly followed by four Regiments of Foot, namely, the Guards, Dahl-Carlers, Uplanders, and Westmanlanders, commanded by their Colonels Poss, Siegroth, Fritski, and Sparr.

At the same Time the Drabans, four Squadrons of the Dragoon guards under Velt Marshal Count Rheinschild, three Squadrons of the Horse guards commanded by General Creutz; and two Squadrons of Smoland conducted by Dabldorff, and which were principally destined for the Attack, passed the River the first, under Favour of our Artillery; which at the same Time forced forced the Troops of the Enemy, who attempted, at their right and left, to attack those who past, to return back and regain their Retrenchment, in which Mr. de Bunau continued to make a terrible Havock. The Enemy found themselves disconcerted and at a stand, on which Occasion the King said, Matters go well, they are conquered.

Count Yames Sperling passed afterwards with his Regiment of Oftrogoth Foot, as well as the rest of the Horse; and as Sperling perceived two Squadrons of the right Wing of the Enemy to aim at attacking the left Flank of his Regiment, he made them wheel half round to the left, and then gave them fuch a home Salute with a general Discharge, that they abandoned their Purpose with the utmost Haste. ter this vigorous Action, the Regiment recovered their Ground, and marched fiercely on without any farther Interruption, as well as the rest of the Troops that followed; but which could not however come up to the Charge, for the Defile was very difficult to pass, and the foremost Troops charged the Enemy fo vigoroully, that they were obliged to precipitate their Retreat.

His Majesty being always on Horse-back, put himself about half an Hour after sour at the Head of the Foot-Guards, the Dable Carlois, and the Uplanders; who advanced sercely, with their Arms shouldered, towards the right Front of the Enemy's left Wing, commanded by General Repnin; during which, the Westmanlanders and the Ostrogoths had Orders to march more to the left, to cut off any Succour from the rest of the Enemy.

These, who had already suffered much from our Artillery during two Hours, and who saw themselves void of any Covering on their right, (their Cavalry acting neither to the right or left) at the Approach of our Men in this opening, which was about two hundred Paces, that they might not be attacked in the Front, and likewise in the Rear, resolved to go forth from their Entrenchment with their Foot. which confisted of eighteen Battalions on that Side, before we came up to They then attempted to pass on the Back of their Entrenchment, defiling below us on two Bridges, the one facing the other, and by the Affiftance of which they hoped to pass over a very morally Ground. In this manner they separated their Infantry from their Cavalry, which latter stood very quiet along their Entrenchment, till our Men coming up with them, attacked and put them to flight.

- When the Battle was in this Situation, the King gave Spurs to his Horse, and pressed forward with his Infantry to attack theirs; but notwithstanding all the Diligence of these Regiments, who were animated to such a Degree that they ran towards the Enemy, their Foot gained a thick Wood, which offered itself very favourably to. their Retreat. Into this they threw themselves with great Expedition, posting themselves very near the Outside; the Trees, which stood very close and were very bushy, served them for Pallifado's of Defence, and instead of an Entrenchment.

Here the Enemy began to fire on us, who stood all exposed on the open Field; and they ceased not to charge and discharge their Pieces till half an Hour Hour past fix, when they had no more Powder or Ball left. During all this Time the King went from one Battalion to another, always conveying himself where the Fire was the brifkeft; animating his Troops with his Hand, his Sword, and his Voice; ordering them above all Things, instead of firing, to use their Pikes, their Bayonets and their Swords; till at last our brave Musqueteers, thoroughly resolved to conquer or die, having forced their Enemies to turn their Backs and penetrated into the: Wood, remained intirely victorious by the general Flight of the Enemy; who, throwing down their Arms, abandoned the Field of Battle and the Wood, leaving all to the Mercy of the Conquerors, who now beat a Retreat, to cause our Troops who pursued the Enemy too hotly, to return and draw up in Rank and File, according to his Majesty's Order.

The King was well ferved by Major-General Sparr, and by all his brave Officers and Soldiers, who, in reality, performed Wonders at this violent Attack; where, notwithstanding the Rain, the Fire of the Enemy was very terrible.

His Majesty had always by his Side the Prince of Wurtenberg, General Poniatowski and Colonel Wangersheim, who never quitted the facred Person of our Hero; tho' the Prince was hardly recovered of a Wound he had received near the River Berezina almost three Weeks before.

Let us take a fhort Survey of the Cavalry who had advanced a League beyond the Attack of the Foot; and where his Majesty came, after the whole was over. We had very credible Informations, that his Excellency Count Rheinschild, seeing the Difficulty he found to make our Regiments of Horse defile and advance through the River Babiecz, and that on the other Side, his Majesty was briskly engaged. with the Enemy's Foot, took instantly the King's Drabans and four Squadrons of his own Regiments of Body-Dragoons, who had passed the River. first, and charged so stoutly with these Swedes the whole Bodies of the Enemies Horse and Dragoons of the left Wing, amounting to eleven thousand Men, forming one hundred and thirty Squadrons, and commanded by Goltz, that he had no Time to recollect himfelf, nor to fend for Succour to that Body of Foot which the Knez Repnin, as we have said, commanded.

Our victorious Squadrons advanced with so much Force and Impetuosity, that the Horse-Guards and the two Squadrons of Dabldorff had all the Disficulty in the World to follow in Order, to support them at all Events: so that in this Action the five first Squadrons, and especially the Drabans, who were all the Time surrounded by the Enemies, suffered and lost much the most; and so did the Regiment of Guards among the Infantry.

Amongst those of Note who were killed on our Side, we may reckon Major General Wrangel, Captain-Lieutenant of the Drabans, and Quarter-Master Wattrang, of the same Corps; Messieurs Horn, Palpitzki, Palmback, Barkmann and Damm; the Adjutant-General Claes Hierta, John Ankerbielm Captain of the Guards, Count Watchmeister, and others.

Amongst the wounded, were Count Poss Colonel of Guards, his Major Size:

ernbook,

ernbook, and eight Captains, of which Number was Baron Gyllenstierna, to whom his Majesty vouchsafed the Honour of his Horse, whence he dismounted in Order to mount this Officer, who was carried out of the Battle to have the Wounds dressed which he had received at the Attack of the Wood. The Lieutenant Colonels Ulffoarr and Wrangle, the first of Dabl-Carlia, and the second of Wesmanlanders; the Majors Ornstedt and Griesbach of the Dragoon-guards, and Dabl-Carlia, were also wounded, with thirty fix Drabans and forty-five Officers of the Guards. We lost in all but two hundred and fifty five common Soldiers, and had twelve hundred and nineteen wounded.

As to the Russians, we learnt from the Prisoners that they had near three thousand Officers and Soldiers killed, among which were the Generals Gallowin, Tschambre, and Von Sweden; and that their right Wing, which was entirely cut off from the left, had retreated at three in the Asternoon under the Command of Scheremetof, Ronn and Rensel, without firing a Piece, and marched towards the Town of Schlowa on the Dnieper, where their Army reassembled in a Body, in order to retire beyond Mobilow.

We took twelve Pieces of Brass Cannon, all their Ammunition and Baggage, two pair of Kettle Drums, and some Colours; most of which were taken by the Regiment of Guards, which acted Wonders.

His Majesty, having ordered the Enemy's Cavalry to be pursued for some Time, who sometimes turned about in their Flight string at an hundred Paces or a greater Distance, and afterwards flying with the utmost Speed to save themselves, now recalled those that were in the Pursuit, and incamped this and the following Nights in the Enemy's Intrenchments; where we returned Thanks to God for the Victory which he had granted us.

Thus ended this Day so glorious both to the Arms and Person of his Majesty, whose Valour, supported by the Courage and Bravery of his Troops, gave the Russians to understand, with what ill Judgment they had compared their Forces to ours.

The Prince of Wurtenburg had a particular Rencounter at the Beginning of the Action. An Officer of the Enemy's Foot well mounted, having rode forth from his Ranks, cried out to the Prince, without knowing him, Venez ici, si vous etes un brave bomme, If you are a brave Man, come bither. He had scarce ended his Defiance, when this brave Prince, who defired no more, giving Spurs to his Horse, received a Pistol shor which pass'd by him, and in the same Moment ran his Sword up to the Hilt into the Officer's Body, who fell dead from his Horse.

The Drabans, to the Number of one hundred and twenty Men, performed the most extraordinary Feats of Valour in this Battle, where ten or twelve joined together formed little Squadrons, and with a terrible Force which nothing was able to resist, overthrew and trampled on whole Squadrons of the Enemy. They made ten subsequent Attacks in this Manner; they suffered the most from the Calmucks, who, always falling on their Backs while they were engaged, did them much the most considerable Damage.

Amongst the wounded, the Majority had three or four Wounds; nay, some of them carried ten or eleven glorious Marks of their Bravery out of the Battle. The Enemy had thirty . Battalions in the Field, eighteen of which only were engaged, which were routed, as we have faid, by our three Their left Wing was Regiments. composed of eleven thousand Dragoons, their right of feven thousand feven hundred Horse; besides which, they had four thousand Calmucks; their whole Number amounted to many more than thirty thousand Men.

The Czar arrived in his Army two Days after the Action, and was so incensed at the Loss of a Battle where his Troops were to superior in Number, that he fetched out all those who were wounded in the Back, and made them draw Lots; those who drew a black Lot were immediately shot, which fad Fate happen'd to many of them.

As foon as we had buried our dead. and were joined by the rest of the Army, his Majesty on the seventh of July decamped, facing towards Mobilow on the Dnieper, where he arrived the ninth, after having passed six Leagues of very bad Road, which gave the Enemy Time to place the Dnieper between them and us; who demolishing all the Bridges behind them, marched towards Smolen ko.

The current Report being; that his Majesty intended to penetrate into Rustia on the Side of Smolensko, the Czar caused his Armies to ravage all that Part of the Country, that we might be unable to follow them. our Troops being 'now arrived by diverse Routs, were so posted, that the most distant were not above a League from Mobilow; under which Town his Majesty encamped with most of his Regiments.

The King on his Arrival at Mobilow, immediately ordered two Bridges to be built for the Passage of the Dnie. per: the Readiness with which they were finished, gave Room to believe that we should pursue the Enemy. But as the Troops were extremely faint and fatigued, not only by their violent Marches, but also for want of Food, and above all by that continual Rain which had fallen every Day during fix Weeks, and had been followed by very cold Nights; and as we found fome Subfiltence in Mobilous and the neighbouring Places, his Majesty resolved to rest here some Weeks for the refreshing his Troops (amongst which there were many fick) and likewife to give the wounded Time for their Cure.

Nothing remarkable passed during our Stay at Mobilow, unless the Disturbances which were frequently given us by the Calmucks; who fometimes swam across the River, and carried off our Horses out of their Pastures.

We found at Mobilow several Notes scattered abroad, by which great Recompence was promifed to fuch Swedes as would desert. These Promises however made no Impression on our Troops, who despised such Devices. We had here an Opportunity of renewing an epistolary Correspondence with our Friends, which had been interrupted for some Time; and here his Majesty gave Orders that a great Part of the Records of the Chancery should be fent to Stockholm.

As to King Stanislans, he had bent his his Course towards Groduo, by very flow Marches, not more than two or three Leagues a Day, designing to reach the Camp of the Lithuanian Army near Briesowa. At Groduo several Deputies of the Palatinates came to offer him their Submission.

This Prince proceeded to Prusha, and on the fifth of July arrived at Elbing, and the eighth at Marienbourg, where the Queen of Poland his Spoule came to meet him. The Town of Dantzick sent four Deputies to him with their Compliments. He resolved to wait for the Conjunction of the Sweedish Regiments to act against Siniamski, who with his Body of Troops, after having encamped some Weeks at Nisko, had marched to Lublin, and Brezia Cujawski, to join those Lithumanian Malecontents who were under the Command of Poczici.

On the other Hand Count Lowenbaspi prepared to join his Majesty with his Body of the Army; affembled in Livenia and Courland, and bring with him Provision and Ammunition for us for three Months; but this Goneral marched very flowly, on Account of the great Number of loaded Waggons which he brought with him, and as he was always harafled in his March by General Baver. His Majefly therefore perceiving, that all was confumed in this Country, and that his People could not wait the Arrival of Count Lowenbaupt without perishing with Hunger, after having gathered together all the remaining Provifions for the Regiments, refolved to pass the Dnieper to meet this General, to whom he fent Orders to endeavour the fame Conjunction.

On the fifth of August his Majesty passed the River over a Bridge, followed by the Regiment of Guards and some other Foot Regiments, and leaving the Road to Horki or Gorki to the left, encamped at half a League from Mobilow.

The Calmucks, who were concealed in the Woods, only observed our Motions this first Day, and endeavoured here and there to carry off a little Pillage. The two following Days the rest of the Army continued to pass the Dhieper, and then broke down the Bridge.

The eighth, the Army marched to One Rewisz, situated on this side of a little River called Rosta. On the ninth we celebrated a Day of solemn Falt and Prayer.

The tenth we proceeded some Leagues towards Stolki, where our advanced Guards were posted within League and a half of the Enemy. Here we halted four Days, during which the Calmucks often attempted to harafs us; but they did little more Harm, than the carrying off a few Horses and Servans.

Horles and Servanes. The feventeenth, his Majesty de-Joki, on the little River Pronia. The Enemy continued still to abandon all those Towns which might have made some Relistance, burning, destroying, and facking all i to that we found on all' Sides 'nothing but the most sad Ruins, and the Country a most horrible Defart. "This' occasioned great Scarcity among the Soldiers, were compelled to make Use of all Manner of Means for their Subfiftence cutting the Corn themselves when they found any, afterwards thrashing, grinding it in Hand-mills, baking and eating if directly, which required a good deal of Time and Labour.

This Evening his Majesty was advised, that a large Body of Russian Dragoons was but a League's Distance, that General Goltz with the rest of the Cavalry was posted three Leagues beyond, and that General Island was marched towards the Ukrain with seven Regiments, whilst the Czar himfelf was posted with his Infantry at Micistan, whence he afterwards returned towards Sosta.

The next day being the eighteenth, the Valoches returned with twelve Prifoners and a Major, named Du Caille, who had commanded a Party of an hundred and fixty Muscovite Dragoons, the greater Part of which were cut to Pieces. We learnt from the Major, and the Orders in writing which were found upon him, that the Enemy intended to throw a Bridge over the Solfa, near the Town of Czerikowa, in order to pass the River.

The ameteenth, the Army advance ed only two Leagues to Drakowka, and the next Day encamped at Labonowa, a League and a half; whence they proceeded one League on the twenty first to Czerikowa, and encamped at a little Distance from the Town. Near this Town, which was stuated on this Side of the Solla, General Room was just arrived with sifteen thousand Rustans in order to pass the River there, over which he had thrown three sloating Bridges; when our Valoches, having come up with his Rear-guard, consisting of eight Squadrons, attacked them with so much Valour, that they were pushed into a Desile, where the Rustans standing their Ground, gave our Valoches fo warm a Recepsion, that they were on the Point of being dispersed, when our van-guard advanced to their Succour, and put the Enemy to Flight, with great Slaughter.

General Ronn lest behind him at this Pals, a great Number both of Men and Horles, which, by Realon of the Fatigues which they had undergone in all their Marches, were not in a Condition to follow him. The greatest Part of his Baggage was likewise lolt, and the Pealants of the neighbouring Countries had five hundred of his Waggons to their Share; the Valoches took eighteen, with a Quantity of Tents, a Number of Horles and Camels. Some Coaches foll of the Wives of German Officers fell likewise into their Hands, but after having plundered the Coaches, they lot the Ladies go.

General Goltz marched some Leagues higher to pass the Soffa, and so join the Czar; who, as we have said, was posted at Micistaw.

The next Day being the twentyfecond of August, some hundreds of Russian Dragoons baving had the Boldness to pass one of their floating Bridges, and post themselves on our Side of the River; his Majesty ordered fifty Men of his Regiment of Guards, who were the nearest at Hand, to march immediately, who obliged them to return the same Way with great Speed, leaving some of their Men behind them. This Detachment of fifty Men likewise lost some, and had others wounded.

It was believed, his Majesty would have pass'd the Soffa here; but having lest Czerikowa on his right, he turned towards Micislaw, and advanced a League and a half to Sori. The next Day the Army marched to Kullobin.

On this Rout we surprized a Detachment of Goliz's Army, which we never ceased pursuing; and killed thirty Men and took seven Prisoners.

The same Day a Column of our Army, composed of a Regiment of Artillery, two Regiments of Horse of Stania, and a Regiment of Foot of Stadermanland, met on their Way a Brigade of the Enemy consisting of eight thousand Men. Colonel Ornsted had no sooner perceived the Enemy, than he advanced instantly with two Squadrons of his Regiment of South-Scania, and attacked the Rear of that Brigade with so much Valour, that after having killed about fifty Men, he drove the rest home to the main Body of their Troops.

The Enemy being then posted near a Desile, which they sortified with some sield-pieces, they made a Feint of intending to hazard a Battle; but as soon as our Colonel began to playing his Cannon on the Desile; they lost their Courage, and retreated in Haste to Slabatko, two Leagues from thence.

The King having halted one Day at Kulloblin, decamped and marched to Pattrinowka, where Galtz would have passed the Sossa, but was hindered by our close Pursuit. The King halted one Day, and then came to Malatiza.

The Czar, after having quitted Micislaw, kept even Pace with us along the other Side of the Sossa, which he passed and repassed at many Places to observe our Motions. At length, on the same Day whereon we arrived at Patvinowks, this Prince encamped at Dobro, on the little River of Bialana, one League from Melezier, where he intrenched himself to attend the Conjunction of his Forces.

The near Approach of the two Armies occasioned a very smart Battle, which happened some days after our Arrival at Malatiza. Major General Roos was encamped with his Column confisting of the Regiment of Horse of Offrogoths, and the Regiments of Foot of Westrozoths, Nerika, Westerbothn, and Jonkioping, about half a League from the Head-quarters on the River of Nappa, or Cxarnapata, in a Place secured by very large Bogs, through which his Majesty had determined to pass to attack the Czar; who being informed of the Separation of this Column from the rest of the Army, resolved to surprize them. For this Purpose, he caused a Kind of Ponton to be made with little Trees interwoven in the Form of Mats, in order to throw over the Bogs, into which they likewise cast a Quantity of Fascines; and he ordered the Knez Gallizin, with the Generals Ronn and Pflug, to march at the Head of ten Battalions and three Regiments of Dragoons (all of his best Troops) to attack Roos.

This Detachment found great Difficulty in passing the Morals and the River; but having at length accomplished it under the Favour of a thick Fog, which hindered us from perceiving their Approach, they surprized our Regiments at six in the Morning in their Camp, where they attacked us with all possible Fury.

The Regiment of Foot of Jonkioping, commanded by Buchwald, was first ranged in Order of Battle, and ustained at first among the Tents the edoubled Attacks of the Enemy with so much Valour, that they gave Time up. The Business being at an end, our to the Westrogoths to advance to their Assistance. The two other Regiments coming at the same Time had their Share in the Business, as well as the Regiment of Horse; the Battle be-: came very bloody and obstinate, and lasted two Hours, with a dreadful Slaughter on both Sides.

The King having heard the Fire, gave immediate Orders to several Regiments to march to the Assistance of Roos; to whom he haltened himself. followed by the Prince of Wurtenberg and several other Generals, to partake in the Action, which yet continued very brisk. The Regiment of Dahl-Carlers arriving the first, made so furious a Discharge on the Russian Foot, that they gave Ground, and made a retreating Fight, forming themselves into a long hollow Square towards the Morals, in order to repals it.

At which instant Prince Wurtenberg having proposed to his Majesty to attack the Enemy's Flank, the King gave him Orders to take the Regiment of Dragoons of Hielm, for that Purpose. These having wheeled a little, dismounted and attacked the Enemy with such terrible Fury (the Regiment of Dabl-Carlers under Siegroth, pursuing at the same Time their first Blow) that the Muscovite Foot endeavoured to fave themselves cross the Morass, whither their Cavalry had shewn them the Way. They quitted the Field of Battle with such Precipitation, as differed very little from a Flight or general Rout; and returned into their Camp, leaving great Numbers in the Morais, where they funk, and were killed by the But-ends of Muskets and Fuzees as foon as the Fog. was, cleared

Regiments returned quietly into their

Camp:

We lost many brave Officers on this Occasion. Mr. Rosenstierna. Colonel of Oftrogoth Horse, was killed at the first Attack, with many other Officers. Count Jasper Sperling, and Colonel Buchwald were dangeroufly Colonel Arfwidson, and wounded. Lieutenant-Colonel Ulfsparr, were flightly hurt. We had at most two hundred and fixty one Soldiers killed, and seven hundred and fifty wounded.

The Enemy by their own Confession had six hundred Men killed. without reckoning the wounded, which were more than a thousand. Amongst their Officers of Note who fell on the Spot, were Prince Dolgoruki, Colonel Campen, Major Wogeknowski, and some others.

The Russians however loudly proclaimed, that they had got the Advantage; and to impose on the Publick, the Czar honoured the Knez Repnin with the Order of St. Andrew.

The King of Sweden gave an hundred Crowns to a fingle Soldier, who cast himself into the Bog and killed a Russan Officer that had taken a Pair of Smedish Colours; and afterwards advanced him on the first Opportunity.

On the third of September, having first buried the Dead, the King decamped; and as foon as he had paffed Nappa, or Czarnapata, he encamped at a Quarter of a League from thence, at a Place called Walowniki.

The same Day Count Rheinschild Velt-Marshal, accompanied with many Generals, went to reconnsitre the

Czar's

Czar's Camp; but he found that Prince had quitted Dobro two Days before, and was retired towards Smolensko, having left behind him some thousand of Costacks who had orders to attend us with a flying Camp.

On the fourth, we came to Bezvo-dice, and the next Day to Ivony, always following the Czar's Rout, in order to oblige him at last to stand his Ground; so that we encamped those two Days on the same Spot where the Russians had encamped the Evening before. At Ivony we halted till the eighth, on which the Army advanced to Raikowa.

We shall see the Continuation of this March in the following Letter, written by the Author to the Duke of ...

MY LORD,

 I had the Honour to write to your Serene Highness, the tenth of No-"vember, by a Courier, which the Field-master Mazeppa sent to his ⁴ Majesty the King of Poland. That Letter was very short; but I had at that Time no Opportunity to write a longer. I embrace the present Occasion with Pleasure, since I am now sable to fend your Serene Highness a faithful Recital of what hath happened to us: for we have hitherto been able to give no Account of ourselves, whilst our Enemies, as some Letters which we have intercepted inform us, have not been backward in pub-'lishing Reports very much to our Disadvantage.

To continue this Journal, I shall go back to the Month of September, and shall begin by entertaining your Serene Highness with the Particulars of a Rencounter, which his Majesty had with a large Detachment of the Enemy the tenth of this Month.

Your Serene Highness is to be informed, that the Army marched that Day in several Columns; for we had no open Plains to pass over. When we were advanced a League, we came to a Bridge near a Mill, which the Enemy who had fet fire to it, had not had Time to burn entirely.

'The Column which the King led having pass'd a Bridge, perceived the Enemy's Troops on the left. was General Baver's Brigade, which had attended and observed us during our March, which gave the King a Delire of chacing them. Column which was placed to the left of the Army, ought to have been near at Hand; but was fo far behind, that it could give us no Assistance. The King therefore putting himself at the Head of the Offrogoth Horse, 4 which was of his own Column, haftened to the Enemy, who had hid ' feventy Squadrons behind fome little Woods. The King foon overthrew those he attacked, but found himself invironed by a greater Number, without reckoning Cossacks and Calmucks.

The Battle became obstinate, and the King's Person was never exposed to such Danger as now. Whilst the Squadron which the King led was surrounded on all Sides, and had nothing lest but to break through Sword in Hand, his Majesty's Horse was unluckily killed under him. By divine Providence, which was careful to preserve his Majesty, Adjutant-General Thuro Hard, who sought by his side, was killed at that Instants so that the King instantly took his Horse, and continued the Battle till the Arrival of a greater Number of of his Troops, who foon decided the Affair, breaking the Enemy and forcing them to give back. Many were killed on both Sides; and Adjutant Rosenstierna, whom the King had fent at the Beginning to bring up the Horse, as he was returning at the Head of a Squadron, was wounded, and died a sew Hours afterwards.

'His Highnels the Prince of War-' tenberg was that Day in great Danger of being taken Prisoner, he had headed a Squadron and led them to the Charge; but when they came so the Attack, this Prince hurried into the Midst of the Enemy, whom he ' now faw himself obliged to follow for some Time as one of their own 'Party. By good Luck, the Smoke and Dust prevented his being known, and when the Troops returned to the 'Charge, the Prince disengaged him-* felf at the Price of the commanding "Officer's Life, into whom he planged his Sword up to the Hilts and then giving Spurs to his Horse, reioined the Swedes, the Enemy having fent several Shot after him to no "Effect.

* Colonel Dabldorff distinguished himself very eminently in this Rencounter. After our Horse had purfued the Enemy for some Time, the King commanded them to stop at a Morais, which separated the two Parties. We were then advanced a League beyond the Foot, and the Baggage; but his Majesty resolved to return and encamp near the Villages of Atokki and Raikowa.

We were but half a League's Distance from the Frontiers of Musteown Country, laid all the Towns and Villages in Ashes, destroying every Thing for a Circumference of ten or twelve Miles; so that nothing but Fire was seen any where, and the Air was so darkened with the Smoke, that we could hardly see the Sun.

'On the eleventh his Majesty decamped with the Army, and proceeded a League on that Side, where the Battle had been fought the Day before; but past not the Frontiers, coasting along their Side only, and fat down near a Town called Stariabi, where we stayed some Days, as well to give our Army a little Repose, as to procure them some Bread, of which the Scarcity encreased considerably. As the Peafants have a Custom among them of keeping all their Corn under Ground. we applied ourselves to seeking at out, grinding it, and making it into Bread; the Cossacks at the same Time giving daily Molestation to our Guands and Foragers.

'The Czar with the gross of the Musicovite Army, which consisted of Horse, was retired some Leagues off, but Velt Marshal Scheremethof had gained Smolensko with the major Part of the Foot, in his Way to which Place he cut down a Wood, in order to that out the King from passing through that Country.

The King, who hitherto had flattered himself that he should be able to bring the Czar to a pitch'd Battle, saw by this Play that he should never accomplish it, and that he should suffer too much by advancing any farther; he resolved therefore to penetrate by another Rout, viz. by the Dutchy of Severia, that was difficult, leading through Forests almost impassible.

As it was necessary to get before the Enemy, his Majesty detached Major General Lagercrond with four thousand five hundred Horse and Foot, and six pieces of Cannon, with Orders to advance in the Front to-wards the Town of Krulsebbw, and to repair the Roads for facilitating the March of the Army, and also to throw Bridges over the River Sof-

Mt. Lidgercrona marchied out of the Camp of Starichi in the Night bowsen the fourteenth and fifteenth of September, and the King followed in the Morning with all the Army, which marched in feveral Columns. We gained four Leagues that Day, and strived at the Village of Bibrize, palfing through Milikowa, whence we had before come. From hence the King continued his March on the fixteenth to Wolofniki, and so on the leventeenth to Horbatka through the Town of Malacziza, where we rested the eighteenth.

From Fiorbatka we marched on the innercenth to Kruisebos, where Mr. Lagurarona had laid two Bridges; he was now ordered to go on farther, and cross the shortest of the Forests on that Rout which divided Severia from Lisbuania, to possess himself of the Road, and secure the Passage over the River Ipoon (Obiece in the Map), whence he was to gain the Town of Poinsppo, which covers the Country on Smolenskow Side, through which the Enemy must pass into Se-

• veria.

The King passed the Sossa at Kruischof, the very Day of his Arrival, on which we proceeded three Leagues farther to Lobza. After our Passage of the Sossa, we entered forthwith into a Wood of above twenty Leagues extent, and where Mr. Lagercrona was milled by the Peasants:
for having swerved too much to the right, he entirely declined from the Rout which was preseribed him, and fell into that which was ordained to Count Lowenbaupt, to whom the King sent Orders to pass the Sossa it Proposse.

The King, who marched on the twentieth from Lobna to the Village of Buda immediately conceived that Lagercrond had miffed his Way, because he heard no more Newsorkim; so being arrived on the twenty first from Buda at Korthovice he left his Baggage behind, and advanced with the Regiment of Guards, the Dabi-Carlers, and the Rear guard of Lagercrona's Party, being three hundled Horse commanded by a Major, who by Accident had taken the right Road.

His Majesty on the twenty second and twenty third proceeded and entred into Severia, passing the little River of Bieses at a Ford, there being no Bridge. In the first Village called Niuna, his Majesty reposed himself, and was joined by the Count and the Drabans, but the Baggage followed slowly, being effected by the Regiment of Upland and other Troops.

The King staid not long at Niuna; and having fent the Major before with the three hundred Horse of Lagercrona's Detachment, to render himself Master of the Pass of the Ipooz; he followed very early on the twenty fourth, and encamped near the River Ipooz, in the Village of Drakowa, two Leagues from Niwna. On the twenty fifth, the Bridge over the Ipooz being finished, he continued his March a League farther to Kossinice, where we came forth from the great Wood, and began to discover a better Country.

The King waited here fifteen Days for his Army, who arrived by Degrees, having suffered a little in the Forest.

The Czar surprised to see his Enemy turn back, flattered himself at first that they were returned into · Libuania; but being advertised of his passing the Solla at Kruischow he was too much convinced that the King of Sweden intended for Sovefig. As it was his Interest to prevent him, he instantly dispatched Major-General Island at the Head of four thousand Horse, with Orders so march Day and Night till he had got before the Swedes, and to throw fome Troops into the Towns of Severia, which are fortified after the Manner of that Country, with Ramparts overcast with Wood, and a Moat.

This Muscovite General was followed presently by Lieutenant-General Roun, at the Head of six Regiments of Dragoons; and these two Commanders marched above thirty Leagues in three Days. Velt-Marshal Scheremethof, having with him Goliz, Allart, Renzel, and other Generals, followed Island and Roun, with that Body of Foot which had on-camped under Smolenske, all marching as fast; as possible.

'General Baver, who was with the 'Czar's Army, was detached with fix thousand Horse, who were to follow close at the Heels of the King. He fell in near the Town of Kraischof with our Rear-gard, under the Command of Major-General Cruus, which he ordered Major-General Michos with two thousand Dragoops to attack. Michos was so smartly received by Lieutenant-Colonel Grathuser, who made Head against him with some few Squadrons only, that he lost three hundred Men on the Spot; after which, retreating with Precipitze tion, he had no Stomach to a second Atmck.

The Czar who had kept his best Troops with him, knowing that General Lowenbaupt had not yet joined the King's Army, and that this General was in full March to pass the Dnieger, resolved to go and attack him, and to cut off his March towards sosa, which Lowenbaupt had Orders to pass at Propost, or elsewhere if he had found it more convenient.

per on the twenty second and twenty third of September, drawing seconding to his Orders directly towards the Sossa, though he doubted not but that the Enemy would attack him.

of the twenty fixth the Van-guard of the Enemy appeared; and the twenty feventh and twenty eighth passed in little Skirmishes, wherein the Enemy was always beaten. On the twenty ninth, Count Longenhaups having gained forme Ground of them, notwithstanding the heavy Baggage, Baggage, and Quantity of Waggons loaded with Provisions for three Months, which he drew after him, was at no greater Distance than two Leagues from Proposisk, when the gross of the Enemy's Army presented itself before him, and against which he made Head, as your Serene Highness will see by the following Relation which I have the Honour to send you."

A true Relation of the bloody Battle fought near Liesna in the Palatinate of Micislaw, two Leagues from Propoisk, between the Troops of his Swedish Majesty, commanded by Count Adam-Lewis Lowenhaupt, and the Russian Army commanded by his Czarish Majesty and his principal Generals, on the twenty ninth of September 1708.

After Count Lowenbaupt had received Orders to pass with his Army thro' Propoisk and Starodub, in order to go and join his Majesty, he passed the Dnieper the twenty first and twenty third of September near Sklow, over a Bridge of Boats, though the Czar who lay with his Army near Horki, Drebben and Romanow, ten Leagues from Sklow, might have easily disputed the Passage.

The first Day this General pursued his March without any Molestation from the Enemy; but on the next some of their Troops appeared, and on the twenty fifth about two thousand Dragoons approached to attack our Rear guard, which consisted of three hundred Horse, and as many Foot; but as soon as our Rear guard faced about to receive them, they durst not attack us, but retired in Haste.

On the twenty fixth the Army arrived near Bieliza, which is a very difficult and dangerous Pass. Here the Enemy appeared in great Numbers. General Lowenbaupt gave Orders to place the Baggage in the Front, where it proceeded with a Number of Troops to guard it, and he followed himself at the Head of the Regiments. The same Order was observed on the twenty seventh.

As we were now informed that all the Enemy's Cavalry was at Hand, the Count de Lowenbaupt presently ranged his own on two Lines, and placed his Foot in the Rear in a Valley where they were hid from the Enemy: When the Battle was begun, these were to enter at some Openings which the Horse left between the Squadrons. This Disposition disconcerted the Enemy, who were ranged in order of Battle, and did not expect this Motion. General Lowenbaupt. who instantly perceived the Order in which they stood, went to the right, and Major-General Stackelberg to the Ieft, and marched at the same Time wish the two Lines to attack the Enemy, who turned their Backs and ran away full Speed. We followed them half a League without being able to overtake them; but Lieutenant-Colonel Zoge, who was in our Front with fome Squadrons, and who briskly purfued their Rear-guard, had the good Fortune to overtake fome of the hind-. most, of whom he killed many, and brought off eight Prisoners.

We learnt from the Prisoners, that the Horse we had pursued was commanded by Menzikof and Pflug, who led the Van; and that the Czar follow-Ddd ed

ed with the whole Army. This made Lowenbaupt resolve to pursue his Way, which he did, with a thousand Difficulties, on account of the continual Desiles, and the deep and almost unpassable Morasses, which very much retarded his March, and occasioned the General to give Orders to his Troops to lie this Night on their Arms in the open Field, to be ready on any Accident.

The Enemy hastened their March to that Degree, that on the twenty eighth in the Morning they began a fresh Attack on our Rear-guard, which received them so briskly, not only by the Fire of their small Arms, but likewife from their Cannon, (having placed two Pieces behind a Defile, thro' which their March lay) that they could make no Impression, and were at last obliged to let us follow our March; and though the Enemy afterwards tried at different Places, especially on a Bridge which our Men had laid over a little River, to attack us with all their Force, they were nevertheless every where repulsed with great Valour, though they had already received their Cannon, and tho' the Czar was come up with all the Foot.

After we had placed the Baggage in a fafe Situation, the Horse marched first, and then the Foot, drawing towards Liesna, where we arrived at four in the Evening, and encamped here on a narrow Spot of Ground. The General immediately ordered the Troops which formed the Van-guard, to set about repairing the Bridges over the Morals, which was near our Camp, and to repair the Roads through a Wood, where the Enemy had thrown down a great Quantity of Trees, that he might open and render the Rout to Proposifk more commodious for the next Day.

As we were apprifed, while we were taking these Measures, that some of the Enemy's Troops had already posted themselves at Proposite, and that some other Detachments were passing by us, General Lowenhaupt thought proper, on the twenty ninth at Break of Day, to detach Quarter-Master-General Brask with seven hundred Horse and Foot drawn out of different Regiments, together with the Regiment of Foot of Abo Lebn, and the Dragoons of Carelia and Schreiterfelt. These Troops had orders to advance in the Front, and were followed by half the Baggage, and that Detachment which was to guard it. Next marched the Regiment of Horse of Abo Lebn, the Dragoons of Colonel Skog, and Colonel Leyon with the Buttalion of Nyland, who were followed by the other half of the Baggage. The rest of the Army remained on the Borders of the Wood, to watch the Motions of the Enemy, and prevent their attacking the Baggage.

The Enemy had found Means to defile and draw up all their Forces in order of Battle in the Wood, which, not being very thick, afforded Room enough for their Troops. They came out upon us all at once, without our expecting them, and began their Attack about eleven o'clock.

Our General after visiting the Ground and viewing the Situation of the Field of Battle, drew up his Foot facing the Wood, and being himself dismounted at the Head of his own Regiment of Foot, and the Battalions of Helsingois Helfingois and Abo Lehn, he led them on, ordering the other Regiments to fecond him; as likewife all the Troops which were on this Side the Pass near the Baggage to join him. When they were at about Musquet-shot Distance from the Enemy, the General mounted and rode towards the Horse, who at the same Time with the Foot attacked the Enemy with such Fury and Success, that they were forthwith compelled to give Ground, and were at last driven out of the Wood where we took four Pieces of Cannon.

So happy a Beginning extremely animated the Troops, and made them hope for a speedy Defeat of the Enemy. But as they were infinitely our Superiours in Number, and were every Moment bringing up fresh Troops against us, it happened by Mistake, and through the Fault of an Officer, that the Swedes, who were already Masters of the Wood, instead of being feconded according to the General's Orders, were led back during his Abfence over the Plain towards those other Regiments who were advancing to support them. This not only occafioned some Confusion, but gave the Enemy, who were reinforced by fresh Troops, an Opportunity to reposses themselves of the Wood, and to point their Cannon.

Count Lowenbaupt, in despair at this Mistake, had now no other Course lest him but to advance his Artillery, which struck such a Terror into the Rushans, that they retired, and did not dare to make use of their Advantage. Colonel Wrangle was afterwards ordered to attack the Enemy's fresh Body with all the Regiments of Foot that were present, in order to drive them out of the Wood. On our Attempt to penetrate into the Wood, the Mulcovites came forth on the Plain, forming themselves into four Lines of Foot, which were ranged behind one another. We attacked them with such Fury, that having staggered the first Line, we drove them back on the fecond, which pushed back the others; being thus driven into the Wood, where they met with a Support of fresh Troops; and having Advantage of the Trees and the Bushes, it was impossible for our Foot, notwithstanding all the Efforts they made, to push them farther.

Whilst our Foot were performing Wonders, our Horse overthrew the Enemy's Squadrons as often as they advanced to the Charge, and orsen pushed them as far as the Wood, where they were always supported by their Foot, without whose Assistance they would have come very ill off.

This Battle lasted from Noon till Night, in which the Enemy was always driven back into the Woods with great Loss, as often as they came forth, notwithstanding the fresh Troops which they brought up against us, and which continually relieved. were three principal Actions, the Foot returning every Time ranged in four Lines, and the Horse which formed the two Wings in five or fix, whilst we had only a fingle Line to oppose them with, the rest of our Troops having, as is already faid, gone forward with the Baggage. This Line moreover was not long enough to prevent the Enemy's flanking it, which did not fail to happen during the three Actions, in which fix thousand Swedes fustained from the Beginning a most Ddd2 dreadful dreadful Fire, from an Army five times at leaft their superiors in Number, reckoning only the Muscovites.

In the first Action, when the Enemy's Foot attempted to follow the · Swedish Regiments which were drawn -back, as we have faid, out of the "Wood into the Plain, without the Knowledge of the General, and contrary to his Orders, our Horse sell on them Sword in Hand, and touted them in such a Manner, that quitting their Ranks they fled with Precipitation into the Wood. The Enemy's Horse being advanced behind to support the Foot, had the same Fate, and were driven back with like Force a great Way among the Trees, without giving them Time to recover their Order, till they were at last supported by their Foot.

In the second Action, the Swedish Foot, as we have seen, not only over-threw the four Lines of Foot on the Plain, but pursued them a great Way within the Wood; where the Enemy bringing up fresh Troops, and making Use of their Cannon, obliged our Regiments to retreat, which they did however in good Order. Our Horse at the same Time repulsed those of the Enemy with equal Success; though some of our Squadrons being advanced too far into the Wood, suffered a little from the Enemy's Foot.

At the third general Shock, the Enemy made their last and greatest Efforts, leading on fresh Troops just arrived to attack our six thousand Swedes, who quite spent with Fatigue, and being so much their Inferiours in Number, could not hinder them from making themselves Masters of the Pass towards Propossk; but when our Regiments which had marched in the Front, and were already advanced a League and a half, having received Orders to turn back to our Affistance, had returned and joined us; we attacked the Enemy all together with so much Valour, that they were put to flight, and lost on this Occasion seventeen Standards, and two pair of Kettle-Drums. which we took in the Rout. same time our Cannons, which were charged with Musquet-balls, made such terrible Havock, especially on a Regiment which was cloathed in green, and advanced beyond the others, that the Ground was covered over with dead Bodies, very few escaping.

After this Battle, the General having drawn up his Army, stood on the Field till very late at Night, to see if the Enemy had any farther Design of attacking him; but they were too much dismayed by the last Action, seeing that all their Efforts which had cost them so many Lives had been fruitles; for they were forced to abandon the Field of Battle: they began therefore to retreat, sirst with the lest Wing of their Army, and afterwards with all their Foot, penetrating farther into the Wood where they kindled several Fires.

This Retreat of the Enemy caused a Resolution in General Lowenbaupt, who thought not proper to attack them again on this Spot, to continue his March; hoping to find on his Rout a more advantageous Ground, in case that the Enemy had a Desire to follow him, and to give him Battle a second Time. So after having stood some Hours in order of Battle; he caused Vespers to be said quietly, and then gave Orders to the Regiments to desile one after another another into the Road. This was all executed in good Order; nor did the Enemy, who was drawn up in Battalia hard by, and faw all that was done, dare to molest us in the least Degree.

As several Waggons had run foul of each other during the Darkness of the Night, by which they stopt up the Way, and hindered the March of one Part of the Artillery which had ferved in the Battle and could not come on, the General ordered the Cannons to be funk in the Bogs, that the March might not be retarded. Near Propoisk our Regiments joined the greatest Part of the Baggage which was fent before; but as the Enemy had reduced this little Town to Ashes, and as we could not find any Wood to build a Bridge, and the Enemy's Troops began to appear facing us, the General took a Refolution to turn on one Side; and reflecting on the Difficulty of dragging along with him a valt Quantity of Baggage, with which he was to pass three Rivers, and Woods of twenty Leagues in length, where the Enemy might always stop him by every Moment haraffing and retarding his March, he ordered the best Part of the Baggage, and such as could conveniently be carried on, to be preferved, and the rest with all the Waggons to be destroyed. This was executed directly, and the General having distributed the Baggage Horses among the Foot, continued his Journey.

It was impossible on this Occasion to hinder several of the Soldiers and Servants from intoxicating themselves with Wine, Brandy and other Liquors, which occasioned them to lie behind, and for the most part fall into the Hands of the Cossacks; and I believe, one might safely say, that these were almost the only Prisoners made by the Enemy during the whole March.

Before we had quited Propoisk, an Alarm was spread of the Enemy's Ap-The General instantly orderproach. ed some Regiments to face about, which ranged themselves in order of Battle near the Town on a little Plain; but when he faw that they were only the Cossacks, he ordered his Men to defile through the Wood, all along the Side of the River, with Hopes to find an easy Place to pass the Sossa, which he did near the Village of Glewina, four Leagues from Proposite, where five hundred Horse swam over easily the same Night.

The next Day being the first of Ottober, the rest of the Troops swam over likewise; and now the whole Army having passed the River, the General pursued his March very commodiously thro those great Woods, and passed the Rivers of Biesez and Ipacs without any Opposition; and being at last arrived in the great Plains of Scheria, he rested his Troops.

As foon as General Lowenhaupt decamped on the tenth, to join his Majefty, General Von Worden attacked us with four thousand Horse; but was so well received that he retired in Confusion, after having lost upwards of four thousand Men, who were killed on the Spot. After this Rencounter, the General arrived the same Evening at Turkowa, where he found a Swediff Party arrived there before him, and on the thirteenth he joined the King at Rukowa, which was the Head Quarters

bove mentioned Battle was confiderable. Schultz, the Muscovite Adjutant-General, who was taken Prisoner fome Time afterwards, confess'd, that it amounted to upwards of fix thoufand Men, who were kill'd on the Spot; without reckoning the wounded, which were a much greater Number. Menzikoff's Brigade, confisting of fix Regiments, was almost entirely destroyed; as were the Regiments of the Czar's Guards of Preobrafinski. and Semenofski, which suffered terribly. Amongst the Persons of Note, the Prince of Hesse-Darmstadt, General Baver, and a great Number of Officers were wounded, and the first died of his Wounds. We had near three thousand Men killed, with many Officers of Distinction.

Count Lowenbaupt performed on this Occasion, whatever was in the Power of Valour or Conduct, exposing himself in all Places where the Fire was most violent. He received two Wounds, which did not however prevent him from staying in the Battle till it was

It is certainly a Truth, that our Troops never fought with more Bravery and Firmness, notwithstanding the extraordinary Inequality of Numbers, than on this Day; fix thousand Men having sustained the whole Efforts of more than thirty thousand, without staggering or losing one Foot of Ground, from Noon till Night: and the field of Battle was marshy, and also very close and streight; and that during the Fight itself, the Wind drove both Hail and Snow into the Eyes of our Soldiers, they defended themselves, notwithstanding all these Disadvantages, like Lions till the Night: so that we must have obtained a compleat Victory, if we had had more Room to act in, and if the General could have departed from the King's Orders, and instead of following his Majesty, as his Instructione were, through Woods and grievous Defiles, where it was easy for the Enemy to cut us off and harrass us every Minute, could have waited for them and attacked them with all his Forces on an advantagious Ground in an open Field. All those who were present at this bloody Battle, thought they could neve sufficiently admire how gloriously our Troops delivered themselves out of such difficult Straits.

Other Historians relate this Action more in favour of the Czar, who is laid • have gotten a complete Victory, and to have possessed himself of a vast Quantity of the Swedish Waggons; and that Lowenbaupt, who is agreed to have made a fine Retreat, brought no more than the fourth Part of his Men to the King. An Account, I think, not so probable as that given by our Author: for if this Army had been so nearly destroyed, it must have been an unpardonable Fault either in the Czar and his Generals, to have suffered those sew shattered Remains to have joined the King in an orderly Retreat.

'I shall only add, My Lord, to this 'Relation, that Prince Menzikoff being ordered to sollow Count Lowenbaupt and enter Severia on that Side, passed the Sossa near Hommel, and entered the Gountry through Czernikow. As to the Czar, he returned to Smolensko with the rest of his Army, and the Wounded, which were a great many.

I have told your Serene Highness, that his Majesty spent fifteen Days * at Koffinice. This Village is situated at the Entry of a great Wood, twelve Leagues from Starodub, and seven from Potschood. Notwithstanding. our utmost Diligence, the Enemy, if they did not get before us, at least entered along with us into the Coun-The first Step which Island took, was to possess himself instantly of Starodub and Potschope, to observe the future March of the Swedes, and burn all the Villages through which they were to pass.

'We were some Days at Kossinice before we had any News of Major-General Lagercrona, who instead of egoing out of the Wood near Posscopo, went out two Leagues from Starodub; fo that the Enemy had Time to take * all their Measures of Precaution, be-' fore his Arrival: when he afterwards took his Rout to join the King, he received Orders to return towards Starodub, in order to watch the Motions of the Muscovites who were fortifying themselves more and more, and to endeavour to prevent them from burning the Villages. " nel Hamilton was detached to join Lagercrona with a thousand Horse, that he might be in the better Condition to put a Stop to the Deso-Second representation of the lation which the Enemy were mak-'ing.

the King decamped from Kossinice the eleventh of October, and taking the Road to the Ukrain, he advanced the first, Day three Leagues to Bialaberst, where he remained till the twelfth. The Army marched in different Columns, all led by Major-Generals. From Bialaberst we went the thirteenth to Ruchowa, where Count Lowenhaupt with his Troops joined the King. The March was was continued on the fourteenth from Ruchowa to Skolkow, where the King commanded Colonel Albedbyl with twelve Squadrons to cover his March to the right, where Menzikof was, and to hinder the Enemy from burning the Country through which he was to pass.

On the fixteenth of Ottober, we marched from Skolkow two Leagues to Czerenkowa. On the eighteenth the King passed by the Town of Starodub to the right; the rest of the Army passing at the same Time on the lest Side of it. We made three Leagues to Kartuczina. The Enemy which was in Starodub came out that Day, and did some Mischief to our Baggage.

'From Kartuczina we went on the inineteenth to Panorofka, where we rested some Days. Here Mr. Lager, crona returned with his Party.

'Velt-Marshal Scheremethof in the " mean Time having entered the Country with his Foot, and having under him the Generals Goltz, Allart, Rene zel and others, kept up even with • the King's Army on the left, without daring to attack us; so that nothing fremarkable passed, unless that General Ifland baving with four Regiments of Dragoons taken Possession of a Pass " near that Column, which was led by General Creuiz, this General ordered 'Colonel Hamilton, who had now ' joined him with his Detachment, to attack Ifland. Hamilton forced the Pass, killed many of his Men, and ' put the rest to Flight.

The Enemy feeing the Rout which the King of Sweden had taken, failed not to throw some Troops into Novogorod, Sewierski, the Capital of the Province, and sortified like the other Places; so that General Creutz, whom the King ordered to make himself Master of it, came too late, the Enemy having been before-hand with him. He was then ordered, with General Cruus, to attend the Motions of Scheremethof; who, searing an Attack, cast Bridges over the river Dezna, and made his Army pass over.

they might not incense the Cossacks; and so much the rather as the Swedes did no such Thing, and as they saw that all the dreadful Waste they had committed could not stop the King of Sweden's March thro' a Country which abounded with many good Things, and especially Forage; which the King's Cavalry, utterly fatigued with the terrible March they had made, did not lose the Advantage of, tho' they were in Motion.

• The King of Sweden's Rout towards the Ukrain was very agreeable to Mazeppa, Great General of the • Coffacks; who being very ill fatisfied with the Czar's Government, had formed a Delign to shake off the 'Yoke, and throw himself into the · Protection of the King of Sweden. But as great Circumspection was neceffary, he had trusted this Design only to two or three principal Men of the Country, of whose Fidelity he was perfuaded; and to conceal his Game the better, he had fent his Nephew Woniarowski to Prince Menzikof, at the Time when he ap-• proached Czernikow after the Battle with Lowenbaupt, to affure the Czar of his Submiffion and Fidelity, and to excuse his not coming himself, on the account of a Distemper, which he used as a Pretence.

"Mazeppa very dexterously employed a Livonian, a Subject of the King of Sweden, who having been made a Prisoner at the Beginning of the War, had been transported into this Country, where he had since lived with his Family. This Man was sent secretly, accompanied by one of his Relations, with necessary Instructions to infinuate Mazeppa's Intentions to the King. These arrived when his Majesty was at Panarofka, and were presently dispatched according to their Wishes.

But whether Menzikof had any In-' telligence of Mazeppa's Defign, or whether he only doubted it, Wonia-"rowski, soon perceived that he had no good Inclination, either to him or to his Uncle; and being warned at the same Time to keep on his 'Guard, he resolved to set out without taking leave. At his Return ' Mazeppa pretended to be very much ' displeased at the young Man's Conduct, and complained thereof to a Muscovite Colonel, who was always about him by the Czar's Orders, to watch his Actions: desiring him to go and make his Excuse to Prince "Menzikof, and to endeavour to re-'move all those Suspicions which 'he might have conceived against 'The Colonel, deceived by these 'Pretences, went to wait on Menzi'kof; and Mazeppa, charmed at 'the Removal of his over-looker, left 'a Garrison in Baturin, which was 'his his Refidence, with Orders to the Commandant, to defend the Place to the last Extremity; and went himself over the Dezna, in the Company of four or five thousand Men, being the principal Persons of the Country.

The King of Sweden, who advanced towards the same River, marched the twenty-second from Panarofka to Mazovobuta; from whence on the twenty third of Ozober, he proceeded to Larinofka; and, on the twenty-fifth, came to Horki, passing near the Town of Novogrod Sewiceski, where General Ronn commanded.

As to Maxippa, after having paffed the Denna, he drew directly to wards the Swedish Quarters, the Troops which he had with him believing that he intended to attack them; but when he was within a little Distance he disclosed his Design, which none of them opposed. He afterwards advanced to a Village, where were the Colonels Hielm and Gyllenstierna, with their Regiments of Dragoons, who were a little alarmed.

* Mazeppa having sent one to the Swedes to notify his Arrival, Colonel Hielm was prevailed on with great Difficulty to believe the Messenger, imagining it a Snare laid for him. He ordered his Troops to mount their Horses, and as he had in his Regiment an Italian Captain, named De Saxe, who had some Time served the Muscovites, and who personally knew Mazeppa, he sent him to him, with some Dragoons, to enquire into the Bottom of the Assar. The Caprain returned, and reported that Mazeppa was there in Person, whom Hielm then received with all suitable Honours. The Cossack-General remained there the next Day, being the twenty-eighth; on which he obliged his Chiefs to consirm their Consederacy by a solemn Oath. Colonel Hielm sent immediately Advice of this Matter to the King, who was but three Leagues off; and who gave forthwith Orders to prepare Quarters for Mazeppa half a League from Horki, where he arrived the same Evening.

The next Day was fixed for Mazeppa's Audience. He arrived at the Court, accompanied with the Chiefs of the Country, viz. the Quarter-Master-General, the Chief Judge, the Chancellor, the two Aid de-Camp Generals, and several Colonels. His Train consisted of a thousand Persons, and before him was carried the two Ensigns of his Dignity, namely, an Horse's Tail and a General's Truncheon.

* Mazeppa being come into the King's Presence, harangued him in Latin. His Discourse was short, but well pointed. He beseeched his Majesty to protect the Cossacks, and gave God Thanks that he had been pleased to deliver them from that Slavery, with which they had been for some Time threatned by the Czar. He afterwards kiss'd the King's Hand; and as he was troubled with the Gout, he was permitted to sit down, while the King remained standing, and reasoned with him.

"Mazeppa, is a Man of fixty four Years of Age, of a middle Stature and thin, with a stern look, and wearing his Mustaches after the Polish Manner; he is nevertheless of a very pleasant Temper, and delights much in making Jests. He speaks very properly, and there is much good Sense in all he says; he hath studied formerly, and speaks the Latin Tongue very well. His Character approaches very near to that of the late Grand Treasurer Sapieba, whom your Serene Highness hath seen in Saxony.

'The King was much pleased with 'his Conversation, which he suffered him to continue till Noon, sometimes on more serious Matters, in Presence of his Excellency Count ' Piper, and the two Secretaries of State; fometimes in the Company of the principal Officers and Cossack-'Ministers, who had the Permission to come into the King's Presence, and to kiss his Hand. When the 'Hour of Dinner was come, the 'King sat down at Table, and with 'him Mazeppa and his Officers of the first Rank. Besides the King's Table, there were two great Tables ' prepared for the Cossack-Ministers, who were likewise invited by Count ' Piper and Rheinschild.

'After Dinner the King returned to his Chamber, whither Mazeppa had the Horse's Tail brought, which he shewed to the King, and laid at his Majesty's Feet, as a Token of his Submission: he then retired, and when he mounted his Horse his Trumpets sounded, which brought all his People together to attend him, who all gave great Demonstration of Respect to his Person.

* Mazeppa now received Advice, that a Muscovite Party had been commanded to surprise him; and that the same Party had carried off fome Waggons belonging to his Troops near the Dezna. The King ordered Colonel Dabldorff the same Evening with six hundred Horse and three hundred Cossacks, to repair to Blonia on the Dezna, sive Leagues from his Majesty's Quarters, to watch the Motions of the Enemy, and cover the Right of the Army.

'The rest remained at Horki from the twenty siste of October, to the last of this Month. Velt-Mar-shal Scheremethof was posted with his Troops along the Dezna, with Design to prevent the King of Sweden's ' Passage.

'On the thirty first of October the King decamped from Horki with his Column, and went a League and a half to Ignotofka; and having refolved to throw Bridges over the River at one League from thence, at the Village of Mezin, however great the Difficulty was, with which he was to struggle to get at this Place, he would not decline his Purpose. He went attended by the Prince of Wurtenberg and Major-General Axiel Sparre, and followed by his Regiment of Foot-guards, and by the Dabl Carlers Foot to order the Passage.

The Column under Sparre having foon joined them, they fell presently to work on the Bridges; but the Frost coming upon them, so filled the River with Cakes of Ice, that nothing was to be done that Day. As this gave the Enemy Time, and the King imagined they would not fail to come and dispute the Passage with him, his Majesty placed twenty-eight pieces of Cannon on some rifing Ground bordering on his Side of the River, and which commanded the Country on the other Side.

We foon discovered the Enemy, who did not however, for fear of our Cannon, approach while it was Day-light; but as Night came on, they took the Advantage of some Bushes, with which the Banks on * their Side were furnished: so that on the first of November in the Morn-· ing, we perceived they had raised a Battery on the left of our Artillery. The Enemies Fire was very weak, the Gross of their Troops keeping • always at a Distance, our Cannon be-• ing very fuccessfully discharged on them as often as they ventured to approach.

The second was the Day, destin'd by the King for the Passage; but as the Batteries of the Enemy hindered us from attempting the River where its Banks were most easy to be climbed up on the other Side, and where it was our Business to post fome of our Men; we were obliged to seek after another Place; which by its Difficulty render'd this perhaps the most extraordinary Passage that ever was.

You must know, my Lord, that the Hill on which the Cannon were placed, was very steep, and the Space between the Hill and the River very narrow on that Side; the King nevertheless ordered his Troops to descend here, not only those who were to pass, but those who were to build the Floats; for Boats we had none.

The Officers and Soldiers having flid down the Hill on their hinder Parts, made some Floats or Pontons at the Foot of it. There then passed over forme Men, who fastened the Cords or Cables on the other Side, which was to serve them for passing and repassing; this being done, we began by carrying over fisteen or twenty Soldiers on each Float: so that towards the Evening six hundred Men, namely, two hundred Westmanlanders and sour hundred Finnois had passed with Major General Stakelberg at their Head, who under him Lieutenant - Colonel Sacken von Oesel, and Major Staren-flycht.

'The Enemy had hitherto underta'ken nothing, they had only made 'a few Motions; but at Night, they 'approached with fix or feven Batta'lions, commanded by Lieutenant'General Allart. This General di'vided his Troops, and made one 'Party advance to the Right and the 'other to the Left, to affail the Swedes
'on both Sides; to whom he marched
'up with a long March, the better
'to avoid the Fire of the Cannon,
'which was discharged with great Suc'cess.

fession of the Bushes, was ordered to advance to the Lest with the Finnois, to attack the Enemy's Battery. By this Means there was some Distance of Ground between him and the Westman Time being got within shot, and the Night growing so dark that they could no longer distinguish each other, the Swedes kept them-

'The Enemy then began first to discover themselves by a Volley of their small Arms, without however being able to see any of us, and the Digitized by Grenadiers

Grenadiers' being posted opposite this vacant Space between the two Parties under Stakelberg, threw their Granades, all which fell into the River without doing any Milchief.

'On the other Hand Major Starenfyib, who commanded the Westmanianders, and who had the first Engagement with the Muscovites, difcerned the Enemy plainly by the Light of their own Fire. He returned their Firetherefore with much Vigour, and much more Success. In the Interval other Troops continued to pals over, while Major-General Stakelberg returned to support them. The Firing lasted three Hours with hardly any Discontinuance; so that the Powder failing in the End, each Soldier having fired upwards of thirty Times, his Majesty ordered the rest of the Troops to pass over. In the mean while, the Swedes repulsed. the Enemy Sword-in-hand, for they had no more Powder, and hindered them from cutting off their Return to the River, where the May-'covites endeavoured to lay hold onthe Ropes to which the Floats were "fastened.

The great Obstinacy with which the Swedes maintained their Post, at last repelled the Enemy; who, superior as they were in Number, retreated in Consustant, fearing that they might be pursued; which however they were not, unless by our Cannon, which fired very briskly on their Retreat.

'The Muscowites had fix hundred.' Men killed, and more than a thoufand wounded, according to their own Confession; and we had butthirty killed, and seventy or there* abouts wounded. Two of the King's.

* Adjutant Generals were amongst the * wounded, namely Ogilvi and Duwald,

* who past and repast with his Majesty's.

* Orders; the former died two Days

* afterwards.

'We being now Masters of the Pasfage, the King employed the next Day in finishing two Bridges. General Rass, who was a League lower down, had Orders to make one to pass with his Column; and the whole Army passed the River at these two Places.

Whilst we were buly in passing the Dezna, the Czar was come post, from Smolenske to join his Army, imagining that the King of Sweden defigned to fuccour the Town of Baturin: For which Mazeppa feared the more, as it was in a very bad State of Defence, tho' he had left a very reasonable Number of Troops The Fortifications of this there. Place were in a very tattered State, and were built in the ordinary Manner of that Country, where the strongest Place could at best pass. but for what the French call a Bicoque. Mazeppa would have repaired it some Years ago, but was always hindered by the Creatures of the. 'Czar, who desired that Mazeppa should not have any strong Place in in his Possession. These therefore diffusded him from it, alledging for, their Reason, that he had no Occaon to lay out his Money this Way & for his Czarish Majesty was strong enough to defend him from all the Infults of his Enemies.

'The Czar desirous to be revenged:
'on Mazeppa, against whom he had,
'published a dreadful Manifesto, gave
'Orders

"Orders for the immediate Attack of his Capital before the Swedes could come to his Affistance. To which Purpose, Menzikef, who was not far from it, suddenly invested it with fome thousand Men, and gave an "Affault on the third of November; his Troops took it Sword-in-hand without much Loss, and after an inhuman Massacre, without sparing Sex or Age, they carried away the Women who remained alive, with fall the Cannon which amounted to forty Pieces, without reckoning the Mortars; and then reduced the Town to Ashes, together with the Mills " which were on the Sem, after having first plundered every thing in the most barbarous Manner. Part of the Gar-'rison saved themselves over the River Sem, and had the good luck to efcape; but the Commandant was taken and treated very cruelly. He was a Native of Prusha, and his * Name was Konig seck.

fed the Dezna, continued his March fed the Dezna, continued his March towards the River Sam, and advanced the fixth of November to Czieplof ka. On the seventh, his Majesty continued his March to Lucknowa; and from thence repaired on the eighth to Criusa. In this Village the Peasants who had fled away, as the other Inhabitants of the Country did, seeing his Majesty's Approach came forth and presented him a large Loaf with Salt, as a Token of their Confidence.

The King halted here till the rest of the Army had past the Dezna. He afterwards followed his Rout, and passed the Sem the twelsth, near the Town of Baturin; where they saw with Horror the dreadful Destruction that had been committed, the very Air being infected with the Stench of dead Bodies, some of which were half burnt. His Majesty advanced two Leagues and a half to Horodiska, where he stopt some Days.

'Here Mazeppa's People brough: an Adjutant-General of Prince Menzikof, whom they had taken at Prziluki. His Name was Schultz, and he was a Native of Prussia. He was dispatched from the Czar with Letters to King Angustus, to desire that Prince to return into Poland, feeing he had no more to fear from the King of Sweden, who was now reduced to the last Extremity. Several Letters were found upon him directed to the Chancery, all full of vulgar Invectives and Muscovite Rodomontades, to persuade the Publick of many Things to our Disadvantage, at which the King laughed much when he read them.

'As foon as the Czar was joined by Menzikof, he retired on the Frontiers of his Dominions to Glukew on 5 the River Leszinan, between the Rivers of Dezna and Sem, where he waited for several new Regiments from Muscovy, which amounted on their Arrival to twenty thousand 'Men. He had with him some shoufand Cossacks, who preserved their Fidelity; and as he was very defirous of gaining over the reft, he thought proper to begin by deposing Mazeppa, which was performed with great Ceremony in the Town of Baturin, as foon as it was taken. They prepared for this Purpose a Scassold, on which his Effigies drest in the blue String of the Order of St. Andrew, was first stript of that Order, then thrown down, and afterwards hanged by the common Hangman.

As the Czar had confined the E: lection of another Great General at Glukow to the Number of seven;

they elected into this Dignity a Co lonel of Starodub, named Ivan Ilie witz Skoropatzki, whom his Czarist

Majesty had proposed to the Cossacks of his Party. The Colonels are the Commanders of Territories or Pro vinces, and there are some who com mand upwards of ten thousand Men.

The Season being too far advanced to put off any longer the Consideration of Winter-quarters for the Army, where they might repose thems felves after the most toilsome March that any Army had ever undertaken; it was endeavoured to canton them in such a Manner that they might refresh themselves well, and be free from any Insult a Precaution very necessary, since his Majesty would not remove too far from the Frontiers of Muscovy.

On this Side the River Sem begins the vast Country of the Ukrain, which extends to the Crim Tartary on the one Side, opening every where the largest and most delightful Plains, which in some Parts abound so plentifully with Towns and Villages, that for many Leagues together we are never out of Sight of them.

As the King had caused an exact Account to be taken of the Situation of this whole Country, particularly all along the Frontiers, his Majesty thought proper to gain yet more Marches; and casting his Eyes on the Town of Romnei or Rumni, and the neighbouring Parts, he sent Mr.

Gyllenkrok to secure that Place, which is situated on the River Sula, near the Frontiers of Russia, having a Rampart and a Ditch, and to make a Disposition for the Winter Quarters:

" Gyllenkrok advanced to Horodifka, accompanied by some Troops and a Colonel of Mazeppa's with a Party of Costacks.

The Czar had already published his Proclamations in feveral Towns which bordered on the Frontiers. These Proclamations were full of Ca-Iumnies, which the Muscovite Court foread amongst the Cossacks, to make them believe that the King of Sweden. ' whom they painted as a Tyrant and an unjust Invader, was come to exercise all manner of Cruelties. It was afterwards fet forth, that as the Czar had given them a new Great-General in the Room of Mazeppa, against whom there were the most bitter Invectives; he exhorted them to re-' cognize him as their Chief, and to keep themselves stedsast against the common Enemy of their Country. 'This Manifesto was without Date, or "Name, or Place where it was made, but most horribly violent.

Gyllenkrok at his Arrival at Romnei, found these Proclamations published; this caused him to put one of the Burgomasters under Arrest; he was accused of having been with the Russians, to demand Succours of them. The King decamped the sixteenth from Horodiska, and followed Gyllenkrok with his Column, proceeding three Leagues to Hollinka, on the River Zisz. Before he decamped thence, he sent Adjutant-General Linrosh to the Generals Creuz and

'Cruus, who led the last Columns of the Army, and had not yet passed the Sem, with Orders to pass it with the utmost Expedition. Linroth hap-'pily joined Cruus; but as he was going with the same Orders to General Creutz, who was but half a League distant from the other, a · Party of the Cossacks that were our Enemies, who had flipt between the 4 two Columns, furprized him on the Road; and as he had but three or four Persons with him, he was necesfarily obliged to yield to a Multitude, who after they had treated him very barbarously, left him dead on the Spot; one of the Company was found ready to expire the next Day, being scarce able to give an Account of the unhappy Fate of his Companions. This Linroth is the last of six Adjutant Generals, which the King

Muscovy.
The King continued his March on the feventeenth from Hollinka to Demitrofska, and thence the eighteenth to Romnei where we are at present, being four Leagues from · made at his going into Saxony, five of them were killed, and Mr. Canifer the fixth, was made a Prisoner in the Frontiers of Muscovy.

* Mazeppa had already represented to the King the Necessity of securing the Town of Hadiacz, his Residence, being six Leagues from Romnei, and the rather as he was informed that the new Hettmann was on his March at the Head of Muscovite Troops, to render himself Master of it.

'His Majesty being arrived at Rom'nei, detached the same Night Colonel Dabldorff with the Regiment of
'Smoland Horse, the Dragoons of Schreiterfelt, and the Regiment of Foot of Westerbothn, commanded by Lagercrona, and ordered him to solve low Mazeppa, who arrived the next Day some Hours before the Enemy, and took Possession of the Town, which as well as the others hath a Rampart and a Ditch. Mazeppa having given the necessary Orders, and left some thousand Cossacks near Dabldorff, returned the same Way, to be nearer the King at Romnei.

The Army in the mean time advanced, and was distributed into Quarters through the several Towns and Villages in a Circle of ten or twelve Leagues; two or three Regiments were quartered together, according to the Extent of each Village, which are very large in that Country.

The Enemy feeing with Uneafiness the Swedes so near their Winter Quarters and their Frontiers, sent out large Detachments to oppose them. This Proceeding gave our Colonels and Generals an Opportunity of signalizing themselves. On the twenty first of November, Colonel Duker beat General Ronn, and drove him off from a Swedish Quarter which he defigned to attack.

Again Colonel Taub, in the Night between the twenty seventh and twenty eighth, defeated & Party of Coffacks and Muscovites, and took near nine hundred Horses from them.
Those who were not burnt or killed, cfcaped in their Shirts. Another time Duker, on the first of December, surprized in the Night a Party of the Enemy in the Muscovite Country, and put all to Fire and Sword. Lastby General Cruus beat a Detachment

- of five thousand Costacks and Muscovites, some Leagues from hence, and rook from them more than a thousand Horses.
- We thank God, the Enemy have been hitherto beat whenever we have met with them.

I am, with profound respect,

My Lord,

Your Serene Highness's, &c. Romnei, Dec. 5, 1708.

GUSTAVUS ADLERFELT.

To illustrate the latter Circumstances of this Letter, let us return to our Journal.

On the twentieth, the Colonels Duker and Taub, who had been detached to render themselves Masters of Smielajab, which was appointed for their Quarters, arrived there, and posted themselves in the Suburbs, the Magistrates refusing to let them enter the Town without an express Order from Mazeppa; at the same Time that they admitted General Ronn with three or four thousand Musicovite Dragoons on the other Side. The King being advertised thereof, hastened thither with the utmost Speed, giving Orders at his fetting out to the Columns of Sparr and Ross to march, which they instantly did. In the mean time General Roun endeavoured to barricade himself as well as he was able.

On the twenty first the Columns of Sparr and Roos, arrived at Smielajah with two Battalions of Guards, who were ordered to follow them; they appeared before the Place just after a Battle, wherein General Ronn having made a Sally, was beat back into the Town with the Loss of four hundred Men. This Fight lasted not long, but was very brisk; two Swedish Squadrons suffered a little at the Beginning of the Action. On the ame Day some Cossacks of the Enemy's Party took several Waggon-loads of Baggage, and massacred some of our Sick who had lost their Road, while they sollowed the Columns of Ross and Sparr.

On the twenty second Mazeppa returned from Hadiacz to the Head quarters. The Cossack Colonel Apostol departed that Day from Mirogrod with Colonel Labieniki, and some Cossacks, under certain Pretences, and sted towards the Russians. He was displeased at Mazeppa's obliging him to bring his Wise and Family to Romnei to follow the Army, as all the other Cossack Ladies did.

We had Advice this Day that the Czar who was posted at Libidin, had caused a great Body of Troops to advance within a League of Hadiacz, into the little Town of Wieprek, situated on the River of the same Name, by whom that Place was put into a Posture of Desence. He had besides at Libidin near twenty thousand Men for the Attack of Hadiacz, which, as he knew the Garrison to be very weak in Comparison of the Troops that were to attack it, he hoped to carry at the first Onset.

On the twenty third, Major-General Meyerfeld and Colonel Albedybl arrived with their Regiments, and posted themselves within the Suburbs of Romnei. The same Night General Ronn retreated from Smielajab on the Prepa-

Preparations, which our Troops were making for the Affault. General Duker pursued him, killed and took several of his Party Prisoners.

The twenty fourth, ins Majesty sent Gyllenkla, to Smielajab, with Orders to burn it.

The twenty fixth, Meyerfeld and Albedybl marched towards their Quarters. The Dabl Carlers rendered themselves at their Post, and took Possession of the Suburbs.

In the Night between the twenty feventh and twenty eighth, Colonel Tanh who was returned to Romnei with Duker, fallied out and surprized a large Body of Muscovites and Cossacks, most of whom were put to the Sword, some were burnt, and others saved themselves in their Shirts. Tanh took above nine hundred Horses,

The first of December, Colonel Duker made an Excursion with fix hundred Horse, pass'd the Frontiers, surprized a Muscowite Party, and penetrating surther into the Enemy's Country, put all to Fire and Sword, and returned with the Loss of three Men only.

The fifth, General Cruus and Colonel Taub defeated a Party of five thousand Colfacks and Russians, whom they had fallen in with in the Night at Krovireca, some Leagues from Romnei, put most of them to the Sword, pushed the rest into the River Sula, and took above one thousand Horses.

The tenth, Lieutenant-Colonel Funk was detached with five hundred Horse to chastise the Peasants, who were got together in divers Places, and bring them to Reason. He killed above a thousand Cossacks in the little Town of Terey, which he burnt, as he did Dribelow; he reduced likewife, many Villages to Ashes which belonged to those Cossacks who sided with the Enemy, and put all whom he found to the Sword, in order to strike a Terror into the rest.

- It was hoped that the King's Manifesto dated in the End of Nevember O. S. written in the Latin Language. and dispersed among all the Costacks, would convince them of the Uprightness of his Majesty's Intentions, who came but to deliver them from the Yoke under which they groaned; but notwithstanding the strongest Assurances which were given them of protecti ing and re-establishing them in their Rights, and to do them no manner of Mischief provided they would remain quietly at Home; all this feemed no make no great Impression on the Body of the Nation, whom the Czar, by his Proclamations, and the new Great General, had found the Means of gaining; so that we were at continual Blows with the Inhabitants, which extremely, troubled old Mazeppa, especially when he was informed of the yielding up of Bialacerkiow, where his Loss was very considerable.

The King having perceived by the Preparations of the Grat at Libidin, what he intended at Hadiacz, decamped the seventeenth from Ramnei, with the Regiment of Foot Guards, the Uplanders and Dabl Carlers, Foot, and the Regiment of Dragoons of Daker, to seek the Enemy, and offer him Battle.

His Majesty advanced two Leagues that Day to Lipowa Dalina, where we surprized a Party of a hundred Musco-vite Dragoons, who were posted to watch the Road between Romnei and F f f Hadiacz;

Hadiacz; thirty were cut to Pieces by the Valoches, and the rest, namely, a Major, a Lieutenant, and seventy Dragoons were taken Prisoners. The Prince of Wurtenberg narrowly escaped being killed by a Dragoon of the Enemy's, who got behind him and aimed to cut his Head off; the Prince at the very Instant when he was going to make the Blow, looked behind him and avoided it.

The eighteenth, his Majesty consinued his March and arrived at Hadiacz: The Garrison consisted of the Regiment of Smoland, and that of the Gentry of Livenia, both Horse; the Dragoons of Shreiterfeld, and the Foot of Westerbothn. Within an Hour of the King's Arrival, the Enemy were on the Point of giving the Assault, and every Thing was ready for that Purpose, when they received the News by some Dragoons who had escaped from the Surprize of Lipowa Dalina. of the Approach of fome Troops which were coming to the Succour of that Place: This obliged them to fet Fire to the Suburbs of Hadiacz and a Magazine of Forage which was there, and to retreat thence with Precipitation.

The Czar, who was but at half a League's Distance from this Place, and who was marching with considerable Forces to support the Assault, turned about likewise on this News, and hastily regained the Rout of Libidin.

This first Night was extremely cold, and the Frost continued thenceforth with most extraordinary Rigour during the whole Winter; and as there is but one Gase to the Town, at which so many Waggons, &c. could enter but flowly, the one after the other, the Place moreover being scarce able to hold so many Men and Horses, a great Number were obliged to remain in the open Air without the City Gate, and this for several Days and Nights following, while they were placing what had already entered.

Many died of the excessive Rigour of the Cold, and a great Number lost the Use of their Limbs, as their Feet and Hands; so that the Town was filled with sick Persons, and all the Houses resembled Hospitals, which afforded a horrible Spectacle. The King himself was not free from the terrible Effects of this rigorous Scason, being affected with a Swelling in his Nose, which he presently cured by rubbing it with Snow, the only Method to prevent any Numbness.

But if our Troops suffer'd so much from the excessive Rigour of the Winter, those of the Czar, which were continually in Motion, suffered no less. We heard from all Parts, that Sickness raged in all their Garrisons and Quarters; and as they were obliged to be always on their Guard, on account of his Majesty's continual Marches, which left them not one Moment in Safety; this perpetual Agitation, together with the severe Cold, carried off abundance of their People: They had however the Advantage of replacing their Dead, by Recruits which arrived incessantly from Ruffio, and the Czarewitz himfelf was advancing with feventeen thoufand fresh Recruits to reinforce their Army.

The fame Day five Regiments entered Ronnei, where the Drabans, the Court and the Chancery were; name-ty, Sparr's, Buchwald's, and Cronman's Foot, Cruus's Horse, and Taub's Dragoons, to replace the Troops which his Majesty had taken with him.

Major-General Meyerfeld had had a very smart Action in his March from Locbvica, to join the King, with Wolkonski who commanded the Garrison of Mirogorod, who fallied out with several of his Troops, which were beaten and repulsed with Loss. Meyerfeld in this March had the Missortune to break his Leg by the Fall of his Horse, but it was afterwards very well cured.

As the King was not pleased at the Neighbourhood of the Enemy, and as he burnt with Impatience to attack them, he resolved to seek and pursue them till they would stand their Having therefore left all Ground. his Baggage and Sick at Hadiacz, with fome Regiments to guard them, and having fent for the Court and Drabans from Romaei, he decamped the twenty fixth with Part of the Armyt and marched directly to Wieprek, where Ronn was posted with a considerable Body of Troops, who, as foon as he had Advice of the King's Approach. left three Battalions in the Town, and marched immediately on the Side of Kamien; our Van-guard and Valoches being close at the Heels of his Rearguard, fell on the Ruffian Coffacks and Calmaks, who cover'd his precipitate Retreat.

Ronn continued his March with much Diligence, and passing near Kamien, which is situated on the same River with Hadiacz, three Leagues from Wieprek, he threw a Colonel with a Party of Dragoons into that Place, and pursued his Rout towards Libidin. During this March our Troops suffer'd extremely by the Cold, of which several Men and Horses perish'd, and many lost their Hands and Feet.

The 27th the King passed by Wieprek in Pursuit of Ronn, leaving the Regiment of Horse of South Scania, under Ornstedt, and the Foot Regithent of Ostrogaths, under James Speriling, behind him, to watch this paultry Town; to these were afterwards join'd the Dragoons of Meyerfeld and Albedybl. On the other hand, Gount Jasper Sperling, with his Regiment of Westrogaths, advanced towards Kamien, and posted himself at half a League's Distance, where he dislodged an adyanced Guard of the Enemy.

The King proceeded some Leagues to a Village named Pleszinicz, when the Cold was so piercing, that it became absolutely impossible to continue the March. This obliged his Majesty to keep his Christmas there with the Regiments which he had with him, and which suffered much from the Cold in these Quarters.

Colonel James Sperling, by the King's Order, fummoned the Commandant of Wieprek to furrender the Place; but he refusing, Sperling acquainted his Majesty, who changing his Quarters, turned towards Czinkow, where he placed Rank in his Front with his Regiment of Foot.

Czinkow is a little Town fortified in that Country Manner, with Palisadoes, and a little Bulwark lined with a Moat. A great Number of Peasants had thrown themselves into it, pretending to remain Neuters, and admit neither Swedes nor Russans. While Rank was marching, Colonel Tanb, who had been detach'd with five hundred Horse from the Side of Kamien, arrived and burnt the Suburbs.

The King followed Rank, and passed again by Wieprek; he now less there the Regiment of Foot of Upland, with sour Pieces of Cannon; and after having pass'd by the Side of a great Wood, he arrived in the Evening at Czinkow. He found the Gates shut, and the Inhabitants with a great Number of Peasants on the Ramparts; they were all drunk with strong Waters, made a great Noise, and appeared much elated. Adjutant-General Gyllenkla set Fire to some Houses in the Suburbs.

The gift, Gyllenkla received Orders to fummon the Town, declaring to those who were in the Town, that he would give them but an Hour to furrender themselves; they demanded a longer Time, which was refus'd them. The King at the same Time. having drawn up a Battalion of Calmar, advanced to the Gates, and fat down on the Chevaux de frise, till the Capitulation was figned. It was foon concluded, and before the Hour was expired, the Populace being intimidated, surrendered at Discretion, and opened the Gates, which the Battalion of Calmar instantly took Possession of.

The King posted himself in the Suburbs with the Regiment of Dahl Carlers under Siegroth, that of Wesmanland under Roos, and that of Calmar under Rank, all Foot, with the Artillery and the Ostrogoth Horse under Hamilton; together with the Dragoons of Duker and Shreiterfelt. The rest of the Army remained till farther Orders in Hadiacz, and the Places thereabouts. Count Piper with a Part of the Court and Drabans, took up his Quarters near Crasnaluka. The chief of the Court Baggage remained at Hadiacz. Sparr, Cruus, and Creuz possessed themselves of the rest of the Neighbourhood.

The King spent New-year's Day. 1709, at Czinkow, during so rigorous a Cold, that nothing equal to it had been known in the Memory of Man. His Majesty having formed a Design to attack Wieprek, sent Major-General Stakelberg thither, to take upon him the Direction. Siegroth was ordered to follow to reconnoitre the Place, and make an exact Report thereof to his Majesty. At his Return, which was two Days afterwards, the King decamped from Czinkow, escorted by the Artillery and Sbreiterfelt's Dragoons.

His Majesty arrived the 6th at Wieprek, where they had already raised sour Batteries of sive Pieces of Cannon each; and when the Commandant was again summon'd to surrender, he answered from the Mouths of his Cannon, to which those on our Batteries replied. The same Evening the King made the necessary Dispositions for an Assault early the next Day, ordering three Attacks, of which one was to be conducted by James Sperling, and the other two by Fritski and Albedybl.

The 7th in the Morning the Attack was begun by the Discharge of the Cannon, while the Troops were drawn up to mount the Assault, which they did with all possible Force and Vigour; but as the Enemy had thrown a Quantity of Water on the Ramparts which was frozen on all Sides, and the Garrison taking Advantage of the Dissible Canada and the Dissible Canada and the Carrison taking Advantage of the Dissible Canada and the Carrison taking Advantage of the Dissible Canada and the Carrison taking Advantage of the Dissible Canada and the Carrison taking Advantage of the Dissible Canada and the Carrison taking Advantage of the Dissible Canada and the Carrison taking Advantage of the Dissible Canada and the Carrison taking Advantage of the Dissible Cannon, while the Troops were drawn up to mount the Assault and the Cannon, while the Troops were drawn up to mount the Assault and the Cannon, while the Troops were drawn up to mount the Assault and the Cannon and the Cannon and the Cannon and the Canada and the Difficulty which our Men met with in scaling the Ramparts, which were so slippery they could hardly stand, defended themselves in the most desperate Manner, his Majesty without Delay gave Orders to his Troops to retreat.

We lost many brave Men at this Attack. The two young Counts of Sperling, equally illustrious by their Birth, their Rank and their Merit; Colonel Fritski; the Lieutenant-Colonel Morner, and Lilliegreen; Count E. Gyllenstolpe, a Man much esteemed; and many other Officers of Merit, were killed. Count Rheinschild received a Blow from a Grenade, which made a Contusion. General Stockelberg was wounded, and the Sleeve of the Prince of Wurtenberg's Coat was shot through with a Ball. The King having founded the Commandant again by Siegroth and Wrangle, he demanded fome Hours for Consideration, and furrendered the same Night at Discretion. The Officers were made Prisoners of War; but kept their Baggage, as the Colonel did his Sword. We found here some pieces of Cannon that had been burft.

The Garrison marched out the next Day, consisting of eleven hundred Men, besides the Peasants, which had born Arms. They were escorted to Czinkow, by Silfwerbielm, where they had full Liberty to enter into the Town; but the greater part died of the cold.

During these Transactions, two Officers of the King's Army, whose Names were Lood and Ox, arrived in our Camp. They had been taken Prifoners by the Czar, and were by him sent to his Majesty, to sollicit the Exchange of Schultz, Adjutant to Menzikof, of whom we have spoken before with one named Cauduroff in their Room. The King resused this Exchange, and in the former's Place sent back a Lieutenant Colonel who was taken at Wieprek, and instead of Cauduroff a Captain taken at the same Place.

The eleventh, the little Bicoque of Wieprek was burnt, and his Majesty set out for Czinkow, being escorted by the Regiment of Artislery, the Horse of Crous and Tanb's Dragoons. At the same time General Sparr received Orders to go with six Regiments of Footto Lutenka, which is some Leagues distant from Czinkow, on the River Lutenka, to be there in Readiness, and to give Rest to the Troops.

Our Quarters were so well disposed, that the Enemy could not easily furprize us. Creutz was posted at Lochowitz, or Lathwica, which is on the Side of the Ukrain; and all the rest were drawn close together towards the Frontiers, where we stood well on our Guard. Hadiacz was in the Centre. and the Baggage remained always quiet with a Body of Troops which the King had at first left there, and to which several other Regiments had since joined themselves by his Majesty's Orders. As to the Enemy, they had Troops in Ogtirki, Kutilva, Opuczna, Pultawa, &c. without reckoning the main body which was at Libidin, and on the Frontiers in their own Country.

The thirteenth Count Piper came to his Majesty to Hadiacz.

The fourteenth, the Lieutenant-Colonels Ulffparr, Apelgreen and Stiernbielm, were made Colonels; the first had the Ostrogoths of James Sperling, who was killed; the second the Westero-Westrogoths, of Jasper Sperling; and the third, another Regiment.

The nineteenth, Colonel Duker was detached at fix in the Evening, with two thousand Horse towards Horogni, where lay five Regiments of the Enemy, under the Command of Brigadier Carrupel. He arrived the next Day, and having instantly attacked them, utterly routed them, killed three hundred Men, took two Pair of Kettle-Druins, and some Colours; and carried off more than a thousand Horses, with some part of their Baggage, which he brought happily to the Headquarters, with the Loss only of about twenty Men.

The twenty-fecond, Lieutenant-Colonel Wrangle, who commanded in Chief the Dragoons of Stania, otherwise called the Priest's Dragoons, was killed with a shot from a Fauconet, as he was going to reconneitre the Town of Sorotzin, which was near his Quarters, and where the Enemy had a Garrison. Prince Wartenberg asked this Regiment of the King, who gave it him soon after.

In the Night between the twentyfeventh and twenty-eighth, the King taking with him Hamilton's Regiment of Horse, and Duker's and Taub's Dragoons, making together about two thousand, and followed by the Prince of Wurtenberg, Count Rheinschild, and other Officers of Note, marched through the great Wood to Opucano on the Worskla; where were six Regiments of Muscovite Dragoons, under the Command of General Shaumburg, with fix hundred Horse Grenadiers, and near two thousand Cossacks. They presently made an orderly Retreat at our Approach along the Town of Qpuczne, or Obulzin; but our Regiments having attacked them with Vigour, overthrew them almost at the first Shock, and pursued them a whole League close at their Heels.

The Enemy had four hundred Men killed on the Spot, and fifty taken Prilossers; and we took two Pair of Kertle-drums, and five Standards. Menzikof with General Ronn arrived just before the Fight, with an Intention to advance with these Regiments towards our Quarters, and to surprize the Dragoons of Stania and Horn's Horse, both in Quarters at Kovaluska; but they had only Time to run away with the rest. The Valoches made a considerable Booty in the Town of Oputzno, where they plundered all the Baggage of these Regiments.

Immediately after this Fight, wherein we had only two killed and seventeen wounded, his Majesty sent his Adjutant General Dawalds to Cainkow, with Orders for all to march, the Baggage as well as the Regiments; Rank and Roos were to come with their Foot to Opucano, and the Artillery with the rest to Casmin.

On the twenty-ninth the King advanced to Katilva, hoping to meet another Column and fix Musicovite Regiments, which were there posted; and he flattered himself that those who sled from Opuczno, might possibly have taken the same Road. They did indeed repair thither, but had at the same Time spread so general a Terror, that they had altogether ran away thro Krasnakui to Ogtirki; so that at his Majesty's Arrival they were all decamped.

The King in the mean while had left a Captain, with fifty Horse and some fome wounded Soldiers to guard the Wounded and Trophies taken in the last Fight. The Russans hearing this, made a Detachment of Dragoons desile that way, who surprized the Captain, and having killed him and all his People, carried off the Trophies and Prisoners; so that when General Ronn arrived, he found nothing but dead Bodies.

The Court, the Drabans and the Regiments decomped the thirtieth from Gzinkow, where we left only one Party of Cossacks behind, to observe what passed in the Neighbourhood. The next Day, the Court and Drabans came and joined the King at Kutilva, where his Majesty stopped fome Days. In the mean time the Enemy retired to Kalcutsi, and thence to Optirki.

The fifth of February, Klint arrived at the Army.

The fixth, a large Party of Cast mucks attacked the Guard near Castain, and killed fome Men; after which, as soon as the Picquet advanced they ran away full Speed. The eighth his Majesty gave the Troops Orders to hold themselves in Readiness for a March the next Day. The cold still continuing to be very piercing.

In one of these Marches two thousand Men sell down dead with the cold, before his Eyes. The Troopers had no Boots; the Foot were without Shoes, and almost without Clothes. They were reduced to warm themselves with the Skins of Beasts as well as they could, they often wanted even Bread; they were obliged to fink almost all their Cannon in Morasses and Rivers, for want of Horses to draw them. This Army, once so flourishing, was diminished to twenty-four thousand Men, and these ready to die with Hunger.

In this Condition one Officer only complained, to whom faid the King, I suppose you are uneasy at being so far from your Wife; but, if you are a true Soldier, I will carry you so far, that you shall scarce be able to bear from Sweden once in three Years. A Soldier had the Boldness with some Murmurs to prefent a Morfel of black and mufty Bread to the King, in the Presence of the whole Army, the only Nourishment which they then had, and of which they had not a sufficient Supply. The King received the Bread without Emotion, eat it quite up; and then answered the Soldier coldly. It is not good, but it may be eaten.

The King who was impatient to firike a Blow of Importance, and to oblige the Enemy at last to stand their Ground by giving them no Repose, decamped on the ninth from Kutilva, and took the Road of Ogtirki. As he passed through the Village of Kukri, he met Colonel Tschamerdin with a Detachment of the Enemy's Dragoons, who retreated with the utmost Expedition; but were pursued by the Valoches and sive Squadrons quite under the Walls of Ogtirki. We killed a good Number, and took some Prisoners.

The Enemy, fearing they should be befieged in Ogtirki, presently set Fire to the Suburbs, and marched their Horse to Krasnakut, where eight Regiments of Dragoons were posted, some in the Town, and some without the Gates; and ten other Regiments at half a League Distance, in the little Town of Horodniza.

The King halted at Kukri. The Artillery which from Czinkow had marched with the other Troops to Cafmin, took the Road of Kukri, where first burnt Casmin, Kusmin or Kamien, for it is the same Place under different Names.

. At Kukri, the Prince of Wurtenberg received his Commission of Colonel, from the King's own Hand. His Majefty likewise ordered a Sum of Money to be paid him towards his Equipage; and he bought that of Wrangle his Predecessor.

The tenth, Lieutenant-Colonel Funk was detached with some hundred Horse to recommoitre Ogtirki. He reported that their Garrison consisted of three Regiments of Foot, and that all their Horse had marched towards Krasna-

On the eleventh, his Majesty deeached Major-General Hamilton with four Regiments towards Olesna, 19 burn the Town. He carried it on his Arrival Sword in Hand, and put most of the Garrison to the Sword, taking the rest Prisoners, with the Waivode of the Place, and then fet Fire to it.

The King advanced on the Road to Krasnakus the same Morning early, followed by his Drabans, the Regiments of Horse of Cruus and Smoland, feveral Regiments of Dragoons, and the Foot-guards, Dabl-Carlers, and the Regiment of Skaraborg, with the Artillery. At the half way, the Enemy had an advanced Guard of thirty Horse, six of whom the Valoches killed, and took the rest.

The King pursued his March towards Krasnaknt, whence the Enemy at his Approach retired on the other Side of the Town, and drew up in order of Battle near a Mill and a Cloyster. The Valoches having begun the Skirmish, the King advanced with the Cathey arrived the next Day, having valry to support them, and passing thro' the Town he found some Squadrons of the Enemy, who ran away full Speed, after having given one Volley.

As foon as the King had passed the Town, and found himself in Sight of the Enemy, he drew up his Troops on two Lines, with which he advanced towards them, who were retired a good Distance from the Town. The Enemy, then, not daring to face him, began to fet themselves on a Gallop towards Harodniza, which is half a League from Krasnekut. As they soon ran into Confusion, the hindmost were defeated; and several of them killed. not only on the Road to Horodnizas but within the Gates, Suburbs and Streets of the City, where thefe Wretches, who by reason of the Croud could not fave themselves fast enough. were cut to Pieces; so that the Streets were all covered with dead Bodies.

The Russians lost on this Occasion upwards of a thousand Men, with some Trophies; on our Side, no more than twelve of the Guards, and an hundred and twenty Horse and Dragoons were either killed or wounded. General Ronn, who had been posted near this Town with ten other Regiments, retired the same Night six Leagues farther to Bialorod, which is situated within Ruffia itself, Krasnakut being in the Russian Ukrain.

His Majesty on the twelfth advanced half a League to Morestes, giving Orders to burn Krasnakut and Horodniza, and to carry away all the Inhabitants with the Women and Children.

The thirteenth, the Army proceeded two Leagues to Colomak, having. Arft burnt Morafka: terrible Showers of Rain mixt with Thunder and Lightning fell on that Day. Colomak being situated on the Frontiers of Tarzery, old Mazeppa, who was on this Expedition with the Cossacks, would pay his Court to the King, being near him, on Horseback, to congratulate him on the Progress of his Arms; faying to him in Latin, that we had but eight Leagues to Afia. His Majesty, who was perfectly acquainted with the Map, answered smiling, Sed non conveniunt Geographi; but Geographers do not agree: which Answer made the good old Man blush.

About the fourteenth, the Winter, which had for some Days abated of its Rigour, became all at once supportable; the Weather being now soft and serene enough, after one of the most violent Seasons ever felt in that Climate: but at the same Time the Waters began to swell in so extraordinary a Manner, that those Rivers which we had before easily passed, being all frozen, presented us now the Prospect of a whole Country overslow'd.

This Change obliged his Majesty to return into the Ukrain, there to wait for a better Season, and one more commodious for the Operations of the War, in a Country so full of Rivers. Orders were given to General Craus, to advance before with some Regiments, the King following himself the next Day with the rest of the Army. We proceeded three Leagues to Kublintka; at our Departure from whence, the King commanded the Burning of Colomak.

This March was very laborious for the Foot, who were always in Water, the Plain through which they passed in several Places resembling a large Lake, the Rivers had so violently overslowed the Country. The Artillery especially, underwent great Fatigues in this Rous, and so did the Baggage; which caused his Majesty to order a great Number of useless Waggons to be burnt; that is to say, those which the Troops used for the Carriage of their Provisions.

This was a fatal Day to the Regiment of German Dragoons under Coionel Albedybl, who was quarrered at Raschow, or Raschouska, some Leagues from Lutinka, where Major General Sparr was posted. The Enemy, under the Command of Scheremethof, began their Attack on an hundred and twenty Dragoons, who had been ordeted to have an Eye on the Horse; and having furrounded them on all Sides, put them to the Sword after they had made all possible Refistance. Scheremethof advanced next with twelve Regiments rowards Raschow, where Albedybl's Regiment, after a valiant Defence, were in part cut to Pleces, and the rost made Prisoners, with the Colonel himself; three hundred Horse only, with the Major, broke through Sword in Hand, and having made their Way through several Squadrons, came to Sparr at Lutinka.

The Enemy laid their Hands on all the Horses of this Regiment, and of part of another, together with their Baggage. It was seared, that Scheremethof, after this Action, would push his Point, and go to Hadiacz, with a View of rendring himself Master of the Baggage; but he attempted no more, and returned to his Quarters.

The King hastened the seventeenth from Rubliska, where the Regiment of Guards was obliged to pass the first Ggg Night

Night in the open Field, not being able to cross the Waters, which were every Day increasing. This Disappointment occasioned Orders from his Majesty to that Regiment, to go two Leagues round in search of a Bridge, while the Artillery, the Dabl Carlers, and the Regiments of Smoland and Cruus, passed near Kalentajo, which was burnt.

His Majesty, with the Drahans and the rest of the Troops, passed the Waster near Rublinska the eighteenth, after having first set Fire to that Town, which is the last-in the Russian Ukrain. They advanced a short League to a River, where his Majesty halted till they laid over a Bridge. The Regiment of Guards sound the Bridge over which they were to pass in a very ruinous Condition; they presently resitted it, and having passed over, teturned to join his Majesty.

The nineteenth, the King returned to Opuczno with the Drabans, having proceeded only half a League on that Day. The March was very tiresome to the Regiments, who were to cross all these Waters, that had rendred the Ground unfirm, and the Passes and Desiles extremely deep and difficult. As soon as his Majesty was returned, the Enemy who had followed us a good while, posted themselves opposite to us on the other Side of the River Warf-kla.

The twentieth, Major General Hamilton returned with his Detachment, and Cruus, fet out from Opuczno, for Budiczin. The King remained some Time at Opuczno, where Rank and Roos were in Garrison, and put Part of the Regiments which he had taken with him in his last Expedition into Quarters, on the Side of Pultowa, namely the Guards, Cruus's, Hamilton's, the Offrogoths, the Smolanders and the Regiment of Skaraborg; he then fixed his Head quarters at Budiczin, whither he repaired a little afterwards.

Major-General Creutz marched from Lochwica, or Lochowitz, with his Column, to draw nearer the King. The Ruffians, commanded by Scheremethof failed not to harras him during this March, and attacked his Rear-guard, who received them so briskly, that they afterwards suffered him to continue his March very quietly; he had however great Difficulty to pass the Waters, and was obliged to burn several Waggons loaded with Baggage, of which he had the Charge,

At the same Time his Majesty having sent Orders to Hadiacz, to bring up the heavy Baggage; the Garrison marched out, having first destroyed all the Works of Desence, and passing through Lutinka and Burki, arrived the twenty seventh at Opuczno, without any Disturbance from the Enemy.

All the Swedish Army was now affembled between the two Rivers of Pziol and Worskla, and extended itself from Lurinka to Opuezno, being the Space of twelve Polish Leagues; where they waited a more favourable Season for Action, and till the Grass began to grow in the Fields. The King employed this Time, without any Relaxation; in visiting and reviewing his Regiments. On the first of March, Klint departed, and the third, his Majesty quitted Opuezno, and advanced a League to Budiczin, where he had fixed his Quarters.

The Enemy's Horse made some Motions, and drew nearer on the Side of Worskla, throwing some Troops into Kutilva. Fittinghof, a Captain in Taub's Regiment, who had been detached towards Worskla, was attacked by a Party of the Enemy; which he received so well, that he put them to Flight, killed several, and made others Prisoners.

Scheremetoff, on another Quarter, was advanced nearer to Pziol, in the Neighbourhood of Krasmapole, with all the Foot, having placed a Garrison in Hadiacz as soon as it was quitted by the Swedes; so that we were now surrounded on all Sides by the Enemy, a Circumstance which made our Provisions dear. One of their Parties on the tenth stewed a Desire of attacking Colonel Hielm; but he kept so well on his Guard, that they durst not execute their Purpose.

The 12th all our Cossack Ladies arrived at the Head quarters; and the next Day the Prince of Wurtenberg set out for his Regiment, which was at Kowaluska, sive Leagues from the Head quarters.

The King's Approach having given Umbrage to the Zaporovian Coffacks, of whom we have spoken above; they writ to Mazeppa, to acquaint him that they had sided with the Czar's Army, and that they wished to know the Designs of the King of Sweden, who had come so far to trouble them.

Mazeppa had already writ to these People, at the Time that he declared for the King of Sweden; but the Express who was charged with the Letter had been taken by the Russians: He now answered all the Heads of their Letter, and informed them of the Justice of the King of Sweden's Defigns, who, being a formidable Conqueror, came to deliver them from the Yoke and Slavery which the Czar was preparing for them. animated them at the same Time, to follow his Example, and to lift themserves under the Banners of a Prince who was their Protector, and whom Heaven had fixed on as the Person who was to render them free and happy ; and lastly, that this Letter inight make the greater Impression on their Minds, he fent one of his Colonels and Judges, a great Orator, who was charged to expound the whole to them at large.

by these Means, sent immediate Deputies to Mazeppa, to declare to him that they would take the same Side with himself. The Deputies brought at the same Time a Letter from their Hetiman to the King. They had Audience of his Majesty the 19th, and having obtained an Answer the next Day, they departed well satisfied, and instantly began their Hostilities against the Muscovites.

The Rulfians being informed of the Proceedings of the Zaporovians, detached Colonel Cambel towards the Town of Torodginska with three thou fand Dragoons, to attack the Zaporo-1 vians, who were to pass that Way in order to join us. The Russian Dragoons were divided into several Parties, to fcour the Country, and hinders the Zaporovians from passing; but thefe to the Number of eight thousand men attacked Colonel Cambel in the Town, killed a great many of his Party, and took one hundred and fifteen Prisoners: So that of the three Muscovite Regiments scarce four hundred Ggg 2

dred with their Colonel were faved.

The Zaporovians continued their March, having at their Head their Heitman, named Ottoman Kokzovy, who advanced towards the King's Quarters, followed by some hundreds of the Chiefs of his Country. He was received by Mazeppa, half a League from Budiczin; the next Day he had an Audience of the King, whom he addressed in Latin; testifying to him the Joy which the Zaporovian Nation felt, at his Majesty's Arrival, that they befought his Protection, giving God Thanks that he fuffered them at length to enjoy that Liberty, at which they had to eagerly aspired; he afterwards kiffed the King's Hand, and was treated at Court with the principal Officers who fat at two Tables.

The next Day the Zaporovians, being affembled in a Greek Church at Budiczin, took an Oath of Fealty to Mazeppa. The Pifars were the first after the Hetiman who swore; them afterwards made all together the Sign of the Cross, and kissed the Gospel and the Crucifix. The same Day they had an Audience of Leave of his Majesty, and the next Day departed. from Budiczin, to continue their Hostilities against the Rushans.

The 31st Mr. Sandul, Colonel of the Valoches, departed for Bender, to treat with the Seraskier Turk, touching the Recruits of the Valoches. The fame Day the Russians took in Czin-. know, a Lieutenant, with sixteen Dragoons, of Prince Wurtenberg's Regiment, who had been detached to gater up Victuals. These Accidents, which happened to us from Time to Time, were unavoidable; for being obliged to fetch our Forage and Provisions a great Way off, the Regiments could not avoid fometimes the Loss of little Detachments, which were fent out to raise Contributions. Prince of Wursenberg, who was the most exposed, desired his Majesty's Permission to approach nearer to the Head-quarters, which having obtained. he came and encamped with his Regiment at Burky.

We learned that Day, that the Czar had detached General Goliz with nineteen or twenty thousand Men beyond the Dnieper, to go and join Siniawski in Poland, who opposed King Staziflaus, and eauled there great Trouble and Confusion. We learned further that there were five thousand Men in Pultowa; that Rann was at the Head of the Troops beyond the Workla, designed to cover the Frontiers of Ruska, and that Scheremeibes commanded the rest of the Army, consisting chiefly of Foot, and was posted about Hadiacz and Krasnapele, along the River of Pziol. As to the Czar, we knew he was at eighteen Leagues Distance from his Army at Woronitz, where he was building Ships.

The 3d of April, his Majesty, attended by Mazeppa, Count Rheinschild, and some other Officers of Distinction, came with a Detachment of Horse under Pultowa, to reconnoitrs. the Place, of which the King resolved to make himself Master, on Mazeppa's Advice, that on our penetrating into Rullia, we might have a Place in our Possession through which the Succours might pass which were expected from Poland to join his Majesty.

Pultowa is situated on the River Worskla, which falls sixteen Leagues lower into the Boristhenes. This Town

Town belonged to the Coffacks, but the Russians were then Masters of it. Many of the Inhabitants had retired huher with their Effects at the Approach of the Swedes; fo that it was full of Riches, Corn, and all Sorts of Provisions.

There was in the Town a Garrison of five thousand Men, under the Command of General Allari, who had under him a Colonel named Kellen. This General had taken Care to reestablish the Fortifications, and to add some new Works, so that it might well pass for a pretty good Fortress in that Country. His Majesty, after having reconnoitred the Ground' about it. which the Worskla, winding about into several Branches, renders somewhat marshy, returned to Budiczin, where he arrived the next Day in the Evening.

On the 13th an Action happened at Jokolki, near the Worskla: General Ronn having attacked General Stakelberg at the Head of several Regiments, was repulsed with Loss, after a very obstinate Fight, in which Colonel Gyllenstierna was wounded.

The 18th, a Lieutenant of the Artillery deferted from Pultowa to Budiczin. All that Day a great Quantity of Snow fell, which being foon melted by the Sun, rendered the Roads very bad. The Army now remained quiet in their Quarters.

The 21st, three Captains of our Valoches, with a good Number of their Men, went over from us to the Enemy.

The 24th, his Majesty made an Excursion to General Creatz's Quarters, where there was an Alarm on fome Motions made by Marshal Scheremethof's Troops, by which it was apprehended that he defigned to attack General Creutz; but this came to nothing, and the King returned the same Evening. This Day Major-General Axel Sparr, was ordered to march with his Division to the King's Quarters.

The 25th, fome Regiments of Sparr's Column came from Lutenka to They were the next Day followed by the other Regiments of Foot of his Division, which, including the Garrison of Hadiacz, made up eight Regiments. Sparr began his March with these Regiments, that of the Artillery, and all the Baggage of the Army, towards Pultowa, to invest that Place. General Scheremethof at the Head of twelve thousand Men observed his March; but seeing their fine Order and the Precautions which Sparr had taken, he did not dare to attack him, and he arrived fafely before the Town, without the Loss of a fingle Man.

The 28th, the Regiment of Dabl-Carlers decamped and marched to Pultowa; and the next Day his Majesty followed himself with the Drabans, fome Regiments of Horse, and the Regiments of Foot of Wermland, Westerbothn and Calmar, which encamped at a good Diffance from the Town; fo that almost all our Foot were arrived, excepting two Regiments which remained at Budiczin, with the Dragoons of Taub and Ducker, under the Command of Major General Roos, to keep that Post through which the Enemy was absolutely to pass, if he would attempt to relieve Pultowa.

The 1st of May, Klint returned, Digitized by Google and the same Day the Trenches were opened before Pultowa; and we had Advice that the Enemy were drawing Troops together near Opuczno.

The 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th, the Trenches were carried on, but with a very few Men, in order to husband our Forces, which his Majesty thought not proper to expose before this Place, of which we hoped to be quickly the Masters, without much Loss.

The fixth, Major-General Roos seeing the Enemy's Forces encrease on the other Side of Opuczno, made an Entrenchment all along the Workla, flanked with some Works, to dispute the Passage of this River: the Enemy made a brisk Fire on our Workmen, of which several were killed.

The feventh, Major General Roos brought up some Cannon to play on the opposite Bank, detaching at the same Time Major Lood with two hundred and fifty Men to maintain the Post.

The eighth, the Enemy past the River over a Bridge which they built below Opucano, with Foot and Horse to the Number of twelve thousand Men, who attacked our little Entrenchment, and forced it by their great Superiority of Troops, making Major Lood, with some other Officers, and about seventy Foot-Soldiers Prisoners; the rest having saved themselves after a brave Desence of several Hours together.

Major-General Roos, being informed of the Motions of the Enemy, before the Attack began, drew the Regiments of Dragoons to the Quarters of Budiczin; to these were likewise joined two Battalions of Guards, the Regiments of Horse of Scania and Horn, and the Dragoons of Prince Wurtenberg. and Meyerfeld, who hastened thither from their Quarters. His Majesty came up himself with Count Rhein. schild and many other Generals, and arrived just at the Time when the Enemies retired towards the Bridge to pass it, and when Colonel Duker fallying out of the Town to pursue them, attacked their Rear guard fo furioufly, that they were repulsed towards the River, where more than two hundred Men perished. The Gross of their Troops having afterwards readily repast the Bridge, destroyed it, and retired a full Gallop to Kutalva, leaving behind them all their Materials and Tools which were to be used at the Siege of Opuczno, with the two Cannons which they had just taken in the Entrenchment; but they carried off a Pair of Colours in the Beginning of the Attack.

The ninth, all the Regiments returned to Budiczin, after having stood all Night under Arms, to see if the Enemy would return to the Charge. As to the Garrison of Opuczno, after having set fire to the Town, they followed the rest of the Troops.

The eleventh, all the Troops decamped from Budiczin, and proceeded two Leagues to Czuki near Pultowa.

The twelfth, we approached the Moat by way of Sappe, and made a Lodgment, whilft the Enemy was intrenching themselves behind the Rampart. Charles Poss conducted this Attack with the Grenadiers of the Guards, who behaved very well.

The fourteenth, Velt-Marshal Rbeinschild departed hence for the Command of his Regiment of Horse about

T Czuki,

Czuki, where we had the Advantage of Forage; for which Reason the Cosfacks kept themselves here and scoured the Country, there being near six thousand Zaporovians.

The fixteenth, the Enemy made many sham Attacks before Day both above and below the Town, with feveral Discharges of small Shot, while twelve hundred Men commanded by Brigadier Gallowin, with Fascines made a Bridge over the Morass, where the Peafants who were perfectly acquainted with the Ground had led them: The vall entered the Town-unperceived. The King thinking they would attempt a Battle, hastened to his Regiment of Guards, and ordered a great Number of Troops to advance; but as foon as the Succours were entered the Town, Menzikof, who commanded these sham Attacks, tetired instantly, being content with his Success in having conveyed in those Troops, and likewise affured a Communication with the Town by a Redoubt mounted with Cannon, which he had railed near the Bridge.

The same Day two Tartar Couriers arrived in the Camp. Mazeppa sent them to the King, with Propositions from the Han of the Tartars, who designed to join us. Towards the Evening the rest of the Regiment of Guards arrived in the Camp, and were posted on the Side of the Cloyster.

The seventeenth, his Majesty gave Orders to raise a little Redoubt on the Foot of the Mountain, on which Pultowa is stuated, and near the River, at the same Place through which the Succours had entered into the Town. The Enemy who were posted on an opposite Piece of rising Ground, las boured at an Entrenchment to incommode us, and the next Day caused two Battalions to defile down the Hill on the Bank of the River, opposite our Redoubt. These Troops gave a Vosley of small Arms on our Guard posted there, which returning it in the same Manner, obliged them to return back behind their Entrenchment.

While these Things were doing on this Side, the Enemy made a Sally with eight hundred Men, commanded by Brigadier Gallowin; but they were so stoutly received by Major General Roos and the Prince of Wurtenberg, that half of them were killed or wounded; the Brigadier was made Prisoner, and the rest with Difficulty enough faved themselves towards the Town... The nineteenth, the Enemy made great Motions on the other Side of the Worskla, where Prince Menzikof drew together a Body of Troops, which appeared defirous of attempting to pass the River and attack us, his Majesty mounted instantly on Horseback, and caused all the Regiments of Foot to defile on the Side of the Cloyller, and draw up in Order of Battle on two The Enemy had besides pushed their Works that Night with great Vigour, which gave us further Reason to think we should come to Blows with them; for which Reason, Velte Marshal Rheinschild drew, nearer with the Horse, to be ready to receive the King's Orders; Out the Enemy feeing the Disposition of our Troops, which were ready to receive them; durit not pals, and contented themselves with keeping us all that day under Arms.

The twenty first, the Regiments of Foot of Roos, Rank, Ulffpar and Wefierbothn, came up with the Camp. MajorMajor General Creutz arrived likewise from his old Post, where he had been with his Regiment of Horse Guards, and posted himself at a short Quarter of a League Distance. The same Day the Enemy discharged more than sixty Cannon from their Entreachments.

The twenty second Brigadier Gallewin attempted to escape by endeavouring to corrupt the Centinel, who refused his Bribe, and publickly declared his Offer; for which the King gave him sixty Crowns to reward his Fidelity.

The twenty-third, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth and twenty-fixth, nothing remarkable past, and the Siege went slowly on; we endeavoured to spring some Mines, but they were discovered. We lost in these Days, a Major, an Engineer, a Captain and a Lieutenant, who were killed in the Approaches: the worst was, that our wounded Men seldom recovered, on account of the sudden Gangrene which attended their Wounds, occasioned by a terrible Heat.

The twenty-seventh, Scheremethof came from Oliva on the Pziol, where he had hitherto remained, to join Menzikof, by passing the Poluzar and the Worskla. The Enemy now began to entrench themselves very carefully on the other Side and to fortify their Camp, after having filled up the Morasses and the Breaches of the Worskla with some Millions of Fascines, over which they carried on their Works, which they armed with Cannon and Mortars: their Lines extended along the River, and on the other Side round their Camp.

The same Day, the Governor of Pulsowa sallied on our Workmen in the Trenches, and drove them Home to the Regiment of Dabl-Carlia, where a Lieutenant of this Regiment was killed, with some Soldiers and Zaporevians; but as soon as this Regiment advanced to support the Workmen, the Enemy retreated in Haste, with the Loss of some Men killed and wounded. The Zaporovians, who had hitherto done good Service in the Trenches, returned thither no more with a good Heart.

On the twenty-ninth, the Enemy drew their Line downward hence to the River; to which we apposed another Line on our Side along the Worst-la, reaching from the Town of Pultowa under the Hill beyond the Cloyster, very near the Bank, slanked with Works on each Extremity; in the middle were two Redoubts near a little Rivulet, which winding between Pultawa and the Cloyster, falls into the Worskla; several of our Regiments of Foot incamped behind to watch the Motions of the Enemy.

The thirty-first, a Party of the Enemy's Valoches and Calmucks attacked our Valoches near Canti; but were so well received, that after many of them were killed the rest ran away full Speed: Our Valoches made ten Prisoners in this Rencounter, amongst which were two of our Deservers. The next Day a Festival was celebrated in the Enemy's Camp, on which Account they made a great Discharge from their Ordinance.

The first, second, and third of June, were past in looking on each other, and on the fourth, a large Detachment of the besieged going forth to forage on the Side of the River, his Majesty gave Orders to murch the Guard, who drove drove them back; but the Besieged foon returning with more Troops, attacked our Guard with all imaginable Fury, who defended themselves in like Manner, without giving one Step of Ground; the Fire, after enduring a good while, ceased on the Enemy's Part. who beat a Retreat, when they faw Swediff Succours arriving: The Besieged re entered their Town with the Loss of several hundred killed and wounded. This Day they began new Works near the River, more to the left, to cover their Bridge of Communication. The same Day, the Czar arrived in their Camp with a good Number of Troops; and their Deferters affured us; that they had thirty Regiments of Foot, as many of Dragoons, and upwards of fifty thousand Coffacks and Calmucks.

The fixth, a Party of the Enemy, confisting of some hundred Horse, without reckoning Cossacks or Calmucks, approached on the Side of · Czuki, to reconnoitre the Camp of Velt-Marshal Rheinschild, who being advertised of the Visit, sent out some Horse to chase them, and these returned with feveral Prisoners. The same Day a Valoche, who had been taken Prisoner by the Russians, escaped, and brought us Word, that the Czar had resolved to attack his Majesty's Army in three different Places; however, he executed nothing at this Time. A large Body of the Enemy's Coffacks attacked a great Number of Peafants of our Party, who were entrenched in a Wood near Cobilak, half Way between the Boristbenes and Pultowa, but were so well received, that they were obliged to retire with confiderable Loss. Mazeppa gave a large Reward to these Peasants.

From the seventh to the thirteenth, nothing remarkable past, except that the Enemy continued to push on their Works, and that we put our Lines in a very good Condition.

The thirteenth, the Czar drew a new Line, and the next Day threw four Bombs into the Town, in which were only contained Letters for the Governor.

The fifteenth, the Enemy attempted to pass the River with many Troops, and attacked the Column under General Cruus, which by their Superiority in Number they had the good luck to dislodge, they plundered his Baggage, and burnt what they could not carry away; at the same Time they delivered more than a thousand Muscovites, with their Colonel, who were Prisoners under the Guard of Cruas's Regiment's but before their Retreat, the Swedes killed one hundred and seventy of their Detachment, which was commanded by General Heinfoben. The same Day there was an Alarm at Count Rheinschild's Quarters at Czuki, 'as well as at Pultowa, where the Governor raised new Works towards the R?ver and the Bridge of Communication, near which we saw many Muscovite Troops who did not however undertake any Thing. .

The fixteenth at Midnight, the E-my threw four Bombs with Letters into the Town. The Governor then gave a Signal, that he had received them. At the same Time the Enemy past the River in the Night with several Troops near a Village of Pietrofka, on M. Rheinschild's; Side and before Day break they had raised a Parapet of seven Bastions, upon which they presently posted themselves and displayed their Colours, carrying on their Entrenchment the whole Day.

Count Rheinschild after having ordered General Creutz's Division, which was the nearest, to approach, with two Regiments of Foot, drew up his Troops in Order of Battle, and waited the King's Orders. The Prince of Wmrtenberg very narrowly escaped being taken Prisoner on this Occasion; for being at too great a Distance to reconnvitre the Enemy, he had been furrounded and taken Prisoner, if some Officers and Dragoons had not haftened to his Assistance, and delivered him from the Pursuit of the Enemy. The Russians made a Feint to pass the Bridge of Communication, a quarter of a League lower under Pulsowa: the King having approached them to reconneitre their Motions, had the Misfortune to receive a Shot which pierced through the Boot of his left Leg, entering in a little above the Toe, and going out at the Heel. He took at first no Notice of this Wound. and continued some Time to give Orders to his Men with the utmost Tranquility, in Contempt of the sharpest Pains, till the Blood running in great Abundance, declared his Wound: he nevertheless express no Emotion, and returned an Hour after flowly to the Camp, where they were obliged to cut off his Boot, his Leg being extremely swelled.

Count Piper and the Generals were much frighted at this Wound. The King observing this solemn Silence, asked Neumann his Surgeon the Reason of all their Consternation; who answered his Majesty plainly, that the Wound was very dangerous, for that some few Marks of a Gangrene already appeared: at which this Prince, far from betraying any Symptoms of fear. replied; There is nothing in that, cut it away, cut it away. And causing him to make very deep Incisions, which he beheld with more Tranquility than the Spectators, he supported this horrible Operation with a Constancy of Mind very extraordinary. There was only this violent Method to fave the King's Foot, which must otherwise have been cut off. The Experiness of the Surgeon having prevented the Gangrene, the King foon found himself able to bear a Litter, though the Cure went but flowly on, both on Account of the excessive Heat, and an intermitting Fever which much incommoded his Majesty.

About Noon, the Enemy made a Sally with twelve hundred Men or thereabouts, and attacked us with great Fury in our Approaches; but the Regiment of Guards who then were in the Trenches being drawn up, soon obliged them to return. Towards the Evening the rest of the Muscovite Army passed the River, and entered into their new Camp. His Majesty having ordered Count Rheinschild to raise some Works, we began to go about them, whilst several Regiments advanced to reinforce the Count. At the same Time the Garrison of Pultows continued to extend their Lines on the Side of the Communication with the Enemy, even to the Foot of the Hill.

On the eighteenth the Enemy carried on their new Works near Pietrofski, directly opposite to the Line which we had drawn against them.
That Day their Gabions were set on Fire.

Fire, which occasioned great Confusion: in the mean Time they pushed on their Approaches vigorously, under favour of a dreadful and continual Fire both from their small Arms and Cannon. They ranged their Horse along the River, on the other Side, and made a Feint to pass, to hinder which, his Majesty ordered our Guard near the River to be reinforced, where a Major General mounted every Day. This Day the Soldiers enquired News of the King, and appeared very much disturbed.

The nineteenth, the Enemy brought up more Troops in their new Entrenchment of Pietrofski, on Velt-Marshal Rbeinschild's Side, where they raised seventeen Redoubts along the River. The Velt-Marshal who had with him nothing but Horse, having presently sent back the two Regiments of Foot, quitted Czuki, and approached within a quarter of a League of Pultowa. Few of the Enemy's Troops were in their Works on the other Side the River opposite to Pultowa; and every thing was easy.

The twentieth, we had an Alarm in Count Rheinschild's Quarters, several Squadrons amounting to about six thousand Horse, besides Cossacks, advanced in order of Battle, and made a Show of attacking us. The Count putting himself immediately at the Head of his Horse, rode a Trot to meet them; and having overthrown them Sword-in hand, broke, dispersed, and routed them, pursuing them a whole League close at their Heels, and without giving them Time to recover themselves.

The Enemy's Loss was considerable in this Rencounter, especially in their Flight, and we reckoned above five hundred dead on the Spot, and in the We took an Officer of Note, Road. with some Soldiers, who told us, that Menzikof and Scheremethof were in their new Camp, with ten thousand Foot and thirty Regiments of Dragoons; that Volkonski had conducted this Regiment, and that General Baver was present, but entirely suddled: we found likewise the Czar's Picture. which that General had lost in his Flight. This Day we saw a great Dust in the Enemy's Camp on the other Side of the River, by which we knew they were in Motion; and they had besides very few Men in their Works on that Side.

The twenty-first, the Enemy had abandoned their Works and their Lines opposite to us. Major-General Sparr, who mounted the Guard the next Day near the River; detached fome Troops to ruin and burn their Works, which was executed. was brought to the King, that the Enemy had drawn all their Forces to Pietrofski, and had left no Troops on the other Side of the Workla. His Majesty was not very well this Day, which gave us an Apprehension of for ... fresh Inflammation; but towards the Evening he grew better: We understood from some Deserters, that the Czar had yesterday told General Baver, in the Presence of several People, that the King of Sweden was wounded in his Foot; that it was believed in the Enemy's Camp, that we should be attacked in a few Days by all the Czar's Forces, and that there were seven hundred Saxons in the City of Moscow, who had deferted from the Swedish Army of Lubeker, which were now ent to Cremelin, to defend it in Case of an Atrack, the Inhabitants of that Capital being under deadly Fears.

The 22d News arrived in the Night that the Enemy was in full March to give us Battle, for which his Majesty gave Orders very early to the whole Army to prepare. The Velt-Marshal, after having remained some Time with the King, went forth, and put himself at the Head of the Cavalry, which were ranged in Order of Battle, whilst the Infantry came up, and formed a Line of a Quarter of a League in Length, having the Horse for their Wings.

All the Baggage was left together in the Rear of the Army, with some Regiments and Zaporovians to cover it. Some Troops had Orders to remain in our Trenches and Redoubts near the River, to defend them. As for the King he was carried in his Bed on a Litter by two Horses, with some Drabans and Squadrons who marched by his Side to guard him.

The Army-thus ranged in Order of Battle, stood some Hours together in Expectation of the Enemy; his Majesty having at first ordered them to carry him to the Head of his Foot, where they took down his Litter, a Circumstance which extremely animated his Troops.

Mazeppa came to the King now, and reported to him, that some Tartar Deputies were arrived at Gobilak with a Turkish Essort. Soon after Secretary Klinkostrom arrived, with Colonel Sandul, and the Tartar Deputies, which were the Captain of the Guards of the Han of the Tartars, the Voyer-General, and some Murses, all Ossi-cers. These being conducted into the King's Presence, made their Obeyfance, while Colonel Sandul presented to Count Piper an Answer of the Seraskier Bashaw of Bender, touching the Valachian Recruits, and Klinko-strom gave him a Letter from the Han of the Tartars.

This Letter of the Han purported in Substance, That the Tariars were ready to mount their Horses against the Rusfians, when they were informed that his Majesty had made Peace with the Czar, after having three Times demanded it; that the Ruffians who had fpread this News, had added, that the King had demanded the Czar's Sister in Marriage; that the Ministers of that Prince had moreover offered large Sums of Money to the Han of the Tartars, to hinder him from entering into the Interests of the King of Sweden, and to perfuade him to embrace the Czar's Party; but that the Han. thro' the extreme Veneration which he bore towards the King of Sweden, had refused their Offers, being thoroughly resolved to run all Hazards with his Majesty.

The King, in the mean Time perceiving that the Enemy did not come, nor had any Defire to attack him, ordered his Army to separate; his Majesty with the Foot marched towards the Cloyster, of which we have before spoken, which is on a Hill opposite to the Town, from whence it is only divided by a Valley. Here the Foot posted themselves, whilst the Velt-Marshal with the Horse, marched on the other Side of the Town, where the King had hitherto been. As to the Baggage, it remained where it was, because because it was not known whether the Enemy would attack us the next Day.

The 23d nothing remarkable passed, except that towards the Evening a Body of Cossacks and Calmucks proceeded towards his Majesty's Camp to reconnoitre us; our advanced Guards fired at them. Towards Night a Deferter from the Enemy brought us an Account, that the Czar was drawing all his Forces on this Side the River, and that General Heinschen only remained on the other with some Regiments, and was posted below the Town, opposite the Velt-Marshal. The Enemy carried on their Intrenehments without ceasing.

On the 24th we were advised, that the Enemy drew nearer, always intrenching themselves as they advanced.

The 25th Gyllenkrok was ordered to remain on the other Side of the Town, where the Trenches were, to conduct the Attack. He had with him the Zaporovians, who worked not willingly in the Trenches; so that Gyllenkrok had much Difficulty to bring them to it. They complained, that they only were always commanded to work, and not the Swedes, and said, that they were not our Slaves.

The 26th the Enemy made great Motions, approaching still nearer and intrenching themselves.

King of SWEDEN.

NUMBER I.

An Exposition of the unjust Proceedings of King Augustus, with respect to the Estates of Poland, which gave Occasion to the Grand Confederacy entered into against him.

REDERICK AU-GUSTUS, Elector of Saxony, was no fooner raifed to the Royal Dignity, than he introduced his Saxon Troops into Poland, to make himself Master of those who were of an opposite Faction. As these observed that their Country was began to be harrassed by the March of these Troops, and by furnishing them with Winter-

Quarters at the same Time as it was on the Point of being exposed to a Civil War, by the Efforts which this Prince made to reduce the Dutchy of *Lithua*nia, and by the Haughtiness with which he carried himself, they took a firm Resolution to oppose those violent Measures, and to stop their Current.

The Pope, who foresaw to what an Extremity the Affairs of Poland would be reduced, if the Minds of the People continued exasperated in this Manner, Manner, sent a Nuncio, called Paulucci, to offer his Mediation, which both Sides accepted. In Consequence of this, a Treaty was concluded at Lowiecz, in Presence of the Primate and some other Senators, between King Augustus and the opposite Party then named Rolloscz. This Treaty contained a great Number of Articles. and is printed in the Polish Tongue. Amongst others, there was one, by which it was agreed to call a General Diet, to settle a good Understanding and Quiet in the Kingdom. This Diet was called foon afterwards, namely in 1699, and published under this Title, Comitia Generalia Pacificationis Regni: A General Assembly for the Pacification of the Kingdom. At this Diet the whole Republick, seeing the Misery into which the Kingdom would be plunged, if they did not stick close to their Laws, declined coming to any Resolution, because the Saxons had no longer Pretence to remain in Poland; fince Augustus had been unanimously recognized by the Treaty of Lowieciz. and a Peace was concluded with the Turks: so that we had no more to do with any foreign Powers.

The Republick could no longer bear to see these foreign Troops, which were not in her Service, to ravage and destroy her Territories; nor would the, who had been accustomed to the Enjoyment of persect Liberty, submit to the Reproaches of having held a Council under the Power of a foreign Force: so that after a thousand Arguments on the Foundation of our Laws, King Augustus seeing at last that if he did not yield to the Demands of the Republick, he should be obliged to discover those Designs of Sovereignty.

which he had formed immediately on his Accession to the Throne, gave universal Assurance, that one Part of his Troops were already on the Frontiers, in their Way out of the Country, and that he would without Delay give Orders to the rest to evacuate the Kingdom, reserving only twelve hundred Men for his Guard, agreeable to the Pasta-Conventa.

The Republick, charmed at this Condescension with which King Augustus only intended to amuse her, as fured this Prince by an express Law of every thing he desired for his Support.

His Majesty obliged himself on his Part not to trouble the publick Repose any more with these Troops; but on the contrary, if they were not gone in six Weeks, or if any should persist in staying longer, that every one might be permitted to fall on them, and treat them as Enemies of the Country, pursuing them in any Manner with Impunity, without incurring his Majesty's Displeasure, or becoming guilty of the Crime lesse majestatis; but that such Treatment of them should be deemed a lawful Action, and authorifed by the Laws.

After this solemn Agreement, the Diet was continued, and many Lawstending to procure and confirm the publick Welfare were concluded. The Diet at length ended successfully, and all the World began to look on our Nation as one of the happiest on Earth, which had a King who delighted in doing good, and was at Peace with all his Neighbours.

But Affairs remained not long in this Situation: for scarce were these fine Hopes conceived when a Change happer ed happened all at once, which no one had any Reason to suspect. The Mask which had been so agreeably put on to impose on the Republick, soon fell off, at the News of the taking of Dunamun de by Flemming, and that only half of the Saxon Army was departed, the had promised never to re-enter into Poland.

The Republick, which was now feparated, was offended at these proceedings, and in the Resolution which she had taken to oppose the Designs of the Court, she found no other Means than to beseech the King to convene a Diet instantly; but the King, far from granting their Request, held only a Senatus Consilium, at which the Primate and upwards of thirty Senators assisted; none of which, except four Saxon Partisans, would intermeddle with, or hearken to the War begun with the King of Sweden.

However, the King pursued his Enterprize with Obstinacy, attempting to beliege Riga, and continually throwing Oil into the civil Fire which he had kindled in Lithuania, and which he laboured by a thousand Practices to spread through the rest of the Kingdom.

Poland, seeing herself by these Means reduced to the Brink of Ruin, began to stir; and particularly the Palatinates of Posnania and Kalisca, who sent their Deputies from the Dietine of Skroda to intreat the King, That be would forbear violating the Pacta-Conventa, and the Laws made against his Troops; that he would design from the War with Sweden, begun without the Knowledge of the Republick; that he would endeavour to extinguish the Fire kindled in Lithuania; and lasty, that be toould call a General Diet, to confider of the publick Affairs.

On these Representations the King called a General Diet, where the Republick began to make their Complaints, by representing that the good Understanding and Interview twice repeared with the Czar of Mulcouy against the Laws of the Country, gave sufficient Assurances of that fatal Yoke which was preparing for them; that, as all this was done without her interfering, she was resolved to enter into no Deliberation on any Point what ever, before the had obtained a Redress of all the Grievances which were the Subjects of her Complaints. was answered on the Part of the King, that this could not at present be done. and that his Majesty must first bring the Enterprise he had undertaken to an honourable liftue; that he would however call a General Diet in a little Time, and would then endeavour to fatisfy the Republick on all her Pretensions. The Time of the Diet being come, the Estates assembled; and demanded Satisfaction of the King, for the Laws which had been violated with Impunity. His Majesty, instead of rendering them Justice, proposed only that they would consent to the fingle Enterprise against Sweden, without giving any forcible or just Reasons which might induce them to agree to fo extraordinary a Demand.

The Republick now perceiving that the Face of Affairs was not changed, and that the was in the fame Situation as before, feparated again without having concluded any thing, either for the Good of the Country, or the Satisfaction of King Augustus; who, feeing that it was impossible to engage the Republick to give her Consent to such Enterprises as would be extremely pernicious to her, began to change the ordinary Course of Affairs; and instead of assembling Diets, he had now Recourse to particular Councils, which were held at Thorn and Marienbourg.

On this Occasion all the Palatinates of the Kingdom protested, and began, by often repeated Deputations, to sollicit the King, that he would not introduce an unheard of Novelty into Poland, to which they could never give their Confent.

This Prince, finding that this Method would not succeed, called a General Diet at Lublin; and as the Palatimates of Posnania and Kaliscz, desired likewise to send their Deputies thither, they held a Dietine at the usual Place at Skroda; most of the Members whereof interesting themselves in the publick Welfare, would not consent to the War with the Swedes. The Saxon Partizans, who were there, protested maliciously against all that passed in this Assembly: so that they were obliged to separate without coming to any Conclusion.

The Members of this Dietine were fcarce retired, when new Universalia appeared, published by the Saxon Partizans of these two Palatinates, to convene another Dietine; whither a great Number of the Nobility repaired, notwithstanding the Want of the usual Formalities in publishing the said Uni-

The Saxon Partisans, fearing lest their irregular Conduct would be cenfured, thought proper to absent themselves; nor did one of them go to the Affembly, which, being defirous to improve the precious Moment that offered, laboured with extraordinary Care and Zeal for the Tranquility of the Kingdom, and fent twelve Mesfengers, all Persons of the first Distinction, to the Diet of Lublin; who, at their Arrival, foon perceived by the Clamours of the Saxon Partisans, that they would not admit them, but would fooner cut their Throats than fuffer them to have a free Voice; and indeed, tho' they did not take away their Lives, they drove them infolently out of the Assembly, as if they had; been the greatest Criminals, or most infamous of Men.

These Gentlemen, so shamefully. driven away, failed not, at their Return, to publish a strong Manisesto, particularising all their Grievances against this enormous and unheard of Proceeding; of which they likewise complained bitterly in a Dietine summoned at Skroda, but which was broke up by a Saxon Partisan. The Nobility were enraged at this Ulage, and hence began their Confederacy at Warfaw, which afterwards increased to such an Height. The Cardinal's Manifesto, and the Instruments of the Confederacy itself forgot none of those Acts of Injustice, committed by Augustus, against the Estates of Poland, of which they gave a very circumstantial Detail.

NUMBER II.

An Extract from the Apology of Feld-Marshal Flemming for the first Invasion of Livonia by the Saxons, translated from the High-Dutch.

FTER the Project, concerning Livonia, had been laid at Warlaw, Mr. Patkul and Major General Carlowitz repaired to Mulovy; at which Time I concerted with Mr. Paikul the Manner of regulating that Body of Troops, which was then at Polanga in Lithuania, in Order to facilitate the Execution of the projected Defign, while I followed the King to conclude the Alliance with the King of Denmark, which was already negotiating. The Death of the late King of Denmark retarded this Business; for none of the Intelligence, which was expected from that Quarter, arrived. Upon this Change I offered to go myself into Denmark, but the King thought proper to fend Count Bottmar, with whom, by his Majesty's Order, I conferred on that Affair, and gave him all kind of Instructions. Reventlau arrived at this Time at Drefden. To remove all Umbrage from his Majesty afterwards approved. Mr. Welling, who was in that City, I concluded an Alliance with the Count; which was done in eight Days, or rather eight Nights. We had not Time to transcribe a fair Copy of the Articles, Count Reventlau being obliged to fet out for Vienna; since he had no other Pretence for remaining at Drefden, than to pay his Respects to his Majesty. I was pleased at this Opportunity of gaining Time, to reflect a little at my Leisure on the Points of the Alliance, and to find out (as I-did) fomewhat to insert in the sectes Arzicles more to the Advantage of the King of Paland.

His Majesty was not ignorant inwhat manner his Troops were paid. and that they were in general on a wory indifferent Foot, through the new. Regulation made under Lowenbaupt's, Direction, who had stripped them of their Horses, Provisions, and every Thing necessary for an Expedition. As this could not be publickly remedied without giving Umbrage, it was necessary underhand to remount the Troops and put them in a good Condition; for this a deal of Money was wanted. I treated without his Majesty's Knowledge, with Count Reventlan on this Head, who consented, at my Instances, to procure me an Advance on the Revenues of the Post-office, which

Some time after this I received Ada vice from Mr. Paikul, of Mr. Paikul's. return, and that there was an Appearance of undertaking the Affair with Success. I resolved to write to Mr. Paikul, to make a Beginning; but I was diffuaded from it, because Mr. Paikul was little known among the Troops which he was to command. and had not yet had Time to beget any Confidence in them; befides. which.

which, it was alledged, that the ill State of the Troops might prevent the Success of the Enterprize. they gave me Hopes of being speedily dispatched; which caused me to acquiesce, without neglecting anything in the mean Time, which might contribute to the happy Issue of the Affair. I afterwards received a Letter from Mr. Paikul, touching the Arrival of Mr. Patked; and by which he defired me, as I might be detained longer in Sandmy, to fend him Orders to begin the Business, after first giving an Account thereof to the King. Upon which I fent my Brother to Paikul, with the Orders he desired.

Carlowitz and Patkil were now arrived in Lithuania, and communicated the Delign to the Colonels, who offered to execute it; on which Account they affembled their Troops, and marched towards Riga, where they put themselves on their Guard on all Sides, as we shall see hereaster.

Carlowitz and Paikal went to Liepzick, to give an Account of their Negotiations, having with them the Treaty concluded with the Czar. Paikal observed, that he despaired of Successin the Enterprize, since they had not begun at the Time appointed,

I told Parket there was but this Alternative, either to abandon the Affair, or to pursue it vigorously; to this his Majesty agreed, but thought it had gone too far to be retracted. Parket was of Opinion, that we should undertake it anew, when Opportunity offered, of which I informed the King, as Parket did not dare appear at Court on Welling's Account.

I gave his Majesty little Hopes, who, after having confidered the Plan of Riga, seemed willing to content himself with the taking of Cobrua, after which we might make a Bridge of Boats, and put ourselves in a Condition of gaining by an open War what we could not carry by Surprize.

it was necessary to secure the Elector of Brandenbaurg, on which Account a Treaty was concluded, stipulating the March of the Saxon Troops through his Country.

I now fet out for Lithuania, having fent before the Quarter-mafter of my own Regiment, with Money and Bills on Danizick; and ordered the rest of the Danish Supply, to be seen me without Delay.

I could then have heartily wished to have executed the Design on Riga; but I sound it not practicable, as well by reason of the Precautions which had been taken to put this Place in a good Condition, as the general Discontent of our Troops, especially the Officers, who, though very brave Fellows, protested against this Enterprize, which they looked on as the Invention of Patkul or Paikul, in the latter of whom they acknowledged they had very little Considence.

Hence I took an Opportunity of conferring with Carlowitz, Patkul and Paikul. They were all three ardently disposed to pursue the Design on Riga; but I insisted on the Execution's being impossible. Patkul and Paikul agreed with my Opinion: Carlowitz was at first strenuous for the Attempt, but at length submitted to us.

It was concluded to surprize the advanced Guard, and attack Cobrun, and attack Cobrun, and I had advised. They were for employploying no more than five hundred to build Caseras; since which, they Men, but I commanded a thousand, had not had Time to rebuild it, and and my Regiment of Dragoons.

The Report which was made to us by those who had reconnoitred the Fort, changed these three Gentlemens Opinions, and they would have desisted from the Attack, and have contented themselves with barely entering into the Country; but I remained stedfast in my Resolution, and employed all Manner of Means to animate the Officers and Soldiers. It is not necessary to show how I seconded Mr. Paskul, in those wholesome Orders which were given through the Country to gain the Affection of the People, or how we beat the Regiment of Horle of the Nobility of the Country,

I had a Conference with Mr. Paikul about Dunamund, and we judged: First, That it was a Place of the greatest Importance. Secondly, That it must be absolutely attacked in the Winter, or never thought of. Thirdly, We gave Attention to what we heard, namely, that ones of the Courtines had been utterly thrown down to build Caseras; since which, they had not had Time to rebuild it, and that that this Part was now desended only by a single Palisade. Fourthly. That the Garrison was very small, and little able to support an Attack. Fifthly and lastly, We knew that we could take Advantage of the low Flanks to scale the Place; all which Reasons determin'd us to attack it, and Mr. Paikul shewed great Impatience to enter upon what he thought infallible.

At last being determined on the Attack, I commanded a Body of a little more than fix thousand Men, the rest having perished where they had been, without sighting. The Attack was to be made by two thousand, and, in this case, one thousand were to be used as a Body of reserve. I had yet Foot enough to make the Bridge and defend the Fort, and was superior to them in Horse. His Majesty had already received an Account from me of the Execution of the Attack on Duuamund.

NUMBER III.

An Abridgement of the Campaign which the Swedish Army made in Finland, Anno 1708, under the Command of Major-General Baron Lybecker.

S soon as the Major-General had received his Orders from the Senate of Sweden, concerning the Invasion which he was to make on Ingria, as well to draw the Enemy from that Side, as to hinder them, if possible, from disturbing his Majesty's

March to the Ukrain, all our Forces in Finland to the Number of twelve thousand Men, as well Foot as Horse, were put in Motion, and departed the tenth of August, N. S. from the Town of Wiburg.

The next Day it unluckily began to rain, rain, which continuing fifteen Days without ceasing, made the Roads almost unpassable, and consequently the March extremely difficult and laborious. At last, after they had surmounted all Obstacles, and were arrived at a Place named Keltis, situated two Leagues from the Neva. the Army which had pitched their Camp, learnt from their Parties which had been sent to reconnoitre the Enemy, that they were posted on the other Side the Neva with five thousand Men, to oppose our Passage over the River, to which Purpose they had raised a small Battery of four Field-pieces. Upon this Advice, Mr. Lybecker detached immediately Colonel Henry Haftfer with two thousand Men, having with him Pontons for the Passage, with Orders to attack and diflodge the Enemy. As foon as Mr. Haftfer had arrived at the River, which in this Part is very rapid, he embarked fixteen hundred Foot under the Command of the Lieutenant-Colonels Stiernstrable, Krusenstierna, and Clas Skog, who notwithstanding the continual Fire from the two Russian Galleys, and from the Batteries on the opposite Side, crossed the River, and attacked the Enemy with so much Bravery, that after a bloody and obstinate Fight which lasted an Hour, they put them to Flight, with a dreadful Slaughter.

This Action being over, and the Army being drawn down to the River, they continued to pass for thirteen Days together. They then marched in several Columns from Tusma to Ingris. The Major-General having received Advice that the Enemy had some Magazines near Duderdorff, about three Leagues from Ingris, filled with Soldiers Cloths and Provisions. he put himself at the Head of three thousand Horse, and set out in the Morning to furprize and feize on those Magazines: but as this Country is full of Defiles and of difficult Passes, the Horse were very much put to it to furmount them, and were thereby retarded in their March. Being, at last arrived near a great Defile named Karbula, where the Enemy had three hundred Dragoons, the Swedish Van-guard, confifting only of forty Dragoons, attacked them so fiercely on a Gallop with Sword in hand, that they did not give them Time for a fingle Discharge, and pursued them close at their Heels, killing some of them, and taking twenty Prisoners.

The General after this Rencounter. finding his Men extremely fatigued. made them halt to give them a little Breath, their Horses being so satigued that they could go no farther; but having heard a Moment afterwards that the Enemy had fet Fire to those Magazines, from whence they were only at one League's Distance, he ordered his Troops to return to their Camp. The Army marching in excellent Order, passed near Petersbourg and Cronstadt, and came to a Place called Heilibusch, where they pitched their Camp. Here the General on his first Arrival, which was the 13th of September, called a grand Council of War, to confider what was to be done in so advanced a Scason, and when the Army was so satigued by continual and laborious Marches: It was at length resolved, to send Major Schlippenbach with a Brigantine from our Fleet at Revel, to know of the Lieutenant-General of that Name, if the

Digitized by Google Army

Army could by any Means be sublisted during the Winter in the Province of Ethonia.

Till the Answer was brought back, the Army having pasted half a League from Kapuria, encamped at a Place called Welka. The General detached two thousand Horse to Kapuria, where Brigadier Friser was advantageously posted with some thousand Men. having before him a large Trench armed with Chevaux de Frise, a Parapet, and some Field-pieces. As soon as our Horse were in Sight of the Enemy, they dismounted and attacked them in the Instant with such Force, that notwithstanding the Enemy's Fire, and their advantageous Situation, they were overthrown after half an Hour's Fight. and forced to fly in Disorder. They did not think proper to purfue them, and after they had taken at this Place the Enemy's Chancery, the Detachment returned and joined the Army. Amongst their Papers was found the Plan of an Operation against the Swedes, which consisted in marching against them upwards of twenty thoufand Men drawn from different Gara rifons, and which were already in Motion to cut off our Retreat.

As the Season was already very far advanced, and the Cold began to grow very rigorous, it was resolved to march the Army towards the Sea, to embark the Troops on board our Fleet, which was to transport them into Finland. The General had preferred this Resolution to any other, because the Passage into Eftonia on Narva Side, appeared to him at first more difficult than it really was. However, the Army being repaired to the Sea-fide the tenth of Ottober near a Place called Kolkanpa, where our Fleet lay at Anchor. began the Embarkation, which lasted fifteen Days, during which, without any Necessity, and from the Effect of a Panick Terror which had no folid Foundation, the General ordered all the Horses to be killed, which amounted to five thousand, and which were maffacred accordingly, to facilitate our Retreat. The Rear-guard composed of four hundred Saxon Foot. and commanded by Major Seulenburg. being on the Point to be embarked as the others had been, was attacked by the Enemy, against whom they deferided themselves with wonderful Bravery for several Hours, but were at length for the most Part sain, and the rest made Prisoners. The Fleet sailed with the Army to Biorokoo, four Leagues from Wiburg, where they landed in Finland. This was the unhappy Issue of an Enterprize, which had at first appeared to advantageous, and which had certainly produced the greatest Consequence, if it had been conducted with more Vigour and Prudence. It had now no other Effect than the Loss of Numbers of the Inhabitants of that Country, who having declared too foon for their antient Masters, were all carried into Slavery.

A Relation of the Battle of Pultowa, with some Resections on the two preceding Campaigns.

HEN the late Chanles XII. was in Saxony, he would have been very glad to have made a:
Peace with the Czar, if that Prince had been then inclined to conclude fuch a one, as in a Conjuncture fo glorious for Swaden, might have been the leaft reasonable.

It is true that the Czar did offer one; but the Condition fine qua non, was not relished by the King, his Enemy absolutely resolving to keep the Port of Petershourg on the Baltick Sea, which could not be yielded to him without entirely overturning the whole System of our Politicks.

Besides this, the Czar was too deeply engaged with the Emperor, England and Holland, who continually somented this War, in order to give a Diversion to the Courage of the young Swediff Conqueror, whose Friendship for France was much apprehended by them. Several Letters were intercepted about this Time, advising the Czar, to expose and ransack his Provinces and Estates, some than give up the least Arricle of his Pretensions.

Charles XIL who saw himself at the Head of the finest and most war-like Army that perhaps ever was, elated with his great Successes, and in no Humour to have Conditions prescribed him, departed from Saumy, to impose reasonable ones on his formidable Enemy, and such as might for the suture secure the Repose of the Northy but especially to saut up the Russaus within their antient Bounds.

It is however certain, that his Majesty lest Germany with Regret, where he wished to remain to be the Mediator between France and the Allies; but the Destiny of this brave Prince was written in Flewen, and he was drawn against his Will into a Chain of Dissiculties and Missortunes, which almost inevitably attended him, and against which he had Occasion for all his Courage to support him, as we shall see hereafter in this Relation.

As foon as the King came into Poland, the Russians gave Ground to him, always retreating backwards, burning, plundering and ransacking all that they insert with on their Way, without ever coming to a decisive Battle. Our Army having in this manner passed through Poland, sometimes coasting along the Borders of Prussia, the King put them into Winter quarters in the Grand Dutchy of Lithunia, where he chose the little Town of Radaschowitz near Wilna for his Headquarters.

The Time being come for opening the Campaign, it was uncertain what rout they should take to pursue the Enemy; for there were two whichmight bring them to him. The first was that of Poloksko, whence it was easily to turn to the Side of Novogored, and there to join the Armies under Count Lowenburgs and General Lybecker; but after having deliberated on this Affair in the Council of War, it was found impossible to substitute Swedish Armies in that Province.

The

The Czar moreover had not abandoned his Resolution, of burning and deftroying all the Country through which we were to pass, a Project which he could easily execute in that Part of his Dominions. We might have easily turned towards Livonia; but that poor Country as well as Estbonia and Ingria, had fuffered fo much, that they had not wherewithal to subsist the least Army, the adjacent Parts being yet in a Condition less capable of furnishing us with Succours, either for our Foot or Horse. It was not less inconvenient to march to the City of Moscow. passing through the Dutchy of Twer, by reason of the continual Woods which are in this Dutchy and that of Novogorod, through which there are only two Roads, which besides the great Number of Defiles and Morafses, might have been easily rendered. impassable by the Enemy, the first leading directly to the Town of Twer, and the second through that of Tiffi-

All these Difficulties appeared unfurmountable, it was therefore resolved to think no more of this Rout, especially as we flattered ourselves that General Lybecker had sufficient Forces to invade the Provinces of Novogored and Pleskow, the Czar being obliged to employ the chief Part of his. Army to oppose that of his Majesty.

After this Rout was rejected, it was deliberated whether we should take that of Smolensko. Here were the same Dissipulties with Regard to the Wood, which is of a considerable Length and full of Morasses, through which the Army must defile several Days together. This Wood begins at Smolensko, and extends to the Town of Mosako, which is but a very little Way from Moscow. The greatest Difficulty was, that after we had, notwithstanding all Obstacles, penetrated through the Wood, the Czar had destroyed the Country to that Degree. that our Army would have found neither Provisions, Forage, nor Winterquarters. And besides all the other Reasons which induced the King equally to reject these two Routs, there remained another great Obstacle to surmount, which was particular to the former Rout, namely, that the Towns of Pleskow and Novogorod must have been both taken before we advanced? further; and if we had taken the latter. we were indispensably obliged to make ourselves Masters of Smolensko, which Siege might have much delayed our March.

All this engaged the King to propose another Expedient, which was to take the Rout of Mobilow and Kritzowa, and thence through the Woods of Severia to Starodub, a small Town of this latter Province. The Czar, on the Recommendation of Mazeppa, Hettman or General in chief of the Cossacks, had trusted the Government of the Province and that of the Town of Staredub, to a Colonel whose name was Skoropaiski, who had a Regiment of some thousand Cossacks; but which, as well as their Colonel, depended on the Orders of the Hettman. The King was the rather induced to take this Road, by the new Alliance which he had concluded privately with Mazeppa, who having had little Resson to be pleased with the Czar, had long ardently wished to shake off his Yoke. and throw himself under the Protection of the King of Sweden, whose great ReputaReputation had made a strong Imprefsion on him. King Stanislaus and the Crown of Poland were comprised in this Alliance. The Articles which Mazeppa presented to the King of Sweden, to obtain his Friendship and Protection, were the following.

'First, That he would engage to receive his Swedish Majesty into the Province of Severia, and to deliver up to him all the Fortresses, viz. Starodub, Novogrodk or Novogorod, Serviersky, Blin, Bransk and others, which had formerly belonged to the Great Dutchy of Lithuania, which served at present as Frontier Fortresses of that Dutchy. This Pro-"vince was now governed in chief by the Great-General Mazeppa, who ' had settled here, by the Czar's Order, Colonel Skoropaiski, whose Regiment, as they fay in the Ukrain, depended on Mazeppa.

Secondly, That his Majesty might take up his Winter-quarters in this Province, till Mazeppa had drawn together all the Army of the Costacks, and brought the Cossacks of Bialograd into the Alliance, with those likewise of the River Don, who were all diffictissied with the tyrannical Government of the Russians; for the Czar was by little and little stripping them of all their Privileges.

'Thirdly, That Mazeppa should endeavour to bring the Chan of the Calmucks, named Ajuka, into the fame Design.

Fourthly. That as foon as Mazeppa had acquitted himself of what was contained in these three Articles, his Majesty would put himself in Motion, and march directly to Mascow, whilst Mazeppa on his Side should ioin him with all his Troops, and those of the Cossacks of Bialogorod and Don, with the Malecontent Calmucks. That as to what concerned the Sublistance of the Swedish Army, Mazeppa obliged himself to draw Provisions from the Ukrain, and the ' Provinces of Bialogorod, which are fome of the most fertile in the whole World. That by taking of these 'Measures, they would oblige the * Czar to retreat northward of the ' Town of Moscow, and the River Vol-'ga, where the Country is not near fo truitful as that on the South, and in no wife sufficient to sublist an Army fo large as his: this together with the Fears of the Russians that they might be obliged to make Head against us in the open Field, though they were 3 Times our Superiours in · Number, would put the Swedish Army in a Condition to give Laws e-'very where, whilst the Czar must be infallibly loft, and his Army wanting Sublistance, and a great Part of it 'ditcontented, would be obliged, according to all Appearences, to difband themselves, or submit to the Conqueror. Whilst these well-concerted Projects gave, humanly speaking, all imaginable Hopes of Success, King Staniflaus, having with him a Body of the Swedish Army, commanded by Major-General Crassau, neglected nothing on his Part to gain over the rest of the Poles, who under the Title of Confederates, flood out yet against him in divers Provinces. It was resolved that as foon as that King should have reduced these Malecontents to a Submisfion, Orders should be given to the Po-Kkk li[b lish Troops, to enter Rusha by two different Ways, that the Crown Army should penetrate on the Side of Kiow, and that of Lithuania should attack Smolen fko. Lastly, we flattered ourfelves, that Major-General Lybecker's Invasion of Ingria at the Head of 12000 Men, would complete the Czar's Distress, and demolish him without any Resource, that General being to make himself Master of that Province, to burn Petersbourg, and afterwards invade the Provinces of Novogorod and Pleskow, that his Army might in case of Necessity be reinforced by Detachments drawn from the Garrisons of Riga and Revel; which would have been very easy without exposing these, if Lybecker had had more Prudence and good Fortune in his Expedition.

The Alliance concluded between Mazeppa and the Poles was founded on the following Articles.

First, That Mazeppa should punctually execute all that hath been mentioned above, and to which he was bound; namely, to deliver the Province of Severia to the King of Sweden, with all its Fortresses, &c.

Secondly, That he should promise to be ready to march with the whole Army of Cossacks, on the ' King's first Orders.

'Thirdly, That he should attempt to bring the Cossacks of Bialogrod, as well as those of Don, with Ajuka, Chan of the Calmucks, into the same Alliance.

'Fourthly, That he should restore all the Ukrain to the Poles, which together with Severia, and the Provinces of Kiow, Zschernikow and Smolensko, were to return under the Pas

6 lish Government. As a Recompence 6 for which, they promised Mazeppa 6 the Title of Prince, with the same 6 Conditions under which the Duke of 6 Courland possessed his Country, with 6 the Palatinates of Witpesky and Po-6 losses.

A Day was then appointed, before which Mazeppa was to impart all these Conditions to his Colonels, and to engage them to a voluntary Consent, by representing to them, the undoubted Advantages which,
they would receive by recovering their former Liberty, of which the Russans had only less them the Shadow.

Such were the Conditions of this. Treaty, which was conducted fo artfully, and kept so secret, that no onehad the least Knowledge of it, except the King of Sweden, King Stanistaus, Mazeppa, Count Piper, a certain Polish Senator whose Name I have forgot. and the Archbishop of Servia or Bulgaria, who was banished his Country for what Reason I know not. last conducted the whole Affair, and went continually during the Negotiation between the Swedish Army and that of Mazeppe, being the less liable to Suspicion, as he was a Greek by his Religion and banished, moreover drest in the Habit of a Mendicant, begging Charity from Town to Town.

All these Projects were so well concerted, and so dexterously conducted, that every reasonable Man who had examined them, must have foretold, humanly speaking, a successful Issue for Sweden; and that the Czar must before the End of the Year have been necessitated to accept such Conditions of Peace as the King of Sweden.

would have imposed on him.

But as the Ways of the Almighty are unknown to us, he often permits the wifest and most prudent Counsels to be consounded, and produce a quite different Issue from what we flatter ourselves with, as indeed it fell out in the Event of this March to the Ukrain, which was in the End satal to Sweden.

When Charles XII. undertook this Expedition, he had an Army of about twenty Regiments under his Command: Sweden never faw so considerable a Force, nor, as I imagine, could that Force have been conducted with more Prudence, good Counsel and Wisdom, than it was in the Closet of Charles XII. at the Beginning of this Negotiation, and of the Year 1708. Never Kingdom had at the Head of her Armies, a more brave and active Prince, or indeed a better Soldier than Charles XII. and never King had a more warlike Army, Troops better disciplined or more faithful, than those were at that Time. Notwithstanding which we miscarried, and it seemed as if Heaven was at once willing to humble Sweden, and punish it by the fatal Campaign in 1709, and at the same Time to raise Charles XII. above all the Monarchs and all the Heroes which had preceded him, by giving him an Opportunity of demonstrating in the Face of the whole Earth, that admirable Constancy and Firmness of Temper, which shone forth in his Adversity, and set off those other infinite great Qualities which this Prince posfeffed.

It is surprizing to reflect on the Occurrences of those Times. In Reality, we had scarce lest Saxony, when all the Elements declar'd against us. During the Summer in 1708, it rained continually, and in the Beginning of 1709, we had a Winter so severe and extraordinary, that the Memory of Man had known nothing like it. Add to all this, that the Swedish Generals, who commanded separate Bodies of the Army, committed divers Mistakes, and were almost unsuccessful every where, by which the main Body and the Army which his Majesty commanded in chief suffered very much. Nevertheless, his Majesty never appeared greater, or more magnanimous than at this Time. He faw his Army mouldering every Day by Fatigue and continual Labour, by Skirmishes and Battles, tho' they always got the better; and notwithstanding that Hunger, Misery and Cold, destroyed them daily in great Numbers, it was impossible for him to recruit them, by reason of his Distance from Sweden. In Contempt of all these Misfortunes, his Majesty continued to push the Enemy, who was at least four Times as strong, obliging them to secure themselves behind Rivers and Morasses, or to entrench themselves up to their Teeth; whilst our own Troops, amounting in the whole to no more than twenty thoufand Men, including the fick and wounded, were divided into several little Bodies for their better Subsistence, and never permitted to entrench themselves.

In 1708, when Charles XII. quitted his Winter-quarters to take the Field, his Army was composed of the following Regiments.

Horse. The Drabans, the Horse. Kkk 2 Guards.

the Regiment of the Nobility, the Ostrogoths, the Regiment of Nyland, the Regiment of Smoland, the Regiment of North-Scania, the Regiment of South Scania, the Tremannings of Cruse.

Dragoons. The Dragoon-Guards, Buchwald's, the Prince of Wurtenberg's, Meyerfeld's, Duker's, Taub's, Hielm's, Gy!lenstierna's, Albedyhl's.

Foot. The Regiment of Guards, Of Upland, Westmanland, Sudermanland, Dalcarlia, Westerbothn, Wermland, Scataborg, Ostrogothia, Calmar, Croneberg, Jonkioping.

Besides these Regiments, his Majesty had likewise a suitable Train of Artillery, with a Part of the Regiment of Artillery, some hundreds of Einspanners, who always guarded the King's Baggage and that of the Chancery, with some Companies of Valoches, with Mr. Kanifer, Aid de Camp General, and Colonel Sandul, at their Head.

His Majesty had lest in Poland to support King Stanistaus, Major-General Crassau, at the Head of the following Regiments.

Dragoons. Crassau's, Muller's, Mars-

chall's, Zulich's.

Foot. The Regiment of Horn, or of Stetin, Eckeblad's Regiment at Elbing.

In Pomerania and the Dutchy of Bremen, there were the following Regiments, several of which had Orders to join Crassau, in case of Necessity.

Horse. The Regiment of Pomerania, Commanded by Wolfrath, ——Of Bremen by Horn, the Regiments of the Nobility of Pomerania and Bremen.

Foot. The second Regiment of Stetin, Commanded by Stuart; the Regiment of Stralsund, by Schultz. — Of Wismar, by Ridderbielm, the Regiment of Palmquist, — Of Breitholtz, Foreigners, one Battalion in the Dutchy of Deux Ponts, at Stade, the Battalions of Gyllenstierna and of Welling.

His Swedish Majesty had given Orders to the following Regiments to remain in Sweden.

Dragoons. The Westrogoths, that of Count Aschenherg, the Tremannings of Count Leyenhus wnd, —Of Gyllenstyerna, the Femmannings of Hierta, the Regiment of Bahus, Ramswerd's, afterwards Cruse's, two hundred Dragoons in Jemptland.

Foot. Two hundred Foot, of the Regiment of Guards, under Hamilton, in Garrison at Stockholm, the Regiment of Vonder-Noth, — of Jemptland, — of Biorroborg-Lebn, one Battalion of Worm land, the Regiment of Westgiotadabl, — of Elstourg, — of Gothebourg, Commanded by Kohlar, — of Zinclair, — of Malmo, the Blue-Guards or the Regiment of Landscrona.

Some Time before the King opened his Campaign in 1708, he ordered Major-General Lybecker to pass the Niewa, and penetrate into Ingria with his Army at a certain fixed Time. His Army was composed of the following Regiments.

Horse. Tisenbausen, Abolebus-Fordub, bling, Niland's, Wiborg's.

Dragoons

Dragoons of Hartfebr.

Foot. The Regiment of Tavastbus, Commanded by Hartsebr, one Battalion of the Regiment of Narva, in the Garrison at Kexbolm, Osterbothn-Fordubbling, Biorneborg's, Abolebn's, Nyland's, Tavastbus, Wiborg Lebn's, Savolax. This last Regiment was composed of Saxon Prisoners, which King Augustus had lest with the King of Sweden at the Peace of Alt-Ranstadt. They were Commanded in chief by Mr. Schommer. The other principal Officers were Stralborn, Boye, Zeulenberg; &c.

As to the Passage of the Niewa by Lybecker, as I was not present at it I shall pass it by. For the same Reafon I shall not mention the useless and fatal Expedition of that General made into Ingria: I call it fatal, not so much on Account of his Loss, which was only of his Horses, which were killed very unnecessarily to hasten a Retreat, in which the Enemy made fome hundred Prisoners; but I call it chiefly fatal, because the Russians after the Retreat had the Liberty to withdraw their Troops out of Ingria, and to reinforce the Army which they brought against Count Lowenbaupt, which by this Means became fo much his Superiour, that they attacked the Count with Advantage and Success at the bloody Battle of Liefna. In effect, Lowenbaupi's Loss on this Occasion drew after it the Defeat of our Army, and brought our Kingdom to the Brink of Destruction, as we shall afterwards fce.

But, before we go farther, I shall here put down the List of those Regiments which composed Lowenbaupt's Army; and I shall afterwards mention the Orders that the King sent him on the Rout, which he was to hold with his Troops in order to join his Majesty.

Horse. The Regiment of the Nobility at Riga, — of Abolebn, — of Carelia.

Dragoons. The Finland Dragoons of Jogen, the Regiment of Wenner-field, Schlippenbach, Schreiterfeld, the Squadron of Skog.

Foot. The Regiment of Helsingland, of Count Lowenhaupt of Banner, the Battalion of Bergou of Stal, of Biorneborg, Commanded by Major-General Stackelberg, a Battalion of Abolebn, by the Count de la Gardie, one Battalion of Osterbosbn, one Battalion of Nyland.

Horse. The Regiment of the Nobility of Estbonia.

Dragoons of Broms.

Foot. 1 Battalion of Mellyn, — of Lowen, — two of Wyke, — one of Palen, the Battalion of Schengel, — of Carl Adam of Stakelberg, Clot Hillebord, the Battalion of Wiborg, — of Savolax, — of Osterbothn, — of Nieroth, Mengden, Becker, the Battalion of Osel, commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Sass.

This was the formidable Force of Sweden in 1708. When his Majesty had appointed Mazeppa a Day to acquaint his Colonels with his Alliance with Sweden and Poland; he informed him likewise of the Day in which he had resolved to pass the Dnieper, or Boristbenes, and at the same Time sent Orders to Lowenbaupt to put himself in Motion at a certain Day, and bring up his Army to join him, with Provifions for fome Months.

It is not known whether those Orders did not lie too long in the Chancery before they were fent, or whether the Courier did not loiter too much on the Road, or indeed whether. the Count, who was otherwise a very prudent and experienced General, being intirely ignorant of the Allianceconcluded with the Felt herr Mazenpa, did not believe that it was more necessary to amass Provisions and other Things needful for pushing the War on with Success in so desolated a Country according to his Majesty's Orders, than to hasten his March; which, if he had begun on the Day fixed by his Majesty, he could not have compleated his Orders relating to the Provifions, which he executed with extraordinary Care and Application. Whatever was the Occasion of it, the fatal Delay of Lowenbaupt's March beyond the Day fixed, was the real Cause of the Misfortunes which afterwards befel the King of Sweden.

After the King had quitted his Winter-quarters, forced the Passage of Bereniza, and beat the Russians at the Battle of Holocozin, he drew directly to the Dnieper, where he expected to be presently joined by the Count de Lowenbaupt; but, as the Time fixed with Mazeppa was expired, and the King continued near the Dnieper in continual Expectation of Lowenbaupi's coming up, Mazeppa fent to acquaint his Majesty that he had declared to his Colonels the Alliance which he had concluded with a View of shaking off the Russian Yoke, and begged him not to delay his March, left fome of his Colonels should change their Minds, and discover all that had passed to the Czar.

His Majesty was now reduced to an Uncertainty, not knowing what Means to follow. On the one Hand he faw plainly, that if he waited for Lowenbaupt, all that great and fine Scheme which he had so carefully concerted with Mazeppa, could not produce the hoped for Success; and on the other, he felt too fensibly the extreme Necessity he was in of this Conjunction, without which Lowenbaupt's Army would be in danger of being loft. At last, he chose rather to expose that Army, than to lose the Advantages which he hoped to draw from the Alliance concluded with the Cossacks; for he was persuaded, that if he neglected so favourable an Opportunity as this to weaken the great Power of the Rushans, he should never find fuch another.

The King believed moreover, that if Count Lowenbaups should be attacked by the Russians, he had a sufficient Number of Troops to repulse them; pretty well knowing of what force the Czar's Army was, which was to act against him. As his Majesty was not yet informed of the fruitless Expedition of Lybecker, he could not foresee the Reinforcement which the Enemy could now draw from Ingria, to render their Army so much superiour in Number to the Count's.

I shall not stay here to give the Particulars of that General's March, of the Attack on him by the Russians, the glorious Defence of his Army at the Battle of Liesna, where six thousand Swedes sustained the Efforts of thirty thousand Russians, a whole Day without giving an Inch of Ground;

nor shall I say any thing of the prudent Conduct of this General, after the Action, in bringing off the rest of the Army safe to the King; all which is very well fet forth in the Memoirs of Gustavus Adlerfelt. I shall content myself with following the King's Army in the laborious March which they had undertaken towards the Ukrain.

After that Prince had passed the Dnieper near Mobilow, he made a Feint of intending to draw towards Smolen-Ato, in order to engage the Czar to draw all his Troops on that Side, and by that Means to give Mazeppa Room to act with more Liberty and Success in the Provinces of Severia and the Ukrain, under Favour of the Swedes. His Majesty still believed that he should at last oblige the Enemy to stand their Ground by pursuing them without Cessation; but all in vain, their first Maxim being always to retreat, and burn, and destroy all fre Places through which we were to follow them.

It is proper to mention, that the Country on the other Side the Dnieper is called the Palatinate of Mizieslaw, which belongs to Poland and Lithuawie, and that this Province, if I may be allowed the Expression, is all covered with Morasses. As the continual Rains in 1708, had rendred all the Roads almost impassable, even those which were at other Times the best, it may be imagined what the Army must suffer in a Country so full of Moraffes as this; especially as the Czar made his Advantage of them, retreating always through them, passing from one to another to cover his Retreat, burning all the Towns and Villages, and intirely destroying the whole Coun-

Notwithstanding all these Obstacles the King pursued the Czar so briskly, that no Day passed without some Battle or Skirmish between the two Armies. as may be seen in the History of this Prince; but as his Majesty found himfelf under a Necessity of instantly joining Mazeppa, after having followed the Enemy for some Time beyond Mobilow on the Side of Smolensko, he made a Counter-march, and passing the River of Sossa near the Town of Krizowa, the Army entered the great Woods of Severia which lie between Krizowa and the Town of Starodub.

It is impossible to express what the Army suffered on this Rout, and Posterity will have a Difficulty to believe it. Most of the Regiments had confumed the Bread which they had taken with them from their Winterquarters, and as foon as the King had passed the Borist benes they had no Opportunity to get any more, all that Country having been entirely facked and destroyed. All that they had to fustain Life was some Cattle which we had carried with us when we took the Field; but these poor Animals for want of Pasture, and by the terrible Marches which they had made, were fo lean and weak that they were with: Difficulty kept alive. The Flesh however of these Cattle distributed with great Œconomy without Bread and without Salt prevented the Army from dying with Hunger on this dreadful Rout, where the Troops were almost always in the Water passing over those long Morasses, and where their Misery was increased by not finding tolerable. ble Water to quench their Thirst.

Before his Majesty began his Rout on that side, he had ordered Major-General Lagercrona to go before with some thousand Men, and to make himself Master of the Fortresses of Scveria, which are Starodub, Blin, Novogrod, Seweerski, &c. which, according to the Convention with Mazeppa, were to be delivered to the King's Troops by Colonel Skoropaiski as foon as they appeared before them; but unhappily Lagercrona suffered himself to be mit-led by a Traytor, who conducted him out of his Way cross the great Wood; so that he did not enter into Severia till some Days beyond the Time appointed, and two Days only before his Majesty entered it himself with the rest of the Army.

This Delay was a Misfortune fo much the more fatal to our Arms, that Skoropatski, who otherwise, as I very well knew, was perfectly a good Swede in his Heart, and was so to his Death, having heard in the mean Time of the Battle with Count Lowenbaupt, entirely changed his Mind; not only on confidering as he did the Confequences which he presently foresaw from the Battle of Liesna, but also weighing the Accounts which he had received of the unhappy Expedition of Lybecker, and principally relying on what he politively knew of the miserable Condition of his Majesty's Army, which being destitute of every Thing, mouldered away by Hunger, Fatigue, and long Marches, which they were obliged every Day to make. On all these Reasons apprehending that the Swedish Affairs were in an ill Situation, and not being willing to expose himself to the Czar's Vengeance, of which he stood in fear, he thought the furest and most advantageous Step which he could take, would be to discover to the Czar the Alliance which Mazeppa and his Colonels had entered into with Sweden; fearing, no doubt, lest some other should prevent him, and then he should have no Favour to expect at the Czar's ·Hands. He therefore acquainted him with all that had been done to his Prejudice, and having at the same Time ordered all the Gates of Starodub and the other Towns to be shut. which according to the Convention were to be delivered to Major General Lagercrona; he admitted the Russian Troops into all these Places, which Major General Island brought thither with all Expedition.

The King now entred into Severia, and faw himself outstripped by the Enemy, which gave him the greater Aneasiness as his Army were absolutely like to want Subsistence, the Peasants and other Inhabitants being retired into the Towns with all their Cattle, and the Country left a perfect Defart. Nor was it possible for his Majesty to return by the Way he came, not being strong enough for that, tho' his Army was reinforced by the Remains of that of Lowenbaupt. On the other Hand, his Design of marching from Severia directly to Moscow could not be executed, it being too dangerous to leave so many Fortresses of this Province in Possession of the Enemy behind him. No other Resource then remained, but to march into the Ukrain.

If Mazeppa had at that Time had more Steadiness, the King's March would have perhaps been more successful. But he now began to waver, at first first believing that he might regain the Czar's Favour, and therefore left the King of Sweden some Time in Severia, without appearing resolved to admit him into the Ukrain; whilst the Czar. who was irritated at this Hettman, sent a Part of his Army with great Expedition into the Ukrain, to surprize Mazeppa at Baturin, the Place of his Residence. He happily 'escaped the Missortune of being taken, but could not avoid the entire Ruin of that Town, which was carried by Storm, plundered and burnt. Loss was the more considerable, as there was in that Place a great Magazine of all Sorts of Ammunition, of Powder, Cannons, as well of Brass, as Iron; but above all a great Quantity of Provisions, which, in this Country, as well as in Rusha, are very scarce and dear.

This was extremely regretted, as we may eafily believe, by an Army half-starved like ours; and Mazeppa had fufficient Reason to repent of his Delays: but the greatest Loss in Reality was the Destruction of the Magazine of Powder, Lead. Cannon and Musket balls, which was carried off and destroyed by the Enemy at the facking of Baturin. The great Necesfity we had of this, is easily to be imagined; for what Goodness could be in our Powder which we had brought with us from Saxony, and had been often wet and dried again; on which Account only it is affonishing that we gained so many Battles, tho' to say the Truth, our Troops used their Swords more than their Fire-Arms.

Mazeppa, after the Ruin of Baturin, at last retired to the King's Army, bringing with him some thousand Cosfacks, which were all that he could bring over to his Party, and threw himself, tho' a little too late, into his Majesty's Protection. The King now resolved to pass the Desna, and advance into the Ukrain. I will not enter here into a particular Account of that Passage, or the Deseat of the Russians, who endeavoured to oppose it; I will only say it was an Action worthy of great Admiration, as may be seen in the Memoirs of Gustavus Adlersels.

When the King had entered the Ukrain with his Army, he presently put them into Winter-quarters, and took up his own at Ronne, a little Town. We were scarce distributed amongst the Cities and Towns of this delicious Country, but the Army forgot all they had suffered by Hunger, Thirst, and all kind of Misery, in a March of six Months, or thereabouts. We found in Abundance all Sorts of Provisions. as Bread, Beer, Strong-waters, Wings of Crimea and Wallachia, Mead, Honey in great Quantities, Cattle, with Forage, both Hay and Corn for Horses' and Beasts of Burthen.

Our Troops refreshed themselves considerably in the short Interval of their Winter-quarters; so that the sick, the wounded, and those who were half starved and worn out with Fatigue, became visibly restored, and the Horses regained their Strength and Vigour.

We did not long enjoy these Advantages. Some Days before Christmas 1708, so rigorous and hard a Frost began, that the Memory of Man could produce nothing equal to it; and this was the more insupportable, as in the Ukrain the Country is all slat, and the Plains so very even, that the whole resembles a vast Sea.

The Czar, who always waited on us, took the Opportunity of this dreadful Winter to harrass and disquiet us without ceasing. He often said, he would venture ten Russians for one Swede, as the War was in his own Country, where he could always find what Recruits he wanted, an Advantage which the King of Sweden had not. He put himself therefore in Motion in the very severest Part of the Winter, making a Shew of attacking those Regiments which were the farthest posted from the Head-quarters. This engaged the King to give Orders to the whole Army to hold themselves in Readiness to march to their Assistance.

This terrible March, which cannot be equalled in History, was undertaken in Christmas Holidays, when the Winter raged with the greatest Rigour and Severity. The Swedes Loss was very considerable, but the Russians by their own Consession lost three Times as many. Many died of Cold, but a great Number lost the use of their Limbs, as Feet, Hands, Arms, &c. several of which were obliged to be cut off.

The King however did not content himself with having repulsed the Russians, but pushed and attacked them in their own Quarters, and had, amongst others, a very sharp Engagement with them at a Place called Krasnakut, where the Russians were beaten and pursued close at their Heels for some Leagues together. His Majesty afterwards made himself Master of a little Town called Wieprick, where the Garrison after three Assaults surrendered at Discretion. All these Assions being known, I shall not stop to give a particular Account of them, nor of the small Fights, Rencounters and Skirmishes which we had almost every Day with the Enemy, with whom we were continually engaged, notwithstanding the excessive Rigour of the Winter: so that doubtless there never was a more severe and dreadful Campaign than this. I shall only observe. that in all these Fights, notwithstanding the ordinary Superiority of the Enemy, we had almost continually the Advantage, and put them to Flight; the King being always present in Person, or hastening immediately to the Place of Action, unless it happened in a Quarter too distant from his Majesty.

At the Approach of the Spring the King affembled his Army between the Rivers of Pfoll and Worskla, both which empty themselves into the Dnieper or Boristbenes. At the same Time he invested Pultowa with a Party of his Foot, whilft the Horse were ordered to encamp several Regiments together for the Conveniency of Forage at fome Leagues Distance from Pultowa. It was the King's Maxim rarely to encamp his Army together. The Russia ans on the contrary, tho' five Times stronger than we were, had never the Courage to divide their Camps; but held themselves always together, forming but one Body of an Army, and taking Care to be well entrenched.

The Reason which induced his Majesty to encamp his Troops commonly in several small Bodies, at a little Distance from each other, was to keep his Camps clean and free from contagious Distempers, which generally attend Armies that are long shut up in one Camp. And to preferve all these different Bodies, who were defended by no Entrenchment from the Infults of the Enemy, he held them always in Play, by fometimes greater, fometimes less violent Attacks, never giving them Time to recollect themselves, but keeping them in continual Apprehension of new Efforts on our Part. This Maxim was of fuch admirable Use in this War, that though we often fuffered some Losses in the frequent Battles which were fought, the Amount came not near to those of the Enemy, who were obliged to keep themselves continually on their Guard, and being shut up as hath been said in the same Camp, suffered extremely by Distempers and Stenches, by which they actually lost great Numbers.

When the King invested Pultowa, he might have instantly made himself Master of this ill-fortified Place, but this was not his Majesty's Intention: for he could have drawn very little Advantage from the Possession of it. if it had been delivered up to him. His true Design in besteging this Town, was only to amuse the Enemy, and to conceal from them the Weakness of his own Army: for as it was impossible for him to penetrate further into Rullia with so small a Force, so neither would he return back. He waited therefore before this Place for the Succours which King Stanislaus was to bring him at the Head of the Crown Army, and for Major-General Crassau, with the Body of the Army under his Command; he flattered himself so much the more with the speedy Arrival of these Reinforcements, because he had heard no News of them for some Months, and therefore believed them on their March; but he afterwards found himself very much deceived in his Guess. Those however who have any Knowledge of the Affairs of Poland, will not condemn the King for having some Reliance on those Succours: for as Poland from the Time he quitted it was delivered from the Russians, he imagined King Stanislaus had had sufficient Leisure to reduce the Confederates, and re-unite-them to his Party. They are not, perhaps, absolutely in the wrong, who throw all the Blame on General Crassau, who by his stubborn Conduct continually opposed King Stanislaus, the Palatine of Kiovia, and all the Polish Nation, and who by that Means rendered all the good Instructions of Stanislaus useless: for my Part, I submit the Decifion of these Matters to the Judgment of every impartial Man, who knows but ever so little of the Affairs of those Times.

Instead of an Army which we expected would come to our Affiftance. Secretary Klinkostrom arrived with Colonel Sandul, some Weeks before the fatal Battle. The former brought Dispatches to the King on the Part of Crassau, with an Account that King Stanistaus, and that General were both in the higher Poland, with a mutual Missinderstanding between Sandul, whom the King had fent into Walachia, returned with an Affurance of the little Hopes which we had to expect any Thing from the Turks, who expressed no Inclination to break with the Czar in our Favour. In this Extremity, his Majesty had no other Resource than to give Battle to the Russians: for if he had the Happiness L 1 1 2 to succeed, he might then with Glory and Safety take the Rout to Kiovia, pass the Boristbenes in the Neighbourhood, and cross a fruitful Country, proper for the Refreshment of his Troops, and thence might pass towards Volbinia into the Heart of Poland; on the other Hand, if he should be so unfortunate to fail, he should however lose no more than he certainly must in his Retreat from the Ukrain, without fighting with the Enemy, who would then with Forces fo superiour to ours, fall continually upon us, harrass us, and oblige us to make a retreating Fight with Disadvantage. Moreover, if the King would have retreated without giving the Enemy Battle, he could not have taken his Rout through Kiovia; but he would have been forced to have past the shortest Way over the Boristbenes at Perevoloczno, at the fame Place where his Majesty passed after the Defeat at Pultowa. This would have had all the Air of a shameful Flight, and have entirely discouraged his Army, which would have been then obliged to throw themselves into the Defart, and make their Retreat by the same Rout, thro' which his Majesty afterwards saved himself on the Side of Walachia. Add to all these Inconveniencies, those which the Army must have suffered in that dreadful Defart, where for Want of Sublistence, they would likely have difbanded themselves, especially when they had an Enemy at their Heels, whose Courage would be considerably elevated by a Retreat so nearly resembling a general Rout. The fafest Way therefore was to prepare for the Battle, and to draw the Enemy to it, whatever Price it cost.

His Majesty carried the Siege on. flowly, the better to husband his Troops, and continued his Approaches on the Side of the River Workla. have above remarked, that if his Majesty had been desirous of being presently Master of the Place, he might easily have accomplished it, and he would then have opened his Trenches on the other Side. As to the Enemy. they were posted with all their Army opposite to the River, and continually endeavoured to pass over Troops, and throw them into Pultowa, but were always beaten and repulsed, unless when Brigadier Gallowin, the Brotherin-law to Menzikof, had the Happiness to enter there by a Stratagem; but he was made Prisoner some Days. afterwards in a Sally which he commanded.

The Czar now sent Renn with seven thousand Dragoons, to encamp at a little Distance from the main Body of the Army; to surprize whom, the King detached Major-General Cruus with his Regiment of Horse, that of South-Scania, Part of the Offrogoshiand Gyllenstierna's Dragoons, to which some thousands of Cosack Foot called Zaporovians were joined, commanded by their General, Kossoby.

This Expedition might have succeeded very happily, had it not failed through the Fault of General Cruus himself, who marched too flowly in the Night, that he might not separate himself from the Cossack Foot; nay, he might have retrieved this, for he came up with Renn's Camp by Break of Day, when there was at the same Time so thick a Mist, that one could not see at twenty Paces distance, without mentioning that Renn had sent away a great many of his Dragoons for Forage: but instead of attacking them, and pushing the Foragers home to their Camp, when he might have entered with them, and have defeated this whole Body of seven thousand Dragoons, who expected no Attack, and were all funk in Sleep, he threw away his Time in drawing up his Horse in a Line, by which Means, he gave Time to the Russians to mount their Horses, and come out of their Camp, marching in different Columns, who falling with Fury on this single Line of Swedes. eafily broke through and rode away, without our being able to follow them. Those Swedish Squadrons, who were feparately engaged with an entire Column, were absolutely broke to Pieces.

Renn had the good Fortune by these Means, and by the Fault of Cruus, to escape a great Danger; and if he had had Courage enough, when he saw his Enemy disconcerted, to pursue his Point, he must have entirely deseated this Detachment, being double their Number; but he attempted nothing of this kind. The ill Success of this Expedition was a Misfortune which we ever afterwards very severely selt, and we were soon sensible of our Mistake.

When the Rusians saw they were in no Condition to pass the Workla opposite to Pultowa, and to throw in a Reinforcement on that side, they decamped in the Night, and after making a great many salse Attacks in the Morning at different Places, they made a Feint of attempting to pass their whole Army over the Workla, to the Side where our Troops were. But before I mention the Passage of their Army, I shall speak of the Detachments which the King had dispersed on the Worskla, from Pultowa to Perevoloczno, a little Place where this River empties itself into the Borist-benes.

The first was posted a little below Pultowa; the second at Starazanscara, where Major-General Meyerfeld lay encamped with his Regiment; the third at a Place called Belitz, where Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Funck commanded a Body of Dragoons; and on the Boristenes, at the Mouth of the Worskla, Lieutenant-Colonel Silwerbielm was stationed with five hundred Horse.

The same Day that the Russians passed the Worskla, they made, as E have said, several sham Attacks, but especially at two Places; the one above the Town where they passed, and the other below it. The King then divided his Army into two Bodies, and gave the Command of the greater to Velt-Marshal Rheinschild, who was to oppose the Ruffians in their Attempt to pass above the Town; and his Mal jesty putting himself at the Head of the other Body, marched directly upto those that made a Shew of intending to pass below Pultowa. Whilst his Majesty, who was always indefatigable, was reconnoitring them on Horse back, a miserable Cossack posted on the other Side of the River, which at that Part is not very large, fired his Fusee at him; the Bullet penetrated through his Boot, and broke the Bone of his Foot. These poor Wretches have long. Count Rheinschild, finding the Enemy had already passed the River, and began to entrench themselves. resolved to attack them instantly, before they had Time to fortify themfelves better; but having few Foot with him, he difmounted his Dragoons, and fo marched to the Enemy, his Foot and difmounted Dragoons being interlined with the Horse. Just as he was on the point of beginning the Action, he received the fatal News of the King's Wound, which immediately fuspended his Measures, and obliged him to rejoin the King with all his Troops, not knowing what was the true State of his Condition. This Retreat of the Count's, gave the Russians an Opportunity to perfect their Works, and aggravated the ill Situation of our Affairs; for it was this very Entrenchment which the King caused to be attack'd on the Day of that bloody Battle which enfued.

The Enemy's Army confisted of eighty thousand regular Troops, twenty thousand Cossacks, and as many Calmucks. Ours amounted to no more than twenty thousand Men, including the wounded and the sick, of which latter we had a great Number who had lost their Limbs with the Extremity of the Cold, and were by that Means incapacitated for Service.

I have above observed, that when his Majesty left Saxony, his Army was composed of twenty eight Regiments, none of which had been recruited during two subsequent Campaigns, in which they had maintained the sharpest and most terrible War which is perhaps to be read of in History. When Count Lowenbaupt joined us, all his Foot were distributed amongst our Regiments, and as to the three Regiments of Horse of Abolebn, Carelia, and of the Nobility of Riga, with the three Regiments of Dragoons of Wennerstedt, Schlippenbach, and Schreiterfeld, they remained on their own Establishment: so that those six Regiments joined to the twenty-eight which came from Saxony, brought his Majesty's Army in the Ukrain to thirty-four Regiments.

It may not be amis here, to enter into a short Discussion on this Head. in order to confound the malicious Relations of our Enemies. If we reckon every Regiment in general to have been from five hundred to fix hundred strong, which is the utmost, it will reduce the whole Number to about twenty thousand Men. It is indeed true that some Regiments of Foot, and particularly the Guards, were rendered perfectly complete by Lowenbaupt's Foot; but on the other Hand several Regiments, of both Horse and Foot, did not confift of more than two hundred Men, which is very easy to believe, and indeed to prove, when we consider the great Numbers of Engagements we had had with the Enemy. in which, though we were for the most part successful, we must nevertheless have lost a great many Men. The Distempers caused by Fatigues and want of Provisions in those terrible Marches which we were obliged to make, caused likewise a dreadful Havock among our Troops, without faying any Thing of the Winter. which of itself destroyed great Num-

We may then conclude, according to this Calculation, that the whole Army could not amount to more than.

King of SWEDEN.

I have said, including the Sick, &c. I could, if it was necessary, and if I was not unwilling to dwell on fo forrowful a Narrative, compute the Strength of each Regiment in particular, as they stood a few Days before the Battle, and that without any Fear of Miliake, as I was then a Major, and faw every Day the Lists of the whole Army; but I will dismiss this Article, with remarking what little Truth there is to be given to the Reports which our Enemies then spread: for if we give ourselves the Trouble to look into the Gazettes and Mercuries of those Times, and above all the Accounts set forth by the Russians, which were all full of Rodomontadoes, it would be impossible that a single Swede could have remained even before the Battle of Pultowa, though our Army had confifted of a hundred thoufand Men. Whence we must conclude, that we ought absolutely to reiect all the Stories which the Muscovites spead abroad to our Disadvantage, during the whole War, especially with regard to the Circumstances of the Battle of Pultowa.

This Battle was fought on the twenty eighth of June, O.S. and which is fomething remarkable, on the same Spot where formerly Ediga, one of Tamerlane's Generals, had totally routed the Army of Withfold, Great Duke of Lithuania, Anno 1399.

When this Battle begun, the Russians had not only perfected their grand Entrenchment, but had raised a great Number of Redoubts, at the Head thereof; under Cover of which, they intended to carry on their Approaches to the besieged Town. Between these Redoubts, which were well surnished with Men, and the Entrenchment, the Czar had encamped all his Horse, while his Foot lay covered behind the Lines, which were guarded by a numerous Artillery.

As foon as the King saw their Defign, he drew all his Army into one Camp near Pultowa, having the Town on one Side, and the Russian Entrenchment on the other, and a little Village called Sakie, which hath a better Title to give Name to this samous Battle than Pultowa, by which it is commonly called. His Majesty left the Detachments which were posted along the Worskla, to the Boristbenes, in the Situation wherein I have above described them.

During the little Time that the whole Army kept together, the Enemy made two Attempts with their Horse to fall on our Camp; but retreated hastily each Time behind their Redoubts, as foon as they faw our Picket mounted to attack them. Our Troops always suffered much in their foraging, by the Ruffians, who never failed to harrass them on those Occafions, tho' they always drove them back with great Vigour behind their Redoubts. Eight Days before the Action, the King being impatient to put an End to these Skirmishes by a general and decifive Battle, brought all the Army out of their Camp, and ranged them in a Line of Battle, making a Feint of attacking the Enemy; but it was postponed that Day, for I know not what Reason.

Some have faid, that the Enemy intended to attack us that Day; but finding our Army drawn up in such fine Order to receive them, they withdrew behind their Entrenchments. At last, on the twenty-eighth of June O. S. this great Battle was fought, which will be always memorable, by the extraordinary Inequality between the Armies, and which notwithstanding all possible Disadvantage on our side, would nevertheless have succeeded happily, if the King had not been wounded, and if some of our Generals had better performed their Duty.

His Majesty drew up the Army early in Battalia, amounting at the utmost to no more than ten or twelve thousand Men. We lest some of our Regiments behind to block up Pultowa, several others were placed for a Guard over the Baggage, and some were ordered to remain with Mazeppa and the Artillery, to preserve them from the Insults of the Cossacks, Rushans, and Calmucks, who during the Action, made two Attacks on the Baggage and on the Cannon, but were repulsed each Time with little Difficulty or Loss on our Side.

The Battle was now begun, and that with confiderable Success. We drove the Enemy without any great Efforts or Loss behind their Redoubts, which we past in the midst of a violent Discharge, both from their small Arms and Cannon, which latter played incessantly on the Spaces between the Redoubts. All the Muscovite Foot which were found there were put to the Sword, and their Horse were driven in such a Manner, and so near absolutely routed, that instead of making a Stand near their grand Entrenchment, they rode full speed beyond it, and made Use of all their endeavours to repais the Worskla.

What a Misfortune was it for us, that the King was not now able in Perfon to command on Horse-back, and to be present every where according to his Custom? This Battle, which he would infallibly have won, would have been infinitely more glorious for him, than the Battle of Narva, and all that he had done before; and we should have avoided all the Missortunes, which we have been exposed to since that Day.

Our Miscarriage was partly owing to General Roos, who, through I know not what Infatuation, committed one of the groffest Errors, by engaging unadvisedly among the Redoubts, and then with most unwarrantable Obstincy attempting to carry them Sword-inhand one after another, instead of passing through the intermediate Spaces, as the King had done with his Column. Ross affaulted these Redoubts with great Fury, and carried feveral of them, his Foot in Reality working Miracles; but he effected this with fo great a Loss, that the Ground was all covered with dead Bodies; and what finished our Ruin was, that Roos by this Blunder was cut off from the rest of the Army without any Possibility of rejoining it.

In the mean Time Major-General Schlippenbach, who was with Roes, feeing the diffressed Condition of this Column, quitted it in the Company of Captain Palmfeld, and went to find out the King to acquaint him immediately with what had happened. Palmfeld had the Happiness to join his Majesty, but Schlippenbach fell into the Hands of the Russians, who having recovered their Courage, and seeing the Plunder which Roos had committed, presently sent a large Detachment under the Command of Lieutenant-General Rensel, which entirely cut off that unfortunate Party from the rest of our Foot in the following Manner.

Roas, who was now too sensible of the enormous Error he had and not knowing how he might rejoin his Majesty, had detached Captain Funck to discover whether those were not the King's Troops, which were advancing at a Distance, and which were indeed those under Rensel, in full March to inclose him. Funck, who mistook them for Swedes by seeing Mr. Schlippenbach amongst them, on which Account he drew too near; was taken Prisoner by the Enemy; fo that Roos had no Answer till Rensel fell upon him and furrounded him on all Sides.

Whilst this was doing, the King having passed the Redoubts, put all the Enemy's Horse to Flight, as we have faid, and cut a large Body of Muscovite Foot to Pieces. His Majefly then made all his Army halt on the Plain which was between the Enemy's grand Entrenchment and the Redoubts, and drew up again'in Order of Battle. At the same Time to compleat the Affair, the King thinking Roos was ready to join him, made a Party of his Horse and Dragoons dismount to attack the Entrenchment. till Roos's Column, which he impatiently expected, was come up. Whilst his Majesty was making the Disposition for this Attack, he perceived Rensel's Body of Foot at a Distance, and not doubting but that it was Roos's Party, he detached Adjutant General Gyllenklo to Mazeppa, to press him to bring up the Troops which he had with him, together with the Artillery, to affift in and support the Attack of the Entrenchment.

This had been the King's Refolution on the Morning before the Battle began, for he feared that, if he had then stayed to bring up the Ordnance he should have lost too much Time, and delayed the Execution of his Defign of passing hastily through the Redoubts. But when Gyllenklo, as he drew nearer to Rensel's Body, perceived they were not Swedes, he returned hastily to inform his Majesty, who was much aftonished, and more shocked soon after at hearing that Roos was taken Prisoner, most of his Men dispersed, and all the Prisoners killed with horrible Inhumanity.

It was now that this great Prince, who was always intrepid, without discovering the least Emotion, in spite of his Wound, and the Situation to which he saw his Affairs reduced, gave immediate Orders to begin the Attack of the Entrenchment with those sew Foot which remained with him, whilst the Horse and Dragoons remounted to support this Handful of Men.

Before we continue the almost incredible Account of this famous Battle, it will not be improper to make a few Remarks.

Count Rheinschild, who, notwithftanding the Censures of his Enemies, was certainly a great General, had proposed to the King as soon as he had passed the Redoubts, to wait in and so much the more formidable as with Design of putting them into he yet retained several Advantages Consussion. Our Foot were so few, over us.

The Opinion of Count Piper was unfortunately preferred at this Season to the fage Advice of so experienced a General. He told the King, That be must strike the Iron whilst it was bot, and not give the Enemy Time for Con-The Misonderstanding fideration. between this first Minister and Count Rheinschild, which had subsisted ever fince the Battle of Fraustadt, which the latter had gained in 1706, was a great Misfortune to Sweden, for it was the Occasion of rejecting all the wife Advice which he had given. But let us draw the Curtain over such disagreeable Scenes, and return to the Rehearfal of this unhappy Battle, which hath cost Sweden so many Tears, and for which almost every Pamily there wore Mourning.

During the whole Time that the Horfe and Dragoons were employed in dismounting by the King's Command, in Expectation of being joined by Roos, the Ruffians made a dreadful Discharge from 120 Pieces of Ordnance, most of them of the largest Size, with which their Entrenchments were guarded, but without doing us much Mischief. As soon as his Majesty had given Orders for the Attack of their Entrenchment, we saw all their Foot advance out of their Lines to oppose our Design. Our Foot being then put in Motion, marched bravely up to the Enemy, under the Command of Count Lowenbaupt, with Orders to begin the Attack, and to penetrate into the Entrenchment, whilst the Horse, which marched in the Wing, fell on the Enemy's Foot Confusion. Our Foot were so few. that the Line which they formed made no Appearance when compared to the Enemy's. They nevertheless attacked with such Fierceness, Vigour and Resolution, that at the first Shock they staggered the Enemy's Line, and the Regiment of Guards possessed themselves of the Cannon which was planted against them. But most of the other Regiments were less successful, some of them especially suffered greatly by the Enemy's Artillery, particularly the Regiment of Calmar. which was almost half destroyed by a 'single Discharge; and at the same Time lost their Colonel Ranck, who was killed on the Spot. The fame happened to that of Upland, which at the first Shock lost their Colonel Stierbok, their Lieutenant-Colonel Post, and their Major Anrep.

All this might have been yet remedied, if the King had not been wounded; but as he lay on his Litter, with his Sword in his Hand, and it being impossible to convey him quick enough from one Place to another to distribute his Orders, there was in Reality no true Command on that Day in the Army, and Confusion at last beginning to arise, every one would

If all our Squadrons had done their Duty as well as the gallant Count Torflenson did at the Head of his, I make no doubt but we had yet gained the Battle. He attacked the Russan Foot with such Fury at the Head of his own Company of Nyland, that he was on the Point of penetrating into the Enemy's Entrenchment; but not being seconded, as he ought to have been,

he was killed with his whole Party, after they had performed Miracles of Bravery.

'the Enemy's Foot; but the rest did not follow so sine an Example. In short, that wonderful Activity which had appeared in our Troops when the King himself led them before he was wounded, and when he used to sly to all Quarters to animate them, was not observable on this Day. In a Word, his Wound was the Source of all our Missortunes, and the real Cause of the Loss of this bloody Battle.

The Enemy continued, during the whole Action, to make a dreadful Fire from their Cannon. One of which having broken and overturned the King's Litter, his Majesty wounded as he was, was forced to mount his Horse, with his Leg swathed in Bandage, and without his Boots. His Majesty now seeing the Impossibility of gaining the Entrenchment, gave Orders to the Troops to retreat, and march towards the Place where the Baggage was. Some fay, that the King's Horse was at this Time killed under him, and he was obliged to mount another.

Velt Marshal Rheinschild and the Prince of Wurtenberg, were now taken Prisoners. Count Piper endeavoured to reach the Regiments which had been lest before Pultowa, but he was made Prisoner before he came to them; those Regiments having retreated towards the Baggage, after an Attack from General Rensel.

As foon as the King came up to his Baggage, he waited not only for the Arrival of the Troops who returned by little and little from the Action, but he stayed yet some Hours longer, to see if the Enemy had any Mind to pursue him, and attack him in the open Field: but the Russians had not the Courage to give him this Satisfaction; and contented themselves with what they had gained by the Assistance of their Cannon and Entrenchments.

The King was not inclined to quit his present Encampment, hoping to have a fecond Trial with the Enemy; but on the strong Instances of Mazeppa, who was afraid for his own Person, and on the repeated Entreaties of his faithful Generals and Officers, he at last suffered himself to be prevailed on, and after having had his Foot new dressed, he entered calmly, without shewing the least Emotion, Post-chaire with Mazeppa, and marched with the Remains of the Army, Artillery and Baggage, with the Sound of Trumpets and Kettle drums along the Worskla, directly towards the Boristbenes: this March was performed in excellent Order, without the least Loss of any Kind, and so gallantly, that it bore no Resemblance to a Defeat. The Enemy's Troops made several Shows of attacking us, but on the Rear-Guard's facing about to receive them, they had never the Courage to execute their Intentions. The next Day the Army arrived at the Boristbenes, twelve Leagues from Pultowa.

Such was the Success of the famous Battle of Pulsowa, of which so much has been spoken and written in the World, always to the Advantage of the Russians and the Disadvantage of Charles XII. If we reflect on the unhappy Consequences of that bloody M m m 2

Day, we must confess that they have been very fatal to us, in the Loss which Sweden has since suffered; but if abstracted from all the Consequences of that Battle, we consider only the Circumstances of the Action itself, and have Regard only to Bravery and true Glory, the Honour must be always placed on the Side of the Swedes, who with a Body of between ten and eleven thousand Men almost starved and destitute of every Thing, with an Intrepidity and Courage which have been scarce ever equal'd, attack'd an intrenched Army of upwards of an hundred thousand Men provided with every Thing both for their Sublistence and Defence; whom our Troops not only forced to give Ground, would have absolutely overthrown and conquered, even by the Confession of the Rushans, if the King's Wound had not prevented him from giving Orders Moreover, the Enemy's himfelf. Lois was as great in the Morning when the Battle began as ours was at the End. I do not find in the Swedish History a Battle nearer resembling this, than that where Gustavus the Great attacked the Intrenchment of Wallenstein, near Nurenbourg, where the Loss of the Swedes and Imperialifts was always equal; but when Guffavus Adolphus retreated with his Army after the Battle, it was yet fixty thousand strong, and he had his Way open to him on all Sides; but when Charles XII. retreated from before Pultowa. he had in all, including the fick and all his Detachments, no more than about fourteen or fifteen thousand Men, without any Place of Retreat where he could place this handful of Men in Safety, and he was near three hundred Leagues distant from his Kingdom; notwithstanding which, this brave Prince was so far from losing Courage, that he yet breathed nothing but the Spirit of Battle, and if he could have mounted his Horse, tho' never so little, we should perhaps have had our Revenge near the Boristbenes, when the Enemy sollowed us thither.

If the Muscovites had gained so compleat a Victory, as they pretended, why did they not immediately follow the Remains of the Army which attended the Baggage, and why did they not possess themselves of our Cannon and Baggage, if we had been so absolutely beaten as they had reported? For this must have been very easy for them to do, if they had gained a compleat Victory. But as they knew us too well to attack us in the open Field, so it is certain they never marched but in great Bodies, and suffered us very quietly to pursue our Rout to the Boristbenes.

To confess the Truth however, we fuffered sufficiently by the Consequences of this Battle; for it occasioned the Loss of Revel, of Riga, and the rest of Livonia, which the Enemy conquered with great Ease, by reason of the Plague which caused a general Desolation and we may truly say that Fortune hath miraculously seconded the Czar in all his Enterprizes; but no one can agree, without blinding himself, to all those Disadvantages which have been placed to our Account, by reason of the Battle of Pul-The Swedish Nation hath certainly not lost her ancient Valour, nor the Reputation of her Arms; the JudgJudgment of which we leave to Posterity.

The Muscovites were not better Soldiers at the Battle of Pulsows, than they had been the preceding Year at that of Holofzin; nor can any one fay, that they have become braver fince that Time. This last Action was not less wonderful in its kind, than the Battle of Narva; and the King gave here very sensible Tokens of his powerful Genius for War.

On the twenty-ninth of June, Old Style, Charles XII. arrived with his Army on the Banks of the Borishbenes; the whole amounted, including the sick, maimed and wounded, to about sixteen thousand Men; the rest having been killed or taken Prisoners in the Battle.

We had not one General killed, but fix Colonels met with that Fate; the first was Count Torstenson, Colonel of the Regiment of Horse of Nyland; he was a young Nobleman of about thirty three Years of Age, but already confummate in the Art of War, and had besides a very cultivated Genius: if he had lived longer, he would have equalled if not surpassed his Grandfather the Great Leonard Torstenson, who was a Felt-Marshal of the Swedilb Armies in our Wars with Germany. The young Count had served ever fince he was fifteen Years of Age in the Saxon Troops in Hungary. The King knowing his Merit, had trusted him with a separate Body of several Regiments from the Time we had entered the Ukrain; and he gave Proofs on all Occasions of a Conduct worthy a great General, till he gloriously lost his Life at this Battle.

The other Colonels killed in the Field, were Stiernbok, who commanded the Regiment of Upland; Siegroth, who had the Dabl-Carlers; Ulffparre, of the Westrogoths; Weydenbiem, of that of Sudermand; Rank, of the Regiment of Calmar; and, Buchwald, of that of Jonkioping; all Foot.

Amongst those of the Court and Chancery Mr. Olof Hermelin, Counfellor of the Chancery, a Man of great Abilities; Gustavus Adlerfelt, and Hirschensierna, Secretary to the King, were all killed on the Spot.

We long hoped that Hermelin was not dead, but that he had been taken Prifoner. It is certain that his Name was in the first List of Prisoners which the Czar fent to King Augustus, with his Relation of this Battle; but in all the others he is reckon'd amongst the dead. It is however pretty extraordinary, that three Priests pretended to have buried him, and each of them in a different Place; it is probable, that they were all decrived, the great Heat having caused the Bodies of all those who were killed to fwell fo violently, that their Faces could not be known. Whilst I was a Prisoner in Muscowy in the Year 1713, a Cossack Colonel affured me, that he had spoke to Hermelin in 1712, through a Hole of a deep Dungeon, in a little Town situated between the Ukrain and the City of Moscow, the Name of which I have forgotten.

Amongst the Prisoners of Distinction, were Count Piper, Count Rheinschild, the Prince of Wurtenberg, the Major General's Schlippenhach, Roos, Stachelberg and Hamilton.

Major-General Meyerfeld, who is actually now Velt-Marshal, Senator and Governor of Pomerania, had the

Mis-

Misfortune some Months before the Siege of Pultowa to break his Leg: he obtained a Paffport of the Czar to país fafely through Poland, in case he should, fall into the Hands of some Party of Russians or confederated Poles, and he designed to go into Germany in order to get himself cured. Upon the Strength of this Paffport his Majesty ient him from Stara-Zianscara, which is situated between Paltowa and the Boristbenes, where he had been posted to demand of the Czar some Particulars which I do not now call to Mind: all this did not prevent Meyerfeld from being put under Arrest: The Ozar pretending, that as the Passport had been given some time before the Battle, it could not be of any Validity; however, he was presently released on his Parole, but on Condition he would fend back in his Place some Rusfian General made Prisoner by our Troops.

On the Boriftbenes Charles XII. halted, with the Remains of his Army, near a Town called Perevolocina, where the Workla empties itself into the Boristbenes: His Majesty's Intention being immediately to pass the Workla, which is not very wide in this Place. and to attend on the other Side the Motions of the Ruffians, if they had any Inclination to attack us, and afterwards to take the Road of Crim. This Project was the more easy to be executed, as we had with the Baggage not only sufficient Horses for all the Foot, but likewife for all the Servants. Boys and Sutlers.

The King having taken this Refolution, ordered all the Baggage to be burnt, and all the Ammunition bread, confifting of large Biskets, to be difiributed amongst the Soldiers, with which every Regiment was provided for six Weeks. The Military Chests, which were guarded by several Regiments, were to be conducted into two Places, and the Money distributed among the Officers to serve them in Case of Need, and which were to be placed to the Account of the Wages which were due to them.

After his Majesty had given out these Orders, the Generals of the Army came to him, and defired him with the most earnest Entreaty, to convey his facred Person to a Place of Safety, representing to him the Danger of his Wound, which would not permit him to follow the Army and support Fatigue. They promised him on their Side punctually to execute all his Orders, provided he would fecure himself from those Dangers to which the Army must be exposed. These Intreaties prevailed on the King. who at last determined to pass the Borifthenes; but before his Departure, he expressly enjoined Lowenbaupt to :follow in every Circumstance those Orders which he had given for a Retreat towards the Crim.

After the King had made all these Dispositions, he passed the Boristbenes about Midnight, having with him the Regiment of Foot of Sudermanland, which had been in the Trenches before Pulsowa, during the Battle. The Detachment of Lieutenant-Colonel Funk, which had been posted at Beliz; and that of Lieutenant-Colonel Silfwerbielm, which had been posted as we have said before near Perevolocina, likewise attended his Majesty. The Regiment of Sudermanland amounted to two hundred Men, Funk's

Detachment to eight Hundred, and that under Silswerbielm to five hundred; besides these, the Drabans, with the Einspanners commanded by Anrep, also followed his Majesty. Several Generals and Officers, amongst whom some were wounded; were named by the King to follow him, together with the Court, Chancery, Ec. The General or Hetiman Mazeppa had already passed the River with a good Number of Cossacks.

Count Lowenburgt, who had received his Orders with full Power to act as he found it most convenient for the Service of his King and Country, had with him no more than two Major Generals, Creatz and Cruus, when the King quitted the Army, his Majesty having taken the rest with him.

The King had no fooner passed the Baristhenes, than his Orders for immediately burning the Baggage and distributing the Money, were no more thought of. As the Troops were extremely latigued, they went quietly to repose themselves, as soon as the Guards and Pickets were placed for the Security of the Army.

The next Morning they were awaken'd by the Kness Menzikef, who had followed us at the Head of all the Muscouite Horle, and driven our Pickets and advanced Guards from the Hill where they were posted; I say Has, because the Army was encamped in a Valley near the Boristones. Menzikof, after this first Expedition, sent to Lowenbaups to offer him a Capitulation.

I have faid above, that the Army, including the fick and wounded, might have amounted before the King's Departure to fixteen thousand Men, amongst which near five thoufand were in no Condition of fighting, by reason of their Wounds, Distempers, &c. and about fifteen hundred followed his Majesty; so the Remainder of the Army which were able to act might make in all between nine and ten thousand, which was near the Number of Troops the King had withhim on the Day of the Battle of Pultowa, when he attacked the Muscovile Entrenchment.

This Army, small as it was, shewed all imaginable Eagerness to come to an Engagement; it did not appear to them impossible to beat the Russian Horse, before they were joined by the Foot which followed them in full March, and then after they had overthrown the Enemy they would have been in a Condition to follow the Plan and the Orders of his Majesty; but ill Fortune, which had refolved our Ruin, prevented our burning the Baggage and distributing the Money in the Evening as the King had ordered, by Means of which every Thing was thrown into Diforder and Confuviion. Several were defirous to preferve the valuable Baggage and Money, which they had gotten in Poland and other Places, and Regard was had to their Representations, especially to those of Cruss and Creusz, who were chiefly interested. Indeed we may fay, that God had abandoned us, and that Ditorder and Giddiness had conspired to deliver us up to our Enemies.

To compleat our Misfortune, Lowenbaupt was obliged to pay great Deference to the Advice of Creutz and Cruns, because he was yet little known amongst our Troops; it is true

he had commanded a Party of the Army before the Battle of Liesna, but he had fince received no other Command fave what he had a few Days only before the Battle of Pultowa. However this be, he might have exerted more Vigour on this Occasion, where he should have put all to the Risque; and all the Officers of the Army, who had ever to little Penetration, could not help attributing the Blame to him. Both Officers and Soldiers were in the utmost Indignation at his Proceedings, to which they could not be accus'd of having given their Consent, since they were not informed of the Articles of Capitulation, till after they had been fettled.

Count Lowenbaupt, after having intirely agreed with Creuz and Cruus to furrender to the Enemy, called together, for Form only, all the Colonels and Commanders of the Regiments, as well as the oldest Officers, to declare to them their Intentions; and tho' most of them were of Opinion to give Battle and follow the King's Plan, no Regard was had for their Representations, but they followed the Opinions of those who had already concluded and settled the whole Affair.

In Consequence of this Resolution, Creuiz and Cruus were sent to the Enemy, to capitulate as well as they could with the Knes Menzikof. The Articles of Capitulation are so well known, that it is needless to insert them here.

A JOURNAL of the King of Sweden's Retreat to Bender after the Battle of Pultowa.

FTER we had been repulsed at the Attack of the Masscowite Entrenchments, on the twenty-eighthof July 1709, new Style, his Majesty halted with the Remains of the Army near the Baggage, to wait for the Return of his Troops from the Battle, , and to see if the Enemy would bring themselves to attack us in the open Field; but the Russans attempting nothing, the King, after having dined and stood several Hours together in this Place, which was but half a League from the Field of Battle, yielded to the repeated Intreaties of his Generals, and gave Orders to his Army to decamp and march towards the Borift-· benes.

5 The Army was put in Motion between two and three in the Afternoon with the Sound of Kettle-drums and Trumpets, and marched gallantly in Sight of the Enemy along the Workla, and between that River and that of Pfol, directly to the Borifibenes. The King advanced but a few Leagues this first Day, being seated with Mazeppa, in a Chaise which belonged to Baron Sittman, a Lieutenant-Colonel, and Aid-de Camp General of the King of Prussia, the Baron was charged with the Affairs of his Master, and had a considerable Time followed the Army as a Voluntier.

The Army having decamped the next Day at Nine in the Morning, continued their March both that and the following Day, without the Enemy's having had the Courage to pursue them; they indeed made feveral Shews of haraffing our Army, but retreated, as foon as we put ourselves in a Posture of Defence.

In this Manner we, arrived on the eleventh of July at the Borishbenes, near a little Town called Perevoloczna, which the Enemy had burnt; his Majesty was of Opinion instantly to pass the Workla, which was neither wide nor deep in this Place, and to march with the Army towards the Crim: but his Wound hindering him from supporting the Fatigue, and being besides absolutely incapable of bearing his Horse, he yielded to the Entreaties of his Generals, who begged him to fecure his facred Person, whilst they would punctually execute his Orders. with Regard to this March.

The King now took a Resolution to pass the Boristbenes, giving Orders, to about one thousand Horse and Foot, without reckoning the Drabans, the Einspanners, the Court, the Chancery and the Coffacks, to follow him thro' the Defarts into Turky; but as he hadneither sufficient Boats nor Wood to, build them, he found himself very much embarraffed on this Account. However, the Enemy not appearing, we had Time enough to fearch for them along the Boristbenes, and at length found a sufficient Number of Boats and Canoes to begin the Transportation, which we continued in Safety till the twelfth of July; by which Time about two thousand Men were passed over, tho' we proceeded but flowly, because the Boristhenes was, so wide in this Part, that we were an Hour at least in passing and repasfing.

The Horses which we wanted were carried over in great Numbers by the Current, and gawe pooks great Card to put those at their Head which were the best experienced Swimmers; the others followed them so well, that they all arrived at the other Side. The Tatlarian Horse did us good Service on this Occasion, as did the Cossacks; for at many of them were very good Swim. mers, they stripped themselves nakedy and throwing themselves without Saddles on their Galloways, they encouraged a great Number of the Horses tofollow them; and when those on which they were mounted were tired; they threw themselves into the Water and fwam by their Sides, holding them at the same Time by their Bridles. In this: Manner, these People passed over a great Number of Horses without much, Labour, which would have given us a: great deal of Trouble, if we had been, obliged to make them all (wim by the fides of the Boats or Canoes.

As to the Baggage, no one tookmore with him than was necessary; and they, only carried over a few Caleshes, which were, well tied together on the Canoes, to serve for his Majesty, old Mazeppa and some Costack Ladies.

Mazeppa went over about fix in the Evening, but his Majesty did not pass the River till the Middle of the Night between the eleventh and twelsth of July, in a Canoe, having some Servants with him, after giving Orders to Count Lowenbaupt to burn all the Baggage of the Army, and to march towards the Crim. As Mazeppa had lest behind him two small Casks sull of Ducats, his Majesty sent Mr. Neugebaver in the Night, to setch them; who soon returned with this Money, which was afterwards of great Affiltance to us.

In the mean while the Enemy having purfued our Army. Count Lowen-baups, instead of executing his Majesty's Commands, furrender'd himself by Capitulation, against the Representation of most of the Officers in the Army.

We had Notice ever fince the Morning of the Arrival of the Muscovites, by the Report of the Fire which we heard far off, and about Noon we were informed by the Return of our last Boats, that Menzikof was posted with all his Horse near our Camp, and that he expected to be foon joined by the Foot. We now thought the Battle inevitable, not knowing any Thing of the Measures which Lowenbaupt was taking towards a Capitulation, nor of: his Resolution to furrender. That the Enemy might be prevented from immediately pursuing us, his Majesty ordered all the Boats to be destroyed. to prevent the Enemy from making Use of them.

By these Measures we secured our selves for some Days from the Pursuit of the Russians; but we had other Enemies to combat with, which were the Desart, Hunger, Thirst, the Heat of the Days and the Cold of the Nights, which equally threatned us with Desart the Desart which we were to pass was of a vast Extent, and almost every where without Water; we surveyed our Situation with Horror in so hot a Season, and where we were in Want of every Thing.

In this fad Condition we begun our March the twelfth of July, new Style. All the Army was on Horseback except the King, who was in a little Tar-

For Chaife, refembling our Caleffes. This Prince had on his Side Major. General Hard, who had been wounded at the Bittle of Pultowa. Mazeppa was in a Coach with some Cossack Ladies. A profound Silence reign'd every where, and no one knew which Way to turn in order to pass the Delarca the Troops were at length divided into two Columns, the one of which being composed of Swedes, followed his Majesty; and the other, consisting of Cossacks and Valoches, had Mazeppa at their Head.

The Defart, which we were to pass, is called by the neighbouring People, which are the Poles, Tartars and Colfacks, Daike Pole. The Land is at first of a marshy Kind in some Places and covered with Reeds, afterwards it becomes more dry and sandy a but at last presents the Prospect of an open Champaign, without Trees, and covered with Grass: here and there are some Hills, on which there are excelatent Fastures,

We foon found a Road, which leads, towards the Frontiers of the Palatinate of Braclau, but we quitted it to march. directly a cross the Defart towards. Furky, without seeing the least Path. through which Men had ever passed. However, our Coffacks conducted us. like Pilots in an open Sea, and knew all the Vales and Rivulets, and all the Morasses which lay in our Way. Mazeppa himself was not ignorant of any Part of this Defart, having often croffed it with the Cossacks in the last War between Russia and the Turks towards the End of the last Century; when he had incessantly scoured the Country as far as Orzakow, and it was. he who in all likelihood advised the King to take this Rout.

These Guides conducted the Swedes in such a Manner, that the two Columns which took different Roads joined the first Evening near a Morass covered with Reeds; here the Men and Horses refreshed themselves, after having horribly fuffered for Want of Water during the extream Heat of the They now laid aside all Deli-Day. cacy, and their Thirst surmounting their Disgust, each satisfied himself with drinking this troubled and muddy Water, with which some of them filled Bottles for the next Day, our Guides having affured us that we should not find any more in a great As to the Horses, we turned Wav. them to graze; but the Men suffered through the Want of Provisions: and what incommoded us most in this Rout, was, that we were continually obliged to remain in the open Air, there being neither Hut nor Cottage in these Parts. It may be not improper to mention, that there is neither Wood nor Shade in this Defart, but towards the Evening we could shelter our selves from the Sun behind the Hills, which are pretty large in some Places. The rest of the Day we were exposed to the fiery Rays of the Sun, which darted perpendicularly on our Heads in this vast Champaign.

After our Horses had foraged, we gave one another the Signal without making use of Trumpets, and afterwards continued our March as before rill Midnight, when we halted to give our Horses some Rest, which were much fatigued and very hungry; however, we could not suffer them to graze during the Night, lest they should run away, which would have obliged great Part of our Men to walk on Foot, and would have rendered our Situation yet more melancholy; some however being overcome with Fatigue, having dismounted to take a little Sleep, their Horses taking the Advantage of that Time to graze, some of them ran away, and left their Riders in a most dreadful Perplexity. After two Hours Repose we renewed our March the thirteenth of July, at two in the Morning: If we had suffered in the Day through the violent Heat, we underwent in the Night besides our Fatigue as piereing and extraordinary Cold, which lasted till the Sun appeared on the Horizon; and we remark'd on this Occasion, that the Cold was the most violent an Hour before Sun-rising, but as foon as the Sun began to dart his Rays we presently felt their Force, and at the End of an Hour or two the Heat became so excessive, that as we had during the Night great Difficulty to preserve our selves from the Cold, fo no Cloths were thin enough for the immoderate Heat of the Day. However, as disagreeable as these two opposite Extremes were, especially the Heat, which was not qualified by the least Breath of Air; we had reason to thank God that the Season was not Rainy, for in that Case we could not have resisted the Fatigue, and should very likely have perished all together.

We continued our March quietly till Noon, when we came to a Water, which obliged us to ftop to give some Pasture to our Horses, which was very good in this Part, and the Water better than that of the preceding Day, which afforded us great Support.

As to Provisions, the greater Part of N n n 2 our our People were without them; notwithstanding which they resolutely held out, with having Recourse to Food which could not but be in the highest Degree distasteful. Some Tartars only, who were used to eat Horses shich were unable to keep up, and dressed them in their own Way; they chose out the best Bits, which they dried by the Sun, or else laid them under their Saddle to make them more tender and easy to digest, which Sort of Food their Hunger made them eat with the greatest Appetite in the World.

After having halted two or three Hours at this Place, we all remounted our Horses and continued our March till midnight, when we rested again for some Hours. In this Manner we performed our whole Journey from the Boristbenes to the Bog.

The fourteenth of July we found in this Defart in several Places very wide and long Spaces of Land all covered with a particular Kind of Cherries; these grew on very small Shrubs, about the Thickness of the smallest Birch-trees, and not higher than the Grass; they were of the Bigness of common and wild Cherries red and very sharp: the Cossacks eat them very greedily, which gave our Men an Inclination to taste them, who finding them very good, took with them a large Quantity of these small Shrubs, each of which bore two or three Cherries, and ferved them on the Road for Refreshment. These Cherries resembled the Chamæcerast, mentioned by Pliny, and thole which grow in Swite zerland; to which they give the Name of Mountain Cherries.

We saw besides in this Country seyeral Sorts of Game; as Hares, wild Sheep, and a Sort of Partridge, fome of our Men killed some of them, the Cossacks having assured us "they were good to eat, and they came to us very agreeably in our present Scarcity; but the chief Question was, how to dress them: for the vast Defart did not produce a fingle Stick of Wood, with which we might make a Fire. ever, as Necessity is the Mother of Invention, we thought on a Way, which was to make Use of Horsedung, which we dried in the Sun, and afterwards burnt to roast our Game with: tho' the Heat of this Fire was not sufficient to make the Flesh of our Sheep very tender, yet those who eat thereof affirmed that the Faste came very near up to that of the Roe-buck: but these Animals did not in the least refemble our Sheep, being leaner, higher, bow-neck'd, and their Wool of a black Colour.

The fifteenth of July, we passed through a Road which led from the Palatinate of Braclau into the Ukrain. The Cossacks there met a Peasant, who drove a Waggon loaded with Salt, in order to convey it to the Ukrain; and as we were in Want of it, and did not care it sliould fall into the Enemy's Hands, they spared the Peasant the Trouble of carrying his Charge any surther, by immediately buying it as well as his Horses.

The Scarcity of Provision was still very great, and as Hunger encreased more and more, it at last obliged several of our Men to accompany the Tartars in eating Horse Flesh; and afterwards all our Men from the first to the last had Recourse to this Food, although they had yet some Victuals eff to but they conceal'd its for fear of having unwished for Guells to partake of it.

In the mean Time we approached the Frontiers of Turky, althouis was difficult to diffinguish it in these De-The Cossacks informed usi that it begun above half way between the Boristbenes and the Bog. And as we were ignorant in what Manner we should be received there with so great - a Number of Men, his Majesty had already fent General Ponial of ski with the Secretary Klinkoffrom, to the Governor of Oczakow, to give him Notice of his Arrival, and to defire him to take Care that when the King came to the Bog, every Thing should be ready for him to pass it, with all his Men; and that they might have Provision there, which he-would buy with ready Money. W To

The Bashaw, or Governor, immediately answered, that without an ex-'press Order from the Grand Seignor, he could not agree to the King's paffing; but upon the reiterated Remonfitrances of Poniatofski, who in a very lively Manner represented to him that there was not a Moment's Time to be loft, he was pleased without Delay to fend the King's Letters by Water to To these Letters he Constantinople. joined his own Representations, and at the same Time sent a Courier to the Bashaw or Seraskier of Bender, to eask his Advice how to act on this important Occasion, till he had received an Answer from Conflantinople, which might arrive in four or five Days, if the Wind was favourable w Ocza-"kow Being Busted supon the Black Seate store of the little saw related plane.

The Seraskier answer'd Mm, that he had nothing to do, but to furnish us with Provisions for ready Money, and to keep all the Barks and Men in Readiness to convey the King over the Box : Time being concernely precious, so he knew the Raylans had passed the Borishbenes in Order to pursue his Majesty.

Ponisiossis and Klinkosrow came back with this News, but they did not yet know the Seraskier of Bender's Answer, which we afterwards learned, whilst we yet kept on our Way. We arrived in a Place, where the Ground being extremely sandy and dry, the Pasture was worth nothing; there was also in this Gountry a River, which was the only one we had seen since the Borishbenes, it was called Ingulet Welinki, that is to say, the Great, to distinguish it from another River which runs more to the left, and which is called Ingulet Malinki, or the Little.

. We left the River on our right, and continuing our March from it, we let up our little Camp a League from the Bor, where we found Water enough; but its not being fresh, was a great Inconveniency to both Men and Horses. As we were very industrious in searching for fresh Water, our Cossacks, who were always in Motion, and who were perfectly acquainted with the Country, had the good Fortune to difcover a Fountain of excellent Water. at a small Distance from the Camp. As it was feared to great a Number of :Men would: foon: drain the Spring, ·Centinels were posted there to keep · Order, and that the King might always have Water fresh and pure. The poor Horses, besides their bad Pasture, -were full-forced to drink dirty Water, which took its bitter Tafte from the Neigh-

Neighbourhood of the Euxin Sea.

Here we saw Wolves all among us, one of which of a prodigious Size passed through the Middle of our Men, and had the good Fortune to escape them; and having spread a Terror thro' all our Men, he had full time to get out of Danger.

We were already on the Frontiers of Turky, which Country increased in Beauty the farther we advanced. We were told that in this delicious Country there are whole Fields covered with wild Melons; and we met with some Fields full of wild white Cabbages. Notwithstanding all these Advantages of the most fruitful Ground in the World, this Country is a Desart as far as the Bog, and there is not even the least Sign that it has ever been inhabited.

After repoling some Hours in this Place, we continued our March the fixteenth of July towards the Bog, where we arrived in two Hours Time. We incarred in a fine Meadow along the River, but there was very little Refreshment there, for Want of Water: for altho' there is some, yet many Leagues from thence as far as the Black Sea, the River had nevertheless already taken the muddy Tafte. to the Breadth of this River, which rifes far off in Podolia, and which is navigable in Poland, it is a good quaster of a League in this Place. Turks already expected us there with Impatience, that they might fell their Provisions; their Greediness after Money made them, as foon as they perceived us on the opposite Shore, row with all their Strength to join us.

It is easy to guess with what eagerness Men almost famished waited their Arrival, As it was to be feared there would be great Diforders, the King placed Guards near the River to prevent any Confusion when the Barks drew to the Shore; and to take Care that his Majesty and his Court were first served.

The Turks at their Arrival knew very well how to turn this Impatience to their Profit, and they made an Advantage, like Jews, of the Condition they faw us in; and particularly when they faw we gave them Money, without even agreeing on the Price of their Provision, which they distributed to the poor famished Smedes, just as they thought proper. However, they were very well contented on both Sides, the Turks that they made a good Market of us, and the Swedes that they had satisfied the most pressing Hunger.

The Provision which they brought us consisted in Sheep, Fowls, Fish, Bread, Biscuits, Figs; several Sorts of Wine, Spice, Wood, &c. The Sheep were large, beautiful and extremely fat; the Fowls resembled the common Sort; the Bread and the Biscuit was very well baked, and of a good Taste, and the Figs were neither fresh nor whole, but cut, candied, and sastened by the dozen to Stalks of Straw, which we bought at first at a Groat a Dozen; but afterwards for the half of that Price.

As to Wine, they brought us different Sorts; but the greatest Part was the Wine of the Crim; very heady, not agreeable, and a little upon the red. They also brought us another Sort, which they said was Greek Wine; and that it was as strong as that of the Crim, but it was infinitely more agreeable. It was nevertheless necessary to take take great Care, because it was easy to be overcome with the Strength of these Wines, and even before the Thirst was quenched. Our Men, who were very dry, selt the bad Effects of it, which at the first caused some Disorder. We found afterwards that this Drink was not only incapable of quenching Thirst, but even augmented it; for which Reason we cealed buying it. The Sheep and the Wood was reserved for the King, who had searce ear any thing hot all the Time we were in the Desart.

We had some Difficulty in dealing. with the Turks, because we had no Knowledge of either their Money or their Language, having no body amongst us who could speak it. They. brought with them, a Few, who ferved for an Interpreter; but what signifies one Man amongst so many People, where the Croud and Confusion was fo great? Their small Money consisted mostly in Aspres and Parast, of which they talked much; and ours were Gros and Copekes, having with. us in small Silver only these two Sorts; the former German, and the latter Buffian. As the Copekes were extreamly small, the Turks at first made some Difficulty of taking them, but the Few having instructed them in the Saxon Coin, and particularly the Arit-Hes or German Floring, they took them with Pleasure; because they should get by either. a great deal afterwards, melting or changing them. ever, the Ducats pleased them better than any other Sort of Coin, and they even begged us to be provided with them; for altho' afterwards each Man-Rood on his Guard, we were nevertheless obliged greatly to give Way to the Avarice of the Turks, who let slip no Opportunity of crying up the Value of their Goods, and of felling them as dear as possibly they could.

As his Majesty did not take so much Care of himself as of his poor Soldiers, he caused both Bread and Meat to be distributed amongst them; giving Orders that Oxen, Sheep, and other Food, should be bought to refresh A Turk coming forward at the Beginning with a Sheep and some other Provision which he presented to the King, this Prince ordered him twelve Ducats; which being reported to the others, they came in Crouds from all Parts, and laid at his Feet all the best they had to regale him. His Majesty still continued to give them Marks of his Liberality, which, joined to that grand and majestick Air which they faw thine in him, immediately inspired them with a Veneration for his-Personn so that they are very much in the wrong who deery this Nation as extremely barbarous: for the Turks. effective, and shew, except some few Faults, as much, and, it may be, more Cantlour, Honesty and Charity, than many Christian Nations.

As it was not expedient to flay long on this Side the River, the Enemy being in full March to overtake us, his Majesty very much pressed the Passage, sending again to the Bashaw of Oczakow, to remind him of executing, his Orders.

This Bashaw did not deny but that he had received Orders from the Sera-fisier of Bender, concerning the King and a small Retinue; but he said that these Orders made no mention of his Majesty's Troops, and consequently that he could only let the King with fome Domesticks pass; that he was going to prepare all that would be necellary for this Passage, but for the Troops he could not dispense with the Orders from Constantinople. At the same Time he forbid, under the most rigorous Punishments, all'the Watermen and Merchants who had brought us Provisions, to take any Swede aboard. There was only one little Bark. which was always kept in Readiness' for the King and some few necessary Attendants.

The King surprized at the Bashaw's Interpreting the Seraskier's Orders in this Manner, declared plainly, that he would not pass the River without. all his Men, whom he would never abandon; and at the fame Time he fent the Bashaw Word, that when he first asked Leave to pass, it was not for himself alone; and that the Seraskier's Orders, that he should transport him as foon as possible, must certainly include his Followers. But it was talking to a Man that was deaf. who was not at all inclined to favour the Swedes, altho' they did every Thing in their Power to gain him, both by Promises and Presents: which at first was all in vain, but afterwards upon our giving him a confiderable Sum, he consented to our Demand, and even without receiving any farther Orders from Constantinople.

The Cossacks we had amongst us very much augmented his ill Humour, and were partly the Cause he was obstinate so long! for he would have been persuaded in Favour of the Swedes without our being at fuch an Expence, if the Cossacks, who were always sufpected by the Turks, and particularly in this Country, had not been with us. In this dangerous Situation. we had no other Resource left, till we had prevailed on the Balhaw, but by great Promiles, to engage the Merchants to transport the Swedes. We, happily persuaded one, whose Boat could hold fifty, to promile to trant, port them the next Day for two Ducats each Man. The Swedes, all Men of Distinction, who had bargained for this Passage. went in the Evening the feventeenth of July into the Bark, having employed all the Day in concluding their, Bargain; they stayed there all Night, that they might go upon fure Grounds. and for fear the Merchant should change his Mind; but when Day, broke, the eighteenth of July, they. faw neither the Merchant, who had already received half the Money, nor: his Rowers: those who were imbarked. resolved to take some Swedish Soldiers. to row them over to the other Side without waiting any longer, When, they arrived at the Middle of the River, the Turk, who was Master of the Birk, met them, having about twenty, Men with him in his Boat, and cried. out like a Fury to the Swedes to return to Land, and that otherwise they should instantly repent it. These Menaces made no Impression on the Swedes, and they even continued to row towards the opposite Shore. The Turkish Merchant to intimidate them. ordered his Men to make ready to Fire; our Men at the same Time put, themselves in a Posture of Defence. and by that Meansstruck such an Awe into the Massulmen that they retreated, and arrived on the other Bank before. the Swedes, who, being uncertain. what the Turks would do at their landing, sing, held themselves in Readiness for all Events, but the Affair went better than was expected; and except some sew Abuses, which the Swedes pretended not to hear, the Affair was terminated without their being forced to come to an Engagement. The Turks contented themselves with obliging the Swedes presently to quit the Bark, into which they threw themselves with Precipitation, and rowed towards Occakow.

The Swedes who were passed over, were very glad to find themselves in a Place of Safety; but they were very nearly concerned at the sad Fate of all the rest, because no Turk durst render them this charitable Piece of Service to transport them, being strictly forbid by the Bashaw; who however, being gained by Money as above mentioned, the Turks gave them Boats towards the Evening of the eighteenth of July; and we made so good Use of them that Day, and the next being the nineteenth of July, that we passed over a great Number of Men.

As to the King, who had his Bark in Readiness, he still continued to take Care to transport his Men, as well to encourage them, as to make the Bashaw fear he should run a great Risk if he did not speedily send more Barks to transport all the rest. The King appeared fully resolved to stay on that Side, till all his Men were transported. The Tarkish Governor at last sent more Barks, but it was too late, the King had already passed, and the Russians arriving soon after, took Prisoners all those who remained on Land. The King's Train, after the Paffage, was composed of the Hettman Mazeppa, the Major-Generals, AxelSparr, Hardh, Lagercrona and Poniatofski; the Colonels Ornstedt, Hierta and Dabldorss; the Lieutenant-Colonels Gyllenkrok, Ehrenschild, Funk, Silverbielm, Grothusen and Leyonbrink; the Adjutant General Gyllenkla, and of several other Officers of Distinction and Quality, with the Remainder of the Drabans and some Soldiers, amounting in all to sour hundred Men, or thereabouts; besides some Cossack Officers.

As to the Court, it was composed of M. Düben, the Chamberlains Thorn-schold and Klinstierna; the Gentlemen of the Court, Clüsendorff and Cronmark, Bishop Malmberg the King's Confessor, who afterwards died at Bender, and who had succeeded Mr. Nordberg taken Prisoner at Pultowa; the two Masters of his Majesty's Pantry, a Butler, & Controller, a Cook, some Under Cooks and Butlers, and several Foot-men.

The Chancery was composed of Mr. Müllern, Counsellor to the Chancery; Mr. Fieff, Counsellor of War; the three Chancellors Bunge, Hylteen, and Von Kocken, and some Clerks; which in all amounted to five or fix hundred Men.

The rest might all have passed very easily from the Time we arrived at the Bog, if the Bashaw had not testified so much Ill will towards us, and if he had surnished us in good Time with the Boats which were necessary, there being great Numbers at Oczakow; but the Obstinacy of this Turk, before he was brought over by Money, was the Cause that in the Asternoon of the nineteenth the Russians surprized the rest of our Men, immediately stopt some of the Vessels, and fired upon O o those who at their Arrival quitted the Shore to cross the River.

As the Swedes were not able to op. pose Forces so much superiour, they were foon obliged to furrender themfelves Prisoners; but as to the Cossacks who knew the Country perfectly well, they faved themselves by crossing the Defart, and were not long pursued by the Russians, who being fatigued as well as the Swedes, were not in a Condition to overtake them. Besides, the Russians had already sufficiently violated the Turkish Frontiers, and committed too many Hostilities upon the Grand Seignor's Territories, to venture at any further Excesses, which might draw upon them fatal Confequences, if the Turks should be incensed and take the Field to cut off their Retreat, for which Reason they speedily returned to the Boristhenes.

It was not then sufficient that these poor unhappy Men had already suffered the most horrible Miseries and Fatigues in passing the Desart, but they were forced to cross it a second Time as Slaves, and in a Condition much more forrowful and deplorable. There were very few of them who arrived at the Muscovite Army; for the Costacks informed us, that they had found a great many of them in the Defart, who were overcome with Hunger, Milery and Fatigue, the Russians themselves having repassed this vast Desart with great Difficulty. Those few of them who had the good Fortune to fave themselves, were very much comforted when they faw the King in Safety, notwithstanding the Uncertainty of their Fate, being in a foreign Country, and at the Discretion of a People of whom the Europeans commonly form very false Ideas. They nevertheless greatly regretted the Loss of their faithful Companions, and also of their Baggage, and all they had brought with them from the Boristbenes as far as the Bog; which the Enemy there seized and carried off. The greatest Part complained more particularly of the Loss of their Horses, of which very few had passed the River; so that even several Persons of Distinction were under a Necessity of travelling on Foot.

As foon as the Bashaw had begun to change his Conduct towards us, he ordered Provision and other Things necessary to be transported to our Camp. The Turkish Merchants came thither in Crouds, and brought us all Sorts of Commodities; and amongst others, Horses and Waggons, which they fold very dear to those who were able to pay for them, which however comforted our Men who were terribly fatigued and dejected. The King only, notwithstanding his Wound, and the forrowful Spectacle he had just seen of his Men dragged into Slavery almost before his Eyes, preserved his usual Grandeur of Mind, and a Tranquility quite uncommon and worthy of a Hero.

We then began to hope, that inflead of the Desart through which we had passed, we should have the good Fortune to meet in our Rout Towns and Villages; but we greatly deceived ourselves in this Respect, we had not yet crossed all this vast Desart which still continued, so that in the Day we were exposed to an extraordinary Heat without being able to find the least Shade, and in the Night we had only the Ground for Matresses and Quilts, and the Sky to cover us. But as we at least found ourselves in Safety, in Regard to the Enemy who could no longer pursue us, all those who were able to be at any Expence, bought small Turkish Waggons, made in the Manner of the Country, namely, of the Length of a Man, very narrow and without any Iron, and so light that one Horse is able to draw them, they have four Wheels and a Board at the Top, of the Depth of a Span and a half, which is covered with Felt; we accommodated ourselves with these Carriages the best we could, and continued our March but slowly. In the Day these Carriages served us for Shelter in the Places where we encamped. in the Night we used them instead of Beds; when it rained, they were our Tiles; they at the same Time held our Provision, and into them we could retire and shelter our selves as Diogenes did formerly in his Tub.

It then appeared to us, that the Country itself obliged the Inhabitants to live there in the Manner of the ancient Scythians; for although this famous People have for a long Time ceased making any Figure in the World, their Manner of Living is yet so much practised in all this Country, that they still continue the same rambling and vagabond Life, without either Fire or fixed Habitation, continually decamping from one Place to another, without building either Towns or Villages.

. It was a Spectacle equally melancholy and ridiculous, to see us in the Morning come out from under the Felts of these Waggons; nor was the Manner in which we drove them all Day less ridiculous. We nevertheless travelled more conveniently in them through the Defart, than we did formerly on Horseback: the Fatigue of which became at last quite insupportable. As foon as we were provided with Necessaries to continue our Journey, we began the March; because the Place where we then were failed in good Pasture and fresh Water. We then drew directly towards Oczakow, still crossing a great Plain which bounded our Sight. When we faw his Majesty take this Rout, we were in Hopes he would fix his Camp near this Town, where we might refresh and repose our selves at our Ease; but this was neither the Intention of his Majesty, nor of the Bashaw: so that we turned fuddenly on the Right of Oczakow, marching thro' uncultivated and uninhabited Fields, and encamped three Leagues from Town.

However, this Town was of great Use to us; for the Bashaw gave some Swedes who were to buy the King's Provisions the necessary Passports, with free Leave to enter there. Several made Use of this Opportunity to buy a thousand little Things in the Town, which they wanted the more as the Distempers caused by the Miseries we had suffered, began to spread amongst us; and especially the Dyssentery, which very sew, except the King, escaped.

This Distemper immediately seized us after our Arrival at the Rog, and as soon as we began to eat what the Turks brought us thither; their heady Wine, the Figs, and all those candied Fruits, could not agree with that Quantity of Water with which we had loaded our Stomachs going thro the Desart in the excessive Heat, to which we had been exposed.

We stayed in the new Camp on this Side of the Bog, the twenty-first and twenty-fecond of July. His Majesty employed all that Time in confulting on the present Situation of Affairs; he was resolved to send somebody to Constantinople. For this Purpose he spoke to several Persons, but they resused being charged with this Commission, under Pretence that they neither knew the State of Affairs, nor the Customs nor Manners of the Country. His Majesty then sent for Mr. Neugebaver, a Native of Dantzick, and who having retired out of the Musicovite Service, had for some Time followed the Army in Quality of a Voluntier, with a convenient Penfion. His Maiesty spoke to him of it himself, and Mr. Neugebaver consulting only his Zeal for his Majesty's Service, immediately accepted the Employment. They without Delay dispatched his credential Letters, and the following Letter from the King of Sweden to the Grand Seignor.

To the most high, most powerful, most glorious and invincible Emperor Achment, Son of Mahomet the Fourth; Emperor of diverse Empires, King of many Kingdoms, Sovereign and Protector of several different Nations; whom God protect, and prolong your Reign.

THIS Letter, fign'd by our Royal Hand, is to give your Highness Notice of our Arrival in your Dominions; and to inform you of the Misfortune that happened to us in those of the Czar, after we had thus far as fortunately as justly chastised the Violation of the Law of Nations and the Faith of Treaties so lemnly sworn to. After baving forced King Augustus to renounce the Crown of Poland, of which he was rather the Tyrant than the King, gave that Nation a King from amongst themselves, who is a Friend to your sublime Port; after we had chased the Czar, bis Ally and Colleague in Perfidy, from Poland, which be had set in a Flame, and purfued him as far as the Town of Pultowa, to give him Laws and break his pernicious Designs; Heaven bas permitted our Army, diminish'd and fatigu'd by rough Marches, and wanting the most necesfary Things for Subfistence, being suddenly overwhelm'd by a Multitude three Times more numerous and provided with all we wanted, in the End to lose the Battle.

Not being in a Condition, nor near enough our Provinces to raise a new Army, and being willing to escape falling into the Hands of a barbarous Enemy, we are come to seek in this Empire an Asylum against bis Persidy, under the august Protection of your Imperial Highness, with Means of immediately rejoining the Army we have left in Poland, under the Command of the worthy King, whom we have given to that Kingdom, to support bim on bis Throne, in Case that he whom we have by Force dethroned should attempt to re-ascend it, contrary to the Faith of Treaties which we have made with him.

What we propose to our selves besides this Asylum, and these Means, is the Friendship of your Imperial Highness; to whom we offer and promise in our Part the most sincere Attachment we are capable of. The first Proof we think ourself under an Obligation to give of this Attachment to your Highness, is to let you know that if we give the Czar, whole. Ambition is no more guided by Courage than by Faith and Honour, I'me to make Use of the Advantage our ill Fortune has given bim over us, be will full suddenly on some of our Provinces; as he and his Allies in Perfidy have done upon ours, beginning an unjust War, not only without any Declaration of it, but even in the midst of a Psace established in the most solemn Manner, at the Time when be affured us by our reciprocal Ministers, that he was fincerely resolved religiously to observe the Treaties, and desired us to do the same Thing on our Part. But the several Forts which this Prince has built upon the Tanais, and upon the Palus Mœotis, and bis new Fleet, sufficiently publish bis pernicious Designs. against your Empire without alledging these Examples of his Persidy. Things being in this Situation, we see nothing more useful or more proper to prevent the Danger with which this Prince threatens your august Empire, than an Alliance between your sublime Port and our Court, by Virtue of which your Highness will put us in a Condition of returning safely into Poland and our Provinces, under the Guard of a Body of your valiant Horle, and fortifying our Army which is under the Direction of a wise and faithful King, who will voluntarily enter into our Confederacy. Which being once procured, we will yet once more carry our just Arms as far as the Heart of Muscovy, to suppress the unjust Ambition of the Czar. Finally, we will never forget toe Favours it shall pleafe your Highness to confer upon us, and will seek all Opportunities and Means to give real Proofs of our Gratitude; and we shall always think it a particular Honour and a real Pleasure to subscribe our self,

Your faithful Friend,

CHARLES, Son of CHARLES XI.

Mr. Neugehaver being furnished with his Instructions, began his Journey; but before his Arrival at Constantinople, the Turkish Emperor had already been informed of all that had passed, by an Aga, who having three Weeks before escorted Secretary Klinkostrom and Mr. Sandul, as above mentioned, to the Army before Pultowa, had been Eye witness of the bloody Battle which was fought there, and as foon as we had passed the Bog went on before to inform the Grand Seignor of what had happened; and also to give him Intelligence of the King of Sweden's Approach, to put himself under his Protection.

The next Day, being the twenty-third of July, there arrived at the Camp a Turkish Officer, who was sent by the Seraskier of Bender, with Letters full of Politeness and Civility for the King; in which this Governor greatly condoled the Losses his Majesty had suffered, offering at the same Time to do him all the Service in his Power; and sending the King a Tent which came very seasonably, and which was immediately set up for his Majesty.

The Turk made but a very short Stay, and after he had received a handfome Present from his Majesty, he returned very well satisfied to Bender.
At the same Time we continued our March

March on the Side of Oczakow, and we encamped as usual in open Field, without being able to discover on any Part either Villages, Houses or Cotta-

All this Country was but one dreadful Defart, known formerly by the Name of Solitudo Getarum, the Defart' of the Getæ: it is at present included under the general Name of Tartary-Akerman, and it extends itself from the North-west of Ilbmaeli as far as Oczakow. There was not to be found the least Hut, but only some Horses which were guarded by the Tartars, who live to this Day without following any other Law than the Instinct of pure Nature; as did formerly the ancient Vagabonds, which were collected or come out from among the Daci, the Geta, and the Scythians, who overwhelmed the little Scytbia, the Taurica Chersonesus, and the Banks of the Palus Maotis. They form bordes, a Sort of portable Village, with their covered Waggons, and some Tents called Obas, which serve for a Retreat or Habitation for their Wives and Children. Finally, they live upon Horse-slesh and other Cattle, Cheefe, Milk, and particularly Mare's Milk; and whilst one Part make frequent Inroads upon the neighbouring Nations with fresh Horses, the other Part seed those who want Rest, to refresh them; chusing for that Use the best Fields, and the finest Meadows, where their Keddis or Hordes remain as long as their Grass lasts.

It was with great Difficulty we went thro' this Defart, which is about twenty Leagues from Oczakow, as far as the Niester; and if the officious and interested Musulmen had not had the Goodness to follow us with all Sorts of Provision, and to let up a Sort of a Market on the Road, which we passed through, where we might be provided with every Thing necessary, and even buy Horses, we should never have been able to have supported the Fatigue of this Tourney.

The Milk which the Turks brought us was not good, because of the bitter Taste which is caused by the great Quantity of Wormwood which grows in this Defart; so that we liked better to buy Water, altho' it was hot and difagreeable, by being brought a great Way in the Manner of the Country. This Water however was so dear, that very often one good Draught came to two Gros, or more. They also sold us Wine, but it was extremely strong, it did not go off well, because it caused an excessive Heat; besides, it could not at all quench our Thirst. brought us feveral other Things; amongst others, excellent Filberts. which were not inferiour either in Goodness or Size to those in Italy. All this enliven'd the March, especially in the Places where we encamped; because a great Number of Merchants and Victuallers always affembled there.

When the King arrived at the Distance of a League from the Town, he gave Orders for us to encamp and stay there that Night, and the next Day, being the twenty-fourth of July. this Place we observed in his Majesty, what no one had ever remark'd before, outward Marks of a deep Melancholy. The News he had just received of the Death of Madam Royal his Sister, the Duchess of Holstein-Gottorp, was the Cause of this Change. Mr. Klinkostrom had brought a Letter from the Queen Dowager, to inform him of this difmal News; but as he arrived before Pultowa some few Days after the King was wounded, Count Piper thinking it improper, in a Situation fo dangerous for the King's Health, to discover to him his Sister's Death; strictly forbad Klinkostrom to acquaint him with it, hoping to find a more favourable Time to tell him of the Death of a Princess, whom he had always tenderly loved. The Loss of the Battle of Pultowa, followed with great Disorders occafioned by our Retreat through the Defart, was the Reason his Majesty was not yet acquainted with this News; and they resolved to stay till we had passed the Box, and then to communicate it to him; which, for several Reafons, could now be concealed from him no longer.

Mr. Müllern, Counsellor of the Chancery, was charged with this Commission. He endeavoured as much as possible to soften the Bitterness of this News, which could not but be a great Trouble to him. The King, notwithstanding all his Heroism and Greatness of Mind, was quite overcome, at hearing of the Death of a Sifter who was so dear to him. Hitherto all the Losses he had suffered, had not been capable of moving his Constancy. He had always appeared indifferent, and with a ferene and tranquil Countenance in the midst of all his late Missortunes; but this last Blow quite cast him down, and altho' before, notwithstanding the Pain of his Wound, those who were familiar with him had never heard him fetch the least Sigh, he appeared so much oppressed by his Sister's Death, that he retired into his Tent, would neither fee or speak to any Body.

As this Prince from his Youth had harden'd himself by Fatigue and continual warlike Exercises, it was generally thought, that he was in a Manner insensible of all that is called Tenderness, and that the most fatal Events were not capable of moving his Constancy and Firmness; or else, which is more probable, that he was subject to these Affections, but that he had so well conquered and brought them under, that he never let them appear outwardly, and that he always kept them deeply concealed in his Mind. vertheless, we saw with Astonishment, on this Occasion, what an Effect the Tenderness for a Sister so much beloved could have on a Heart otherwise the most firm and magnanimous, that perhaps was ever known.

Nevertheless this Prince, after he had given some Time to the first Sentiments of Gries, which Nature inspired him with, soon recovered that Greatness of Mind, which he had always shewn on all other Occasions; and submitted himself, with respect to the irrevocable Decrees of God. He did not delay returning an Answer to Stockholm. At the same Time he gave several Officers and Soldiers, who were either wounded or sick, leave to go to Oczakow, to be cured there; and to stay till such Time as they were able to come to his Majesty at Bender.

It is very probable the King would have preferred Oczakow to Bender, if the Bashaw had behaved with more Civility to him; but this Reason and some others at last determined his Majesty to quit the Neighbourhood of Occaliow: it was really very inconvenient, that the Disputches which were sent to Constantinople, were always forced to go thro' the Desart, unless they sent them by Sea.

We decamped the twenty fifth of July, after having stayed a Day and two Nights in the Neighbourhood of Oczakow; and encamped two Leagues from thence in the Desart. In this Rout, we were obliged for several Days to defend our selves against the continual Attacks of a new Enemy. A terrible Number of Locusts generally arose every Day before Noon from the Sea-shore, first in a small Number, but afterwards like Clouds, which obscured the Air, and made it so dark and thick, that the Sun appeared in all this vast Plain to be entirely eclipsed.

These Insects did not fly near the Earth, but almost of the same Height as Swallows, till they have found a Field to pitch on. We often met with these Insects in our Way, and rifing they made a Noise like that of a Tempest; they afterwards fell upon' us like a Storm, pitching on the same Plain where we were, and without any Fear of being trod under Feet by our Horses; when they arose from the Ground they covered us all over in fuch a Manner, that we could not fee before us till we had passed the Place where they were. In all Places where these Locusts pitch'd, they made a terrible Havock, eating the Grafs by the Roots; so that instead of that fine Verdour, with which the Country was before covered, there was nothing now to be feen but dry and fandy Ground. It could not be believed that fo small an Animal coult pals the Sea, if Experience had not so often convinced these poor People of it: for after having passed a small Arm of the Euxin Sea, coming from the Islands and neighbouring Countries, these Insects crossed great Provinces, where they destroyed every Thing, they met as far as to eat the very Doors of the Houses.

The next Day being the twenty-fixth of July, we continued our March still thro' the same Desart, or the Tartary, of Akerman; and we encamped four Leagues from the Place which we had left the Night before. After we had stayed there that Night, we went the next Day five Leagues, passing near the Lake Teligon, and encamped upon the Borders of the Euxin Sea, which we coasted along all this Day. Water is extreamly clear, and especially near the Shore; so that it is fallely called the Black Sea, a Name which was formerly given it to distinguish it from the White and Red Seas, as there are the White, Red and Black Rusha. In the Evening, as the King came to the Spot where we were to encamp, there arrived an Envoy from the Han of Tartary, who demanded an Audience of him. He immediately obtained it, and after he had given his Majesty a Letter from his Master, he made him a Present of a small Tartarian Waggon, which was drawn by four Horses, and in which there was a Tent. The King immediately answered the Han's Letter; and the Envoy having received a suitable Present, departed to the Crim.

The twenty eighth of July we continued our March by the Side of the Black Sea. The Heat was excessive, and the Water beginning to fail, we suffered a great deal. We went four Leagues that Day. The twenty ninth and the Day following, having quitted the Sea and marched feven or eight Leagues from it, we came to a wretched Tartarian Village, having not seen a fingle House in twenty Days March from the Boristbenes. Nevertheleis, the King forbad us Lodging there, that we might not incommode the Inhabitants; and we only took what they offered themselves, which was immediately paid for with ready Money. This Village, the thatched Houses of which rather resembled Caves der Ground than Houses, and the People appearing to us extreamly miscrable, was the most piteous Sight in the World. The thirty-fiest we went fix Leagues, marching along the Side of the Niester; and after we had passed the little River of Kurkabun, we at last encamped the next Day a League from Bender.

His Majesty here heard the News, that the Czar had fent to Constantinople, to demand the Delivery of Mazeppa; but that the Grand Seignor had generoully refus'd it him, which gave this Prince great Pleasure. We stayed two Days in this Camp, where, contrary to our Expectation, arrived some Swedes, who at the Time that the Ruffians had surprized the others on the Bog, concealed themselves among forne Reeds, and had found Means, after the Enemy's Departure, pals the River, by the Affistance of the Turkish Barks, and afterwards to overtake us.

At our Arrival near Bender, we found the Seraskier had already made all the necessary Preparations for the King's Reception; and as soon as he knew that his Majesty was on his Way towards that Town, he, with some Horse, came out to meet him half way. After he had made a polite Compliment to the King, he told him, that he had fet up a Camp by the Grand Seignor's Orders near Bender, on the other Side of the River, for his Majesty and all his Men, where he would find all that he had thought could be necessary for him; and that he defired him to receive graciously the Pains he had taken on this Account. The King answered this Compliment in a very obliging Man-Then this Seraskier and his Horse having surrounded the King's Coach, we began again the March, continuing to coast along the Niefter. At our Arrival before Bender, from which the River separated us, they fired all the Cannon there round the Fortress, at several different Times. When the King entered the Camp, he found there a magnificent Tent; which was pitched for his Majesty. Before this Tent were ranged, on both Sides, two Companies of Janifaries, who founded their warlike Musick to do Honour to his Majesty. After the King had entered the Tent, and given Thanks to the Seraskier, the latter returned to the Town with his Retinue; but he left the Companies of the Janisaries, with an Aga, for the King's This Seraskier took Care before his Departure, that the principal Officers and all the Court were well lodged in fine Tents, which had been pitched for them, and where they had every Thing convenient, that of his Majesty particularly, being of a Grandeur and Magnificence worthy a King.

NUMBERIV.

The History of Charles XII. King of Sweden from the Time of his Retreat to Bender in Turkey, to his Death; being killed at Frederickshall in Norway, December. 1718.

ROM the first Moment of King Charles's repairing to the Turkish Territories, he had laid the Delign of turning the Ottoman Arms upon his Enemies: he already fancied he saw himself at the Head of the Turkish Forces, reducing Poland again under the Yoke, and subduing Muscovy. M. de Neughaver set out from Ozakou for Constantinople, with the Character of the King's Envoy extraordinary. Count Poniatofsky, a Person equally capable and resolute, of an engaging and agreeable Temper, born with the Talent of persuading and pleasing all Nations, attended the Swedish Embasly, but in a private Capacity, in order to found the Dispositions of the Confantinopolitan Ministry, without being tied up to the usual Forms, and giving too much Ground for Suspicion: he knew how to gain in a short Time the Favour of the Grand Visir, who loaded him with Presents; and had the Art to convey a Letter of the King of Sweden's to the Sultana Valide, Mother to the Emperor then upon the Throne, and who had formerly been illused by her Son, but now began to recover her Interest in the Seraglio. He entered into a close Friendship with one Bru a Frenchman, who had been Chancellor to the French Embassy. Man was perpetually talking of the King of Sweden's Exploits to the chief of the Sultana's Eunuchs, who charmed his Mistress with repeating them. The Sultana, by a fecret Inclination with which most Women find themselves inspired in Favour of extraordinary Men, even without having ever feen them, took the King's Part openly in the Seraglio, we called him by no other Name than that of her Lion: And when will you, faid she sometimes to the Sultan her Son, help my Lion to devour this Czar? She even dispensed with the strict Rules of the Seraglio, so far as to write several Letters with her own Hand to Count Poniatofky. One of those who entered into Poniatofky's Designs with the greatest Abilities, was Fonsece a Porteguese Physician, fixed at Constantinople, a learned and ingenious Person. who joined the Knowledge of Men to that of his own Art, and whose Profession procured him Access to the Ottomam Porte, and often an Intimacy with the Visits.

At length the King of Sweden's Party was become so powerful at Constantinople, by Poniatosky's Management, that the Faction of the Moscowy Envoy thought their only Refuge was to poison him. Accordingly they prevailed upon one of his Domesticks to give him Poison in a Dish of Cosses, but the Crime was discovered before it was put in Execution. The Poison was found in the Servant's Hands, in a little Vial, which they carried to the Grand Seignor. The Poisoner was tried in full Divan, and condemned to the Galleys, for the Turkish Law never punishes such Crimes capitally, as were intended only, but not executed.

The Grand Visir appeared as eager as the Sultana Valide to ferve the King of Sweden: He told Poniatofky, giving him at the same Time a Purse of 1000 Ducats, I will take your King in one Hand, and a Sword in the other, and carry bim to Moscow, at the Head of 200000 Men. This Visir by Name Chourlouly Ali-Basha, was a very able Minister in the Art of War, and a better Politician than such Persons usually are. He had settled the imperial Revenues under excellent Regulations. He gave away small Sums of Money willingly, which gained him Creatures; but much more willingly received great Sums of them, when he was upon any important Negotiations, which made it feem very strange, that he should appear so favourable to an unfortunate King, who at that time had little to give him. He was the Son of a Peasant at the Village of Chourlou. Among the Turks it is no Reproach to a great Man to have been of fuch an Extraction. Birth in that Country is not at all regarded; Merit is looked upon as every Thing. It is common there to see the Son of a Labourer made a chief Minister, and the Son of a Visir follow the Plough.

At Bender the King found Plenty of every Thing; a Happiness very rarely attained to by a vanquished and sugitive Prince: for besides Provision more than sufficient, and the five hundred Crowns a Day which he received from the Ottoman Munificence, he drew Money also from France, and borrowed of the Merchants at Conftantinopte. Part of this Money was employed in carrying on Intrigues in the Seraglio, in purchasing the Favour of the Visirs, or procuring their Ruin. The rest he distributed profusely among his Officers, and the Janifaries of Bender, Grosbusen his Favourite and Treasurer was the Dispenser of his Liberalities: a Man, who, contrary to the Custom of Persons in that Station, was as much pleafed with giving as his Master. He brought him one Day an Account of fixty thousand Crowns in two Lines, ten thousand given to the Swedes and Janisaries by the generous Orders of his Majesty, and the rest spent by myself. See, fays the King, bow I like my Friends should give in their Accounts. Mullern makes me read whole Pages for the Sum of ten thousand Livres. One of his old Officers, thought to be a little covetous, complained to the King that he gave all to Grotbusen. I give Mcney, replies the King, to none but those who know bow to make use of it. This Generofity often reduced him to such Straits, that he had not wherewithal to give. A better Œconomy in his Liberalities had been more to his Advantage and not less honourable, but it was this Prince's failing, to drive all the Virtues to Excess.

Great Numbers of Strangers ran from Constantinople to see him. The Turks and neighbouring Tartars came thither in Crouds; all honoured and admired him. His Rigidness in abstaining from Wine, and his Regularity in attending the publick Devotions Ppp 2 twice twice a Day, made them say that he was a true Mussulman. They were impatient to march with him to the Conquest of Muscovy.

While he continued at Bender. which was longer than he thought to do, he infensibly acquired a Taste for Books. Baron Fabricius, Son to the Duke of Holstein's first Minister, a very agreeable young Man, of such Gaiety of Temper, and an easy Turn of Wit as takes with Princes, was the Person that prevailed upon him to read. He had been fent as Envoy ro him at Bender, to take care of the Interests of the young Duke of Holstein, and carried his Point by the Agreeableness of his Manner and Behaviour. He had read all French Writers of Reputation, and perfunded the King to read the Tragedies of the great Corneille, those of M. Racine, and the Works of M. Despreaux. His Majesty had no Relish for Despreaux's Satyrs, which are by no Means his best Performances; but he much admired his other Works. But when he read that Paffage in his eighth Satyr, in which the Author makes Alexander a Fool and a Madman, he tore out the Leaf.

Of all the French Tragedies, Mithridates pleased him most, because the Situation of that King, vanquished and breathing Vengeance, resembled his own. He pointed with his Finger before M. Fabricius to the Places that struck him, but would read none of them aloud, nor ever venture to speak a Word in French. Nay, when he afterwards saw at Bender M. Desaleurs, the French Embassador at the Porte, a Person of distinguished Merit, but acquainted only with his Mother-tongue, he answered him in Latin; and upon Desaleurs protesting that he did not understand four Words in that Language, the King rather than talk French, called for an Interpreter.

Thus was Charles XII. employed at Bender, where he waited till an Army of Turks should come to his Assistance. To dispose the Ottoman Porte to this War, he detached about 800 Poles and Cossacks of his Retinue, with Orders to pass the Neister, that runs by Bender, and to go and observe what passed upon the Frontiers of Poland.

The Muscovite Troops dispersed in those Quarters fell immediately upon this little Company, and purfued them even to the Territories of the Grand Signor. This was what the King of Sweden expected. His Ministers and Emissaries at the Porte made a great Clamour against this Irruption, and excited the Turks to Vengeance: but the Czar's Money removed all Difficulties. Tolftoy his Envoy at Confantinople, gave the Grand Visir and his Creatures Part of the fix Millions that had been found at Pultowa in the King of Sweden's military Chest. After such a Defence the Divan found the Czar not guilty. And so far were they from talking of making War against him, that they granted such Honours and Privileges to his Envoy, as Muscovite Ministers had never before enjoyed at Constantinople. was suffered to have a Seraglio, that is, a Palace in the Quarters of the Franks, and to converse with the foreign Ministers. Nay the Czar thought he had Power enough to demand that General Mazeppa should be delivered up to him, as Charles XII. had caused the unfortunate Patkul to be surrendered into his Hands. Chourlouly All Basha could no longer refuse any thing to a Prince, who back'd his Demand with Millions. Thus the same Grand Visir, who before had made a folemn Promise to carry the King of Sweden into Muscovy with two hundred thousand Men, had the Assurance to make a Proposal to him of consenting to the Sacrifice of General Mazeppa. King Charles was inraged at the Queftion. However it is not certain, how far the Visir could have carried the Matter, had not Mazeppa, who was then seventy Years of Age, died just at this Juncture. The King's Grief and Resentment were very much augmented, when he understood that Tolfloy, now become the Czar's Embassador at the Porte, was served in publick by the Swedes that had been made Slaves at Pultowa, and that these brave Soldiers were daily fold in the Market at Constantinople. Besides the Muscovite Embassidor declared openly, that the Mussulman Troops at Bender were placed there rather as a Guard upon the King, than to do him Honour.

King Charles abandoned by the Grand Visir, and conquered by the Czar's Money in Turkey as he had been by his Arms in Ukrania, found himfelf deluded, scorned by the Porte, and in a Manner a Prisoner among the Tartars. His Attendants began to despair. Himself alone remained firm, and did not shew the least Dejection of Spirit, no not for a Moment. He imagined the Sultan was ignorant of the Intrigues of Chourlouly Ali his Grand Visir, and resolved to make him acquainted with them, and Poniatosky undertook this bold Commis-fion. The Grand Seignor went every. Friday to the Mosque encompassed with his Solacks, a Kind of Guard whose Turbans were set with Feathers fo high, that they hid the Sultan from the Eyes of the People. When any one had a Petition to present to the Grand Seignor, the Way was to mix himself among these Guards, and hold the Petition up in the Air. Sometimes the Sultan vouchsafed to take it himfelf; but more frequently he ordered an Aga to take Care of it, and afterwards upon his Return from the Mosque, caused the Petitions to be laid before him. There is no fear of any one's daring to importune him with a trifling and unnecessary Petition; for at Constantinople they write less in a Year, than they do at Paris in a Day. Much less does any one venture to present Petitions against the Ministers, to whom for the most Part, the Sultan remits them without reading them. However Poniatosky had no other Way to convey the King of Sweden's Complaints to the Grand Seignor. He drew up a Representation against the Grand Visir sufficient to ruin him. M. de Feriolle, who was at that Time the French Embassador, got it translated into Turkish. A Greek was hired to prefent it, who mingling himself among the Grand Seignor's Guards, held up the Paper so high, and for lo long a Time, and made fuch a Noise, that the Sultan perceived it, and took the Memoir himself.

Some Days after, the Sultan in Answer to the King of Sweden's Complaints, sent him twenty five Arabian Horses, one of which that had carried his Highness, was covered with a Saddle and Housing enriched with precious precious Stones, and the Stirrups were of massy Gold. With this Present he sent an obliging Letter, but conceived in general Terms, and such as gave Reason to suspect, that the Minister had done nothing without the Sultan's Consent. Chourlouly also, who knew how to dissemble, sent sive very curious Horses to the King. But his Majesty, with a haughty Air, told the Person who brought them, Go back to your Master, and tell him, that I don't receive Presents from mine Enemies.

M. Poniatofky having already had the Courage to get a Petition presented against the Grand Visir, then formed the bold Design of deposing him. He knew the Visir was no Favourite of the Sultan's Mother, and was the Aversion both of Kislar Aga, the chief of the black Eunuchs, and of the Aga of the Janisaries: he encouraged all three to speak against him. It was very strange to see a Christian, a Pole, an Agent without Character of a Swedish King, who had fled for Refuge to the Turks, caballing publickly in a manner at the Porte against a Viceroy of the Ottoman Empire, and fuch an one too as was both an useful Minister and a Favourite of his Master. Poniatosky had never succeeded, and the bare Attempt had cost him his Life, had not a stronger Power than all those in his Interests given the last Blow to the Grand Visir Chourlouly's Fortune.

The Sultan had a young Favourite, who has fince governed the Ottoman Empire, and was killed in Hungary in 1716, at the Battle of Peterwardin, gained over the Turks by Prince Eugene of Savoy. His Name was

Coumourgi Ali-Basha. His Birth was much the same with that of Chourlouly. He was the Son of a Coal-heaver, as Coumourgi fignifies: for Coumour is the fame as Coal in Turkish. The Emperor Mahomet, Uncle of Achmet III meeting Coumourgi when he was a Child, in a Forest near Adrianople. was fo struck with his great Beauty. that he fent him to the Seraglio. Rapha, Mahomet's eldest Son and Succeffor, was much taken with him, and Achmet III. made him his Favourite. He had then no other Place but that of Selictar Aga, Sword-bearer to the Crown. His early Youth would not admit of his pretending to the Office of Grand Visir, but yet he had the Ambition to do it. The Swediff Faction could never gain the Inclinations of this Favourite. He was at no time a Friend to King Charles, or any other Christian Prince, or any of their Ministers: but on this Occasion, he served King Charles without designing it. He joined with the Sultana Valide. and the great Officers of the Porte, to contrive Chourlouly's Ruin, whom they all hated. This old Minister, who had long and well ferved his Master. fell a Sacrifice to the Caprice of a Boy, and the Intrigues of a Stranger. He was deprived of his Dignity and his Wealth, his Wife, who was Daughter to the last Sultan Mustapha, was taken from him, and himself banished to Caffa formerly called Theodofia, Crim Tartary. The Seal of the Empire, was given to Numan Couprougly, Grandson to the great Couprougly, who took Candia. This new Visir. was, what Christians misinformed would hardly believe of a Turk, a Man of inflexible Virtue, and a scrupulous. Observer of the Law; and he often opposed Justice to the Sultan's Will. He would not hear of a War against Muscovy, which he looked upon as unjust and unnecessary. But the same Attachment to his Law. which hindered him from waging War against the Czar, contrary to the Faith of Treaties, made him regard the Duty of Hospitality with respect to the King of Sweden. 'The Law. said be to bis Master, forbids you to ! invade the Czar, who has done you ono Injury; but commands you to ' fuccour the King of Sweden, who is an unfortunate Prince in your Do-' minions." He sent his Majesty 800 Purses, every one of which amounted to 500 Crowns, and advised him to return peaceably into his own Dominions, through the Emperor of Germany's Territories, or else in some French Vessels, that were then lying at the Porte of Constantinople, and which M. de Feriolle, the French Embassador at the Porte, offered King Charles, to transport him to Marseilles. King of Sweden, who in his Prosperity had provoked the Emperor of Germamy, and disobliged Lewis XIV, thought it too great a Mortification to owe his Return to France, and that he should run too great a Risk of his Liberty in passing thro the imperial Territories. He rejected with an Air of Disdain both these Ways of returning to his Kingdom, and fent the Visir and M. de Feriolle Word, that he should depend upon the Grand Seignor's Promise, and hoped to re-enter Poland as a Conqueror with an Army of Turks. In the mean Time, while he made his Fire depend upon the Caprice of a Visir, and was forced to put up with the Affronts as well as receive the Favours of the Ottoman Court, all his Enemies took fresh Courage, and invaded his Kingdom.

The Battle of Pultowe was immediately the Signal of a Revolution in Poland. King Augustus returned this ther protesting against his Abdication. and the Peace of Alranstad, and publickly accusing Charles XII. whom he now no longer feared, of Robbery and Cruelty. He imprisoned Finsten and Imof his Plenipotentiaries, who had figned his Abdication, as if in so doing they had exceeded their Orders, and betrayed their Master. His Saxon Troops, that had been the Pretence of his Dethronement, brought him back to Warfaw, attended with most of the Polish Palatines, who having formerly fworn Fidelity to him. had afterwards done the same to Stanislaus, and were come to do it again to Augustus. Siniausky himself came into his Measures, and forgetting his former ambitious Views of making himself King, was content to remain Grand General of the Crown. Flemming, his first Minister, who did not dare to continue in Saxony, for fear of being delivered up as Paikul was. contributed at that Time by his Management, to bring over great part of the Polish Nobility to his Master.

The Pope absolved his People from the Oath of Allegiance they had sworn to Staniflaus: This Step of the Holy Father, seasonably taken and supported by Augustus's Forces, was of no small Weight: It established the Interest of the Court of Rome in Poland, where they had then no Inclination to dispute with the sovereign Pontiss, the chimerical Right of med-ling with the Temporalities of Kings. Every one was ready to submit to Augustus's Authority again, and received, without the least Opposition, an useless Absolution, which the Nuncio did not fail to represent as necessary.

Charles's Power, and the Grandeur of Sweden, were now drawing to their last Period. Above ten crowned Heads had for some Time beheld with Fear and Envy, the Swedish Government extending itself far beyond its natural Bounds. Charles's Missortume, and his Absence, awakened the Interests and Jealousies of all these Princes, which had for a long Season been laid asseep by Treaties, and an Inability to break them.

The Czar, who was more powerful than all of them put together'. making immedialely the best Use of his Victory, took Wibourg, and all Carelia, over-run Finland with his Troops, fat down before Riga, and fent an Army into Poland to affift Augustus in the Recovery of his Throne. This Emperor was at that Time what Charles had been formerly, the Arbiter of Poland and the North. But he consulted only his own Interests; whereas Charles had never any other Views than those of Revenge and Glory. The Swedish Monarch had succoured his Allies. and crushed his Enemies, without infisting upon the least Advantage to himself as the Fruit of his Victories: but the Czar behaved more like a Prince than an Heroe, and would not affift the King of Poland, but upon Condition that Livonia should be delivered up to him; and that this Province, for the Sake of which Augustus had kindled the War, should remain to the Muscovites for ever.

The King of Donmark forgetting the Treaty of Travandal, as Augustus had that of Alranfiad, had from that time Thoughts of making himself Master of the Duchies of Holstein and Bremen, to which he renewed his Pretentions. The King of Pruffia also had a Mind to revive his Title to the Swedish Pomerania. The Duke of Mecklenburgh was provoked to see Sweden Rill in Possession of Wismar, the finest City in his Duchy. This Prince was to marry the Emperor of Muscovy's Niece, and the Czar only wanted a Pretence to establish himfelf in Germany. George Elector of Hanover, wanted likewise to enrich himself with Charles's Spoils. The Bishop of Muniter also would have been glad to make the best of some Pretentions of his, if he had been in a Capacity to do it.

There were about twelve or thirteen thousand swedes who defended Pomerania, and the other Countries which Charles possessed in Germany. Here was to have been the Seat of War. But this Storm alarmed the Emperor and his Allies. For it is a Law of the Empire, that whoever invades one of the Provinces, should be reputed an Enemy to the whole Germanick Body.

But there was a still much greater Difficulty in the Affair. All these Princes, except the Czar, were then in League against Lewis XIV. whose Power had for some Time been as formidable to the Empire as that of King Charles.

Germany, at the Beginning of the Century, found it self hard pressed from the South to the North, between the French and Swedish Armies. French had passed the Danube, and the Swedes the Oder: If their Forces, victorious as then they were, had joined, the Empire had been lost. the same Fatality that ruined Sweden, had also humbled France: However, the Power of Sweden was not exhausted, and Lewis XIV. carried on the War with Vigour, though without Success. Had Pomerania, and the Dutchy of Bremen, been made the Seat of the War, it was to be feared the Empire would be the worle for it. and being weakened on that Side, would be less able to hold out against Lewis XIV. To remove this Inconvenience, the Emperor, the Princes of Germany, Queen Ann of England; and the States General of the United Provinces, concluded at the Hague, about the End of the Year 1709, one of the most singular Treaties that ever was figned. The first visit visit

It was stipulated by these Powers, that the Sear of the War stouds not be in Pomerania, nor any other Country of Germany, but that the Enemies of Charles XII. might attack him everywhere else. The King of Poland and the Czar came themselves into this Treaty, and caused an Article to be inserted, which was as extraordinary as the Treaty itself, viz. that the 12000 Swedes in Pomerania should not depart thence to desend their other Provin-

To secure the Execution of this Treaty, it was proposed to raise an Army for maintaining this imaginary Neutrality, which was to incamp on the Banks of the Oder. A strange 62 and unheard of Contrivance, to levy an Army, in order to prevent a War! Nay, those who were to furnish the Army's Pay, were for the most part very much concerned to bring about the War they pretended to avert. It was, by the Treaty, to consist of the Troops of the Emperor, the King of Prussia, the Elector of Hanover, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Bishop of Munster.

The Event of this Project was such as one might naturally expect. It was not executed. The Princes who were to furnish their Quota for raising an Army, contributed nothing; not two Regiments were formed. There was much Talk of a Neutrality, but no Body observed it; and all the northern Princes who had any Controversy with the King of Sweden, were left at full Liberty to dispute who should have his Spoils.

During these Conjunctures the Czar having quartered his Forces in Lithuonia, and given Orders for carrying on the Siege of Riga, returned to Moscow, ito shew his People a Sight as new as any thing he had yet done in' his Kingdom. It was a Triumph ve ry little inferior to that of the old Romans. He made his Entry into Moscow on the first of January 1710, under seven triumphal Arches erected in the Streets, and adorned with all that the Climate could furnish, and a flourishing Trade, as his Industry had made it, could import. The Procession Began with a Regiment of Guards, followed by the Pieces of Artillery taken? from the Swedes at Lesnow and Pulcowa, each of which was drawn by eight Horses covered with Scarlet housings! reaching down to the Ground. came came the Standards, Kettle-drums and Colours won'at these two Battles, carried by the Officers and Soldiers who had taken them: All these Spoils were followed by the finest Troops of the Czar. After they had filed off, appeared in a Chariot made for that Purpose, the Litter of Charles XII. found in the Field of Battle at Pultowa, all broken to Pieces by two Cannon shot. Behind this Litter marched all the Prifoners two by two, among whom was Count Piper first Minister of Sweden, the famous Marescal Renchild. Count Levenbaup, the Generals Slipenbac, Stackelburgh and Hamilton, and all the Officers and Soldiers who were afterwards dispersed in great Russia. They were immediately followed by the Czar, on the same Horse he rid upon at the Battle of Pultowa, A little behind him appeared the Generals who had their Share in the Success of shis Battle: After them came another Regiment of Guards; and the Waggons loaded with Swedish Ammunition brought up the Rear.

This solemn Procession was attended with the ringing of Bells in Moscow, with the Sound of Drums, Kerrledrums, Trumpets, and an infinite Number of musical Instruments answering each other; with Volleys discharged from 200 Pieces of Cannon, and the Acclamations of 500000 Men, who at every Stop the Czar made in his triumphal Entry cried, God preserve the Emperor our Father.

This deluding Cavalcade augmented the People's Veneration for his Person, and perhaps made him appear greater in their Eyes, than all the real Good he had done them. In the mean Time he continued the Blockade of Riga, and the Generals made themselves Masters of the rest of Livonia, and Part of Finland. At the same Time the King of Denmark came with his intire Fleet to make a Descent upon Sweden, where he landed 17000 Men, whom he lest under the Command of Count Reventlau.

Sweden was at that Time governed by a Regency, composed of some Senators appointed by the King at his Departure from Stockholm. The Senatorial Body, which looked upon the Government as of right belonging to them, was jealous of the Regency, and the State suffered by these Divisions. But upon the first News they received at Stockbolm, after the Battle of Pultowa, viz. That the King was at Bender, in the Hands of the Turks and Tartars, and that the Dones had made a Descent upon Schonen, and taken the Town of Elfingborg, all Jealousies vanished, and they thought of nothing but faving Sweden. There were now very few regular Forces left. notwithstanding Charles had always made his great Expeditions at the Head of small Armies; yet the innumerable Battles he had been engaged in for nine Years together, the constant Necessity he was under of recruiting his Forces. and maintaining his Garrisons, and the flanding Army he was obliged to keep. always in Finland, Ingria, Livonia. Pomerania, Bremen, and Verden: All this had cost Sweden, during the Course of the War, above 250000 Soldiers. and there remained not fo many as 8000 Men of the old Troops, who with the new Forces, were the only Defence of Sweden.

King Charles XI. among several Laws that drew upon him the Charge of Tyranny, had made some that deferved the Thanks of his Country; Particularly he formed a Militia that continues to this Day, and is neither a Charge to the publick Treasury, nor too burdensome to private Persons, and always furnishes the State with Soldiers, without taking the Husbandman from the Plough. The richest Towns or Lordships that formerly did or at present do hold of the Crown, maintain a Trooper at their own Expence. The Peasants of each Village provide a Foot Soldier in proportion to their Circumstances; that is, there must be a certain Estate, suppose of 10 or 12000 Livres, before they can be obliged to fit out a Soldier for the Infantry. He that has but 5 or 6000 Livres, joins with another that has as much; and he that has but 3000, contributes his Share with several more, and all together supply the State with a .Man.

If the Revenue of the whole Village does not amount to more than 10000 Livres, that Village finds but one Man. Upon the Death of a Soldier they that found him supply his Place with another. And thus the Number of the Militia is always the fame, after it has been once settled by the States-general. The Peasants build a House or Cottage for the Soldier they maintain, and affign him and his Family a Piece of Ground, which he is obliged to culti-These Soldiers .who are thus distributed among the Villages have their Rendezvous, at stated Times, in the chief Market Town of the Canton, under the Command of their Officers, who are paid out of the publick Treasury.

In the more populous Countries, each Village has his Corporal, who exercises his Regiment once a Week. The Sergeant, who has a larger Jurisdiction, sees his every five Days, and so by Degrees to the Colonel, who takes a Review of his Regiment every three Months.

Thus was Sweden a Seminary of Soldiers during the Wars of Charles XII. The Nation is born with a Military Genius, and the whole People insensibly received the same Cast of Mind as their King. From one End of the Country to the other nothing was talked of but the prodigious Exploits of Charles and his Generals, and of the old Regiments that fought under them at Narva, Duma, Crassau, Pultusk and Hollofin. From hence the very lowest of the Swedes became animated with a Spirit of Emulation and Glory. and their Tenderness for their King, their Compassion for his Missortunes. and their implacable Aversion to the Danes, gave a new Energy to that Impression. In several other Countries the Peasants are Slaves, or treated as such; but here they make a Figure in the State, are looked upon as Citizens, and form to themselves Sentiments of Honour and Grandeur; fo that, in short, these Forces became in a little Time the best Troops of the North.

General Steinbock, by Order of the Regency, put himself at the Head of 8000 old Troops, and 12000 of the new ones, to go in Pursuit of the Danes, who ravaged all the Country about Elsingborg, and had already put some distant Places under Contribution.

There was not Time to clothe the Militia with military Habits. Qqq 2 Most

Most of these Boors came in their slaxen Frocks, having Pistols tied to their Girdles with Cords. Steinbock, at the Head of this extraordinary Army, came up with the Danes within three Leagues of Elsingborg, on the roth of March, 1710. He was minded to rest his Troops some Days, to intrench himself, and give these new Soldiers Time to be acquainted with the Enemy: but all the Peasants called out to Fight at the very Moment of their Arrival.

· Some Officers who were there, told me, they saw them foam almost to a Man with Rage; to excessive is the national Hatred of the Swedes to the Danes. Steinbock took the Advantage of this Disposition, which, in a Day of Battle, is of as much Service as military Discipline. The Danes were attacked, and one might have feen what perhaps is not to be parallel'd by two more Instances of the like Kind, raw Forces equal in the first Onset the Intrepidity of the old Regiments. Two Regiments of these undisciplined Peafants cut the Regiment of the King of Denmark's Guards in Pieces, and left but ten Men remaining.

The Danes being entirely routed, made their Retreat under the Cannon of Elsingborg. The Passage from Sweden to Zeeland is so short, that the King of Denmark received the same Day the News of his Army's Deseat in Sweden, and sent his Fleet to bring off the Remains of his Troops. The Danes quitted Sweden with Precipitation five Days after the Battle, but being unable to bring away their Horses, and not carring to leave them to the Enemy, they killed them all in the Parts about Elsingborg, and set fire to their Provisions, burning their Corn and Baggage, and Jeaving 4000 wounded at Elfingborg, the greatest Part of whom died by the Insection they received from so many dead Horses, and for Want of Provision, which their own Countrymen deprived them of, to prevent its falling into the Hands of the Swedes.

At the same Time the Peasants of Dalecarlile, having in the midst of their Forests heard say, that their King was Philoner in Turky, fent à Deputation to the Regency at Stackholm, and offered to go at their own Expence. to the Number 20000 Men, to deliver their Master out of the Hands of his Enemies. This Proposal, which, tho' of no Significancy, shewed the Courage and Loyalty of the Propofers, was heard with Pleasure, nonwithstanding it was rejected. did they fail to give the King an Account of it, when they sent him the Particulars of the Battle of Elfingborg.

King Charles received this comfortable News in his Camp at Bender, in July 1710, and in a little Time after another Accident confirmed him in his Hopes.

The Grand Visir Couprougly, who opposed his Designs, was turned out after he had been two Months in the Ministry. Charles the XIIth's little Court, and those who still adhered to him in Poland, gave out that he made and deposed the Visirs, and governed the Tarkish Empire from his Retreat at Bender. But he had no Hand in that Favourite's Ruin. The rigid Probity of the Visir was the only Cause of his Fall. His Predecessor was used to pay the Janisaries not out of the Imperial perial Treasury, but out of such Money as he got by Extortion. Couprougly, on the other Hand, paid them out of the Treasury. Upon this Achmet reproached him with preferring the Interest of the Subject to that of the Emperor. Your Predecessor Chourlouly, said he, could find other Ways and Means to pay my Troops. The Grand Visit answered, If he had the Art to enrich your Highnels by Rapine; it is such a one as I esteem it an Honour to be ignorant of.

The great Secrecy that reigns in the Seraglio, rarely suffers such Discourses to creep abroad. But this was known with Couprougly's Disgrace: That Visus's Freedom did not cost him his Head, because true Virtue often draws Respect even from those who are displeased with it. He had Leave to retire to the Island of Negropour.

After this the Grand Seignor fent to Aleppo for Baltagi Mahomes, Balha of Syria, who had been Grand Visir before Chourlouly. The Baltagi's of the Seraglio, so called from Balta, which signifies an Ax, are Slaves employed to cut Wood for the Use of the Princes of the Blood, and the Sultana's. The Visir had been a Baltagi in his Youth, and had ever since retained the Name, according to the Custom of the Turks, who are not ashamed to take the Name of their first Profession, of their Father, or the Place of their Nativity.

At the Time that Baltagi Mahomes. was a Servant in the Seraglio, he had the good Fortune to do Prince Achmes fome finall Piece of Service, that Prince being then a Priloner of State in the Reign of his Brother Mustapha. Now it is a Custom in the Seraglio.

that the Princes of the Ottoman Blood should have for their Pleasure some Women who are past Child bearing, (which is very early the Case of the Turkish Women) and yet agreeable enough to please. One of these Female Slaves, who had been much beloved by Achmet, he gave in Marriage upon his being made Sultan, to Baltagi Mahomet. This Woman by her Intrigues, made her Husband Grand Visit. Another Intrigue deposed him, and a third made him Visit again.

Baltagi Mahomet had no sooner received the Seals of the Empire, than he found the King of Sweden's Interest prevailing in the Seraglio. The Sultana Valide, Ali Coumourgi the Grand Seignor's Favourite, the Kiflar Aga chief of the black Eunuchs, and the Aga of the Janisaries, were for War against the Czar. The Sultan was determined upon it, and the very first Order he gave the Grand Vifir, was to go and fall upon the Muscovites with 200000 Men. Baltogi Mahomet had never been in the Field, but then he was by no Means an Idiot, as the Swedes out of pure Hatred have reprefented him. He told the Grand Seignor, upon receiving from his Hand a Sabre set with precious Stones, Your Highness knows that I've been brought up to use an Axe and fell Wood, and not to weild a Sword and command Armies: I will endeavour to serve you in the best Manner I am able, but if I fail of Success, remember that I have intreated you not to lay it to my Charge. The Sultan affured him! of his good Will, and the Visir prepared to obey him.

The first Step of the Ottoman Porce upon this Occasion, was to imprison the Muscovite Embassador in the Castle of feven Towers. It is the Custom of the Turks to begin with seizing the Ministers of those Princes against whom they declare War. Tho' ftrict Observers of Hospitality in every Thing else; in this they violate the most facred Law of Nations. And yet it is under a pretence of Equity that they act thus unjustly, imagining or being willing to have it believed, that they never undertake any War but what is just, because consecrated by the Approbation of the Music: Upon this Principle they look upon themselves as armed to chastise the Infringers of Treaties, which they often break themselves, and think the Embassadors of Kings in Enmity with them, are to be punished as Accomplices in the Treachery of their Masters.

To this may be added, the ridiculous Contempt they affect towards Christian Princes and their Embassadors, whom for the most part, they look upon only as Consuls of Merchants. The Han of Crim Tartary, whom we call the Kam, had Orders to be in Readiness with 40000 Tartars. This Prince reigns over Nogai, Bondgiac, part of Circassia, and all the Crim Country known to Antiquity by the Name of Taurica Chersonesus, whither the Greeks carried their Commerce and their Arms, building large Cities there, and whither the Genoese have since penetrated, when they were Masters of the Trade of Europe. In this Counery are to be seen the Ruins of some Grecian Cities, and some Monuments of the Genoese still subsisting in the midst of Ruin and Desolation.

The Kam is by his own Subjects called Emperor, but notwithstanding this grand Tirle, he is a mere Slave of the Porte. The Ottoman Blood, of which the Kams are descended, and the Right they have to the Turkish Empire upon the Extinction of the Grand Signor's Race, makes their Family be respected, and their Perfons formidable, even to the Sultan himself. It is upon this Account that the Grand Signor dares not destroy the Race of the Kams of Tartary; But he hardly ever fuffers any of them to continue upon the Throne to an advanced Age. Their Steps are always watched by the neighbouring Basha's; their Territories incompassed their Inclinations with Janisaries; croffed by the Grand Visir; and their Designs ever suspected. If the Tartars complain of the Kam, the Porte deposes him; if he is beloved by them it is a Crime, for which he is sooner punished than the other. Thus all of them, in a manner, pass from the Crown into Banishment, and finish their Days at Rhodes, which most commonly is both their Prison and their Grave.

The Tartars their Subjects are the greatest Thieves of any People upon the Face of the Earth, and yet, which is hardly to be conceived, they are at the fame time the most hospitable. They travel fifty Leagues out of the Country to fall upon a Caravan, and destroy Towns; but if any Stranger happens to pass thro' their Country. he is not only received and lodged every where, and his Expences borne for him; but whatever Place he comes to, the Inhabitants strive who shall have the Honour to make him their Guest. The Master of the House, his Wife

Wife and Daughters, are ready to quarrel who shall attend upon him. The Scytbians, their Ancestors, transmitted to them this inviolable Regard to Hospitality; and they still retain it, because the small Number of Strangers that travel thro' their Country, and the low Price of all kind of Provisions, makes this Virtue no ways burdensome to them.

When the Tartars go to war in conjunction with the Ottoman Army, they are maintained by the Grand Signor, but receive no other Pay except their Booty. This makes them better at Pillage, than a regular Engagement.

The Kam, gained by the Presents and Intrigues of the King of Sweden, got Leave that the general Rendezvous of the Troops might be at Bender, under the Eyes of Charles XII. to let him see the better, that it was for his Sake the War was undertaken.

The new Visir, Baltagi Mabomet, not being under the same Engagements, would not flatter a foreign Prince so far. He recalled the Order, and this great Army was drawn together partly at Belgrade, and partly at Adrianople.

The Turkish Troops are not at this time so formidable as they have been, when they conquered so many Kingdoms in Asia, Africa, and Europe. Then they triumphed over Enemies less robust and worse disciplined than themselves by Strength of Body, and the Valour and the Number of their Men. But now that the Christians understand the Art of War better, they scarce ever sail to beat the Turks in a pitch'd Battle, even when their Forces are unequal. If the Ostoman Empire has lately gained some Conquests, it is only upon the Republick of Venice, esteemed more wise than warlike, defended by Strangers, and ill supported by the Christian Princes, who are always divided among themfelves.

The Janifaries and Spahi's always make their Attack in Disorder, are never under command nor able to rally. Their Cavalry, which should be excellent, confidering the Goodness and Agility of their Horses, cannot sustain the Shock of the German: Cavalry. The Infantry in like manner, cannot use the Bayonet at the End of the Fusee to Advantage. Befides, the Turks have had no great General among them fince Coprougly, who conquered the Isle of Candia. A Slave brought up in Idleness and the Silence of a Seraglio, made a Visir by Interest, and a General against his Inclinations, headed a raw Army, without Experience and without Discipline, against Muscovite Troops exercised in War for twelve Years together, and proud of having conquered the Swedes.

The Czar in all Appearance, musthave vanquished Baltagi Mahomet, but he committed the same Fault in Regard to the Turks, that the King of Sweden was guilty of in his Case; that is, he too much despised his Enemy. Upon the News of the Turkilb Preparations, he left Moscow; and having given Orders to turn the Siege of Riga into a Blockade, he drew up his Army to the Number of 80000 Men, upon the Frontiers of Poland. With this Army he marched to Moldavia and Walachia; formerly the Country of the Daci, but now inhabited. ted by Greck Christians, Tributaries to the Grand Seignor.

A Greek named Cantemir, made Prince of Moldavia by the Turks, joined the Czar, whom he already looked upon as a Conqueror, and made no Scruple to betray the Sultan of whom he held his Principality, for the Sake of a Christian Prince, from whom he expected much greater Advantages. The Czar entered into a secret Alliance with him, received him into his Army, and marching up the Country, arrived in June 1711, at the northern Side of the River Hierasus, now Pruth, near Jazy the Capital of Moldavia.

As foon as the Grand Visir received the News that Peter Alexiowitz was come thither, he immediately less the Camp at Belgrade, and following the Course of the Danube, proposed to pass that River on a Bridge of Boats near Saccia, in the very same Place where Darius formerly built a Bridge that bore his Name. The Turkish Army marched with so much Expedition, that they soon came in Sight of the Muscovites, the River Pruth being between them.

The Czar, fure of the Prince of Moldavia, little thought the Subjects would fail him. But the Moldavians are often in a different Interest from that of their Master. They liked the Turkish Government, which is never fatal to any but the Grandees, and affects a Lenity to People who are its Tributaries. They seared the Christians, especially the Muscavites, who had upon all Occasions used them barbarously. They brought all their Provisions to the Ottoman Army. The Undertakers who had engaged to surnish the Muscovites with Provision's, performed their Promise to the Grand Visir, tho' it was made to the Czar. The Walathians, whose Country adjoins to that of Moldavia, shewed the same Regard to the Turks; to such a Degree had the Remembrance of former Cruelties alienated their Minds from the Muscovites.

The Czar, thus frustrated of his. Hopes, which perhaps he had inconsiderately entertained, found his Army on a sudden destitute of Provisions, and without Forage. In the mean Time the Turks passed the River that separated them from the Enemy. All the Tartars, according to Custom, swam over it, holding by the Tail of their Horses. The Spahi's which are the Turkish Horse, did the same, because the Bridges were not ready Time enough.

At length the whole Army being. got over, the Visir pitched a Camp. and fortified it with Trenches, It is strange the Czar should not dispute: the Passage of the River, or at least. repair this Fault, by engaging the Turks immediately, instead of giving, them Time to tire out his Army with Fatigue and Famine. But that Prince: feems in this Campaign, to have taken all the Steps that could lead to his He found himself without Provisions, with the River Prub behind him, and near 150000 Turks before him, and about 40000 Tarians continually harassing him on the right-hand and the left. Reduced to this Extremity, he faid publickly, "I am at " least in ay bad a Case as my Bro-" ther Charles was at Pulsowa.

The indefatigable Count Penjatesky, Agent to the King of Sweden, was in the

the Grand Vair's Army with some Poles and Swedes, who all thought the Czar's Ruin inevitable.

As foon as Poniatesky saw that the Armies must infallibly engage, he sent an Express to the King of Sweden, who fet out that Moment from Bender, followed by forty Officers, and enjoying by Anticipation the Pleasure of fighting the Emperor of Muscovy. After many a Loss, and several destructive Marches, the Czar was driven back upon the Prath, and had no Cover lest but some Coevaan de frise, and fome Waggons. A Party of the Janifaries and Spahi's fell immediately upon his Army in that defenceless Condition, but they did it in a tumultuous and disorderly Manner; and were received by the Muscovites with a Resolution, which nothing but Despair and the Presence of their Prince could inspire.

The Turks were twice repulsed. But the Day following, M. Poniatosky advised the Grand Visir to starve out the Muscovite Army, who being destitute of all Provision, would, in a Day's Time, be obliged, together with their Emperor, to surrender at Discretion.

The Czar has fince that Time more than once acknowledged, that in all his Life he never felt so much Uneasiness as he did that Night. He revolved in his Mind all that he had been doing, for so many Years, for the Glory and Good of his Nation; that so many great Designs perpetually interrupted by successive Wars, were now in all Probability going to perish with him, before they were brought to Perfection; that he mult either die with Hunger, or engage near 200000

Men with feeble Troops, less by half the Number than when they first set out; a Cavalry almost dismounted, and the Foot worn out with Famine and Fatigue.

About the Beginning of the Night he called General Czeremetof to him, and gave him a peremptory Order to get every Thing ready by Break of Day, to charge the Turks with Bayonets at the Muzzle of their Muskets.

He gave express Orders also to burn all the Baggage, and that no Officer should keep above one Waggon; that in Case of a Deseat, the Enemy however might not get the Booty they expected.

Having settled every Thing with the General in Order to the Battle, he retired into his Tent full of Grief, and seized with Convulsions, a Distemper he was often troubled with, and which came upon him with double the Violence when he was under any great Uneasiness. He forbid all Persons to enter his Tent in the Night, upon any Pretence whatsoever, not caring to have any Remonstrances made to him against a desperate but necessary Resolution, and much less that any one should be a Witness of the melancholy Condition he was in.

In the mean Time the greatest Part of his Baggage was burnt according to his Order, and all the Army followed the Example, tho' with much Regret; but some buried such of their Things as were most valuable. The General Officers had already given Orders for the March, and endeavoured to inspire the Army with a Courage which themselves wanted: but the Soldiers, quite exhausted with Fatigue, and Hunger, marched without Spirit and without

Hope;

Hope; and yet, to enervate their Courage still more, had their Ears filled with the Shrieks and Cries of Women, of whom there was too great a Number in the Army. Every one expected Death or Slavery to be their Portion the next Morning. What is here related is no Exaggeration, but is literally the Account that was given by some Officers who served in the Army.

There was at that Time in the Muscouite Camp a Woman as extraordinary perhaps as the Czar himself. She was then known only by the Name of Car sbarine. Her Mother was a poor Country-woman, named Erb Magden, of the Village of Ringen in Estbonia. She never knew her Father, but was baptized by the Name of Martha, and registered among the Bastard-Children. The Vicar of the Parish out of pure Charity brought her up till she was fourteeen Years of Age, and then the went to Service at Mariembourg where she lived with a Lutheran Minister, whose Name was Gluk.

At the Age of eighteen the married a Swedish Dragoon in 1702. The Day after her Marriage, a Party of the Swedish Troops were beat by the Muscovites, and the Dragoon who was in the Action never appeared afterwards, nor could she learn whether he was taken Prisoner, nor ever after get any Account of him.

Some Days after she was taken Prifoner herself, and became a Servant to Czeremetof, who gave her to Menzikof, a Man who has experienced the Vicissitudes of Fortune in both Extremes, being from a Pastry Cook's boy made a General and a Prince, and after that deprived of all, and banished to Siberia, where he died overwhemed with Mifery and Despair.

The Czar was at Supper with Prince Menzikof when he first saw her and sell in Love with her. In 1707, he married her privately, not that she used any Artifice to delude him, but because he found in her an astonishing Capacity of forwarding his Designs, and even of continuing them after him. For her Sake he scorned the common Prejudices, by which none but little Souls are influenced, and caused her to be crowned Empress. The same great Capacity which made her Peter's Wise, gave her the Empire after the Death of her Husband.

Upon her Marriage with the Czar, she renounced the Lutheran Religion, in which she was born, for that of Muscovy, and was baptized according to the Rites of the Russam Church, instead of Martha assuming the Name of Catharine, by which she has been known ever since. This Woman being in the Camp at Pruth, held a private Council with the General Officers, and Shaffirof the Vice-Chancellor, while the Czar was in his Tent.

They agreed, that it was necessary to sue for Peace to the Turks, and that the Czar must be persuaded into the Proposal. The Vice-Chancellor wrote a Letter to the Grand Visir, in the Name of his Master, which the Czarina, hotwithstanding the Emperor's Prohibition, carried into the Tent to him; and after much Dispute, having prevailed upon him by her Prayers and Tears to sign it; she took all her Money and Jewels, and every Thing of Value that she had about her, together with what she could borrow of the General Officers, which in all amounted to a confiderable Present, and sent it with the Czar's Letter, to Osman Aga, Lieutenant to the Grand Visir. Mabonet Baltagi answered haughtily with the Air of a Visir and Conqueror, Let the Czar send me his first Minister, and I will see what is to be done. The Vice Chancellor Shaffirof came immediately with a Present in his Hand, which he offered publickly to the Grand Visir. It was considerable enough to let him see they stood in Need of him, but too little for a Bribe.

The Grand Visir's first Demand was, That the Czar, with all his Army, should surrender at Discretion. The Vice Chancellor made answer, that his Master designed to give him Battle within a quarter of an Hour, and that the Muscovites would all be cut in Pieces, rather than submit to such dishonourable Conditions. Ofman seconded Shaffirof with fresh Remonstrances.

Mahomet Baltagi was no Soldier. He knew the Janisaries had been repulsed the Day before, and was easily persuaded by Osman not to part with certain Advantages for the Hazard of a Battle. He immediately granted a Suspension of Arms for six Hours, and in that Time the Terms of the Treaty were agreed upon and settled.

During the Parley there happened an Accident, which shews the Word of a Turk is often more to be depended on than we imagine. Two Italian Gen'tlemen, related to M. Brillo, Lieutenant Colonel of a Regiment of Grenadiers in the Czar's Service, going to look for Forage, were taken by the Tartars, who carried them to their Camp, and offered to fell them to an Officer of the Janisaries. The Turk enraged at such a Breach of the Truce, seized the Tartans, and carried them himself before the Grand Visir, together with the two Prisoners.

The Visir sent the Gentlemen back that Moment to the Czar, and ordered the principal Tartars concerned in carrying them off to be beheaded.

In the mean time the Kam of Tartary opposed the Conclusion of a Treaty, which took from him all Hopes of Pillage. Poniatosky seconded him with very urgent and pressing Reasons. But Osman carried his Point, notwithstanding the Impatience of the Tartar, and the Insinuations of Poniatosky.

The Visir thought it enough for his Master the Grand Signor to conclude an advantageous Peace. He infisted, that the Muscovites should give up Ajopb, burn the Galleys that lay in that Port, and demolish the important Citadels upon the Palus Maotis; that the Grand Seignor should have all the Cannon and Ammunition of those Fortresses; that the Czar should draw off his Troops from Poland, and give no farther Disturbance to the few Cossacks that were under the Protection of the Poles, nor to those that were subject to Turky; and that for the future he should pay the Tartars a Subsidy of 40000 Sequins per Annum, an odious Tribute long fince imposed, but from which the Czar had delivered his Country.

At length the Treaty was going to be figned, without so much as mentioning the King of Sweden: and all that Poniatosky could obtain from the Visir, was to insert an Article, by which the Muscovite should promise not to obstruct or incommode the Return of Charles XII. And which is pretty remarkable, it was stipulated in this Article, that a Peace should be concluded between the Czar and the King of Sweden, if they were so disposed, and could agree upon the Terms of it.

On these Conditions the Czar had Liberty to retreat with his Army, Cannon, Artillery, Colours and Baggage. The Turks surnished him with Provisions, and there was Plenty of every thing in his Camp within two Hours after the signing of the Treaty, which was begun, concluded and signed the 2 ist of July 1711.

Just as the Czar, rescued from the Difficulty he was under, was drawing off with Drums beating, and Ensigns displayed, came the King of Sweden, impatient of fighting, and eager to see his Enemy in his Hands. He had rid Post above fifty Leagues, from Bender to Jazy, and lighting at Count Poniatosky's Tent, the Count came up to him with a sorrowful Countenance, and acquainted him, by what Means he had lost an Opportunity, which perhaps he would never recover.

The King enraged, went directly to the Grand Visir, and with an Air of Indignation upbraided him with the Treaty he had concluded. I have Authority, says the Grand Visir with a calm Aspect, to wage War and to make Peace. But, replies the King, have not you the whole Muscovite Army in your Power? Our Law, says the Visir with great Gravity, commands us to grant our Enemies Peace, when they implore our Mercy. Ah! replies the King in a violent Emotion, does it order you to clap up a bad Treaty when you are in a Capacity to make what Terms you please? Was it not in your Power, to carry the Czar Prisoner to Constantinople?

The Turk finding himself so briskly attacked, answered very coldly, and who shall govern his Empire in his Absence? It is not sit that all Kings should be out of their Kingdoms. Charles replied with a Smile sull of Indignation, and then threw himself down upon a Sopha, and looking upon the Visir with an Air of Resentment and Contempt, he stretched out his Leg towards him, and entangling his Spur in his Robe, which he did by Design, tore it; then rose up immediately, mounted his Horse, and returned to Bender sull of Despair.

Poniatofky continued some time longer with the Grand Visir, to try if he could not prevail upon him by softer Methods to make some better Terms with the Czar; but it being then Prayer time, the Turk without giving one Word of Answer, went to wash and attend his Devotions.

The King of Sweden, at his Return to Bender, found his little Camp and all his Apartment under Water, caused by an Inundation of the Niester. He retired to some Miles distance, near a Village called Varnitza; and as if he had had some secret Presage of the Event that he was afterwards to experience, he built a large House of Stone there, capable, upon Occasion, of sustaining an Assault for some Hours. He furnished it also in a very magnificent Manner, contrary to his Custom, but in order to keep the Turks more in Awe.

Besides this, he built two more, one for for his Chancery, and the other forhis Favourite Grotbusen, who kept a Table at his Expence. While the King was thus employed in building at Bender, as if he had designed to continue always in Turky, Baltagi Mabomet, being more apprehensive than ever of the Intrigues and Complaints of this Prince at the Porte, had fent the Emperor of Germany's Resident to Vienna, to procure a Passage for the King of Sweden through the Hereditary Territories of the House of Austria. This Envoy came back in three Weeks Time, with a Promise from the Imperial Regency, that they would pay Charles XII. all due Honour, and conduct him safely into Pomera-While the German Envoy was executing this Commission at Vienna, the Grand Visir sent three Bashas to the King of Sweden, to acquaint him that he must be gone out of the Territories of the Turkish Empire.

The King, who knew what they came about, lent them Word, that if they ventured to make any Proposal contrary to his Honour, or to fail in their Respects towards him, he would hang them all three up the same Hour. The Basha of Thessalonica, who delivered the Message, disguised the Roughness of his Commission under the most respectful Terms. Charles dismissed the Audience without vouchfafing one Word of Answer; but his Chancellor Mullern, who staid with the three Bashas, signified his Master's Refusal to them in a few Words, which was nothing but what they had already perceived by his Silence.

The Grand Visir was not discouraged; he ordered Ismael Basha, the new Serasquier of Bender, to threaten the King with the Sultan's Resentment, if he did not immediately come to a Refolution. The Serasquier was a Person of a sweet and winning Temper, which had gained him King Charles's good-will, and the Friendship of all the Swedes. The King entered into a Conference with him, but it was only to let him know, that he would not depart till Achmet had granted him two Things, one of which was to punish the Grand Visir, and the other to surnish him with 100000 Men in order to return into Poland at the Head of them.

Baltagi Mahomet was very sensible, that Charles's Stay in Turky was only to ruin him. For this Reason he placed a Guard upon all the Roads from Bender to Constantinople, with Orders to intercept the King's Letters. Besides this he retrenched the Provision, which the Porte allows the Princes to whom she grants an Asylum in her Dominions. That of the King of Sweden's was prodigious, amounting to sive hundred Crowns a Day in Money, besides a vast Excess of every thing that could contribute to maintain a Court in Plenty and Splendor.

As foon as the King heard that the Visir had ventured to retrench his Allowance, he turned to the Steward of his Houshold, and said, You have had but two Tables bitherto, I command you to prepare four to morrow.

Charles the XIIth's Officers had been used to find nothing impossible which their Master ordered: but having neither Money, nor Provision, they were forced to borrow at twenty, thirty, and forty per Cent. of the Officers, Domesticks and Janisaries, who were grown rich by the King's liberality. M.

Fabricius, the Envoy of Holftein, gave all that he had; but these Supplies would not have sufficed for the Space of a Month, if one Motraye a Frenchman, who had been upon a long Voyage in the Levant, and was come to Bender out of Curiosity to see the King, had not offered to go through all the Turkish Guards, to borrow Money in the King's Name at Constantinople.

What Letters he had to carry, he put into the Cover of a Book, having first torn out the Past-board, and pastfed through the midst of the Turks by the Name of an English Merchant, with his Book in his Hand, faying it was his Prayer-book. The Turks are not very suspicious, because not much acquainted with the World. The supposed Merchant arrived at Constantinople with the King's Letters. But the foreign Merchants did not care to venture their Money. One Cooke, an Englishman, was the only Person who could be prevailed upon; and he readily offered the Loan of about 100000 Franks, content to lose them if any Misfortune happened to the King of Sweden, and fure to make his Fortune if that Prince lived.

The French Gentleman had the good Fortune to carry the Money fafe to the Camp at Varnitza, and it came just as they were beginning to despair of it.

In the mean time M. de Poniatofky wrote, and that from the Camp of the Grand Visir, an Account of the Campaign of Pruth, wherein he accused Baliagi Mahomet of Cowardice and Treachery. This Account he entrusted to an old Jinisary enraged at the Visir's Weaknets, and moreover gained by Poniatofky's Presents, and having obtained Permission to leave the Camp, he went and presented the Letter with his own Hands to the Sultan.

Poniatosky set out from the Camp some Days after, and went to the Ottoman Porte to cabal against the Grand Visir as usual.

All Circumstances seemed to favour the Design. The Czar, now at Liberty, was in no Haste to perform his Promises. It is customary for Princes to send golden Keys to the Sultan, when they deliver up any Towns to the Turks. The Keys of Asoph were not come, and the Grand Visir, who was responsible for them, being apprehensive of his Master's Resentment, durst not appear in his Presence.

The old Visir Chourlouly, then in Banishment at Mitylene, thought this a proper Opportunity to deprive Achmet of the Throne, and set up Ibrahim the Son of Soliman, a young Prince who was at that time a Prisoner of State in the Seraglio, together with his Coufin Mahmoud.

To bring about this Design, it was necessary that Mahomet Baltagi should be prevailed uoon to endeavour to make the Sultan satisfied with the Treaty stipulated with the Czar, and that Baltagi should march by directly up to Constantinople with the Janisaries.

Mahomet had no Inclination to any rash and hazardous Enterprizes; so the old Visir applied himself to Osman Aga his Lieurenant, who entirely governed him. But the Letters being intercepted Chourlouly and Osman were beheaded, which is reckoned an infamous Punishment in Turky, and their Heads were thrown into the Hall of the Divan. Among O/man's Treatures were found the Czarina's Ring, and 20000 Pieces of Gold in Saxon, Polish and Muscovite Coin.

As to Baltagi Mabonet, he was banished, for having been chosen to be the Instrument of Chourlouly and Ofman's Plot, tho' he never had any such Intention. Lemnas was appointed for the Place of his Exile, and there he died three Years after. The Grand Seignor did not seize upon his Estate at his Death, because he did not die rich; which may serve for a Proof, that the Czar had not bought his Peace at an immense Price, as it was reported in Europe.

To this Grand Visir succeeded Jussuf, that is Foseph, whose Fortune was no less singular than that of his Predeceffor's. He was by Birth a Muscovite. and being taken Prisoner by the Turks at fix Years of Age, together with his Family, had been fold to a Janisary. He was long a Servant in the Seraglio. but in Time became the fecond Person in the Empire where he had been a Slave. But he was only the Shadow of a Minister. The young Selistar Ali Coumourgi raised him to this suppery Post, in Hopes of filling it himself; and Jussuf his Creature had nothing else to do, but to set the Seal of the Empire to what the Favourite defired. The Politicks of the Ottoman Court. feemed to take a new turn in the beginning of this Visir's Ministry. Czar's Plenipotentiaries, who resided at Constantinople both in the Quality of Ministers, and also as Hostages, were better treated than ever. The Grand Visir confirmed the Peace of Pruib with them. But that which mortified the King of Sweden more than any other Circumstance, was the Account which he received, that the secret Alliance made at Constantinople with the Czar, was effected by the Mediation of the English and Dutch Embassations.

Constantinople, after Charles's Retreat to Bender, was become what Rome has often been, the Center of the Negotiations of Christendom. Count Defalleurs, the French Embassador at the Porte, was employed in supporting the Interests of Charles and Staniflaus: the Emperor of Germany's Minister in apposing them. The Swedish and Massowite Factions classed, as those of France and Spain have long done at the Court of Rome.

England and Holland appeared as Neuters, but were not so. The new Trade which the Czar had opened at Petersburgh, had an Influence on the Views of those two trading Nations.

The English and Dutch are always for the Prince that favours their Traffick most, and the Czar's was then a very advantageous Branch of Trade; so that it is no wonder the English and Dutch Ministers should operate privately for him at the Porte. One of the Conditions of this new Alliance was, that Charles should be fent immediately out of the Turkish Dominions. Perhaps the Czar was in Hopes of feizing his Person upon the Road, or else he thought Charles less formidable at Home than in Turky, where he was always ready to raise the Octoman Arms against the Russian Empire.

The King of Sweden was perpetually foliciting the Porte to fend him back thro' Poland with a numerous

Army.

Army. The Divan indeed were determined to fend him back, but it was only with a Guard of feven or eight thousand Men, not as a King they were disposed to succour, but as a Guest they were desirous to be rid of. With this View Sultan Achmet wrote him the following Letter.

Most powerful among the Kings that worship Jesus, Redressor of Wrongs and Injuries, and Protector of Right in the Ports and Republicks of South and North, shining in Majesty, Lover of Honour and Glory, and of our sublime Porte, Charles King of Sweden, whose Enterprizes may God crown with Success.

A S soon as the most illustrious Achmet, formerly Chiaoux Pashi, shall have the Honour to deliver you this Letter, adorned with our Imperial Seal, be perswaded and convinced of the Truth of our Intentions therein, viz. That the we had designed to send our ever-victorious Army against the Czar a second Time, yet that Prince, to avoid our just Resentment at bis delaying the Execution of the Treaty concluded on the Banks of Pruth, and renewed again at our sublime Porte, baving surrender'd into our Hands the Castle and City of Asoph, and baving endeavoured by the Mediation of the English and Dutch Ambassadors, our ancient Allies, to cultivate a lasting Peace with us, we have granted his Request, and delivered bis Plenipotentiaries, who remain with us as Hoftages, our Imperial Ratification, baving first received bis from their Hands.

We have given our inviolable and salutary Orders to the most bonourable and valiant Delvet Gherai, Han of Boudgiak in Crim Tartary, Noghai and Circassia, and to Ismael our fage Counsellor and noble Serasquier of Bender, (whom God preserve and augment their Magnificence and Wisdom) for your Return thre' Poland, according to your first Design, which has again been laid before us in your Name. You must prepare therefore to set forward the next Winter, under the Guidance of Providence, and with an bonourable Guard, to return to your own Territories, taking care to pass thro' Poland in a peaceable and friendly Manner.

You shall be provided with every Thing necessary for your Journey by my sublime Porte, as well Money as Men, Horses and Waggons. But we advise and exhort you above all things, to give the sullest and most express Orders to all the Swedes and other Persons in your Retinue, not to make any Havock, or to be guilty of any Action that may either directly or indirectly tend to break this Peace and Alliance.

Hereby you will preserve our good Will, of which we shall endeavour to give you as great and frequent Proofs as we shall have Opportunities. The Troops designed to attend you, shall receive Orders agreeable to our Imperial Intentions in this Particular.

Given at our sublime Porte of Conftantinople, the 14th of the Month Rebyul Eureb, 1124, which answers to the 19th of April, 1712.

wrote the Sultan Word, that he should always acknowledge the Favours his Highness had heaped upon him; but he added, that he thought the Sultan too just to send him away with no other Guard than that of a slying Camp, into a Country already over-run with the Czar's Troops. Indeed the Emperor of Muscovy, notwithstanding he was obliged by the first Article of the Treaty of Pruth to draw all his Forces out of Poland, had sent fresh ones thither; and it seems strange the Grand Seignor should know nothing of it.

But the bad Policy and Vanity of the Porte, in suffering the Christian Princes to have their Embassadors at Constantineple; and never keeping so much as a single Agent in any Christian Court gives the latter an Opportunity of penetrating into, and sometimes of directing the most secret Resolutions of the Sultan, and occasions the Divan to be always ignorant of the most publick Transactions in the Christian World.

The Sultan shut up in the Seraglio among his Women and his unuchs, sees only with the Eyes of the Grand Visir. That Minister, as inaccessible as his Master, taken up with the Intrigues of the Seraglio, and having no Correspondence abroad, is for the most part imposed upon himself, or deceives the Sultan, who deposes or orders him to be strangled for the first Offence, in order to chuse another as ignorant or as treacherous as the former, who behaves like his Predecessors, and falls as soon as they.

Such, for the most part, is the Negligence and Inactivity of this Court, that if the Christian Princes were to join in a League against the Porte, their Fleets would be at the Dardanelles, and their Army at the Gates of Adrianople, before the Turks could think of putting themselves in a Posture of Desence. But the different Interests that divide Christendom, will preserve that People from a Fate, for which they seem at present to be ripe by their Want of Policy, and their Ignorance in War and maritime Assairs.

Achmet was so little acquainted with what passed in Poland, that he sent an Aga to see whether the Czar's Forces were still there or not. Two Secretaries of the King of Sweden, who understood the Turkish Language, accompanied the Aga, in order to confront him in Case of a salse Report.

This Aga saw the Forces with his own Eyes, and gave the Sultan a true Account of the Matter. Achmet in his Rage was going to strangle the Grand Visir; but the Favourite who protected him, obtained his Pardon, and kept him some time longer in the Ministry.

The Muscovites were openly protected by the Visir, and underhand by Ali Coumourgi, who had changed Sides. But the Sultan was so provoked; the Infraction of the Treaty was so manifest, and the Janisaries, who often make the Ministers, Favourites and Sultans themselves tremble, called out so loudly for War, that no body in the Seraglio durst offer at a more moderate Opinion.

The Grand Seignor immediately committed the Muscovite Embassadors, already as much used to go to Prison, as an Audience to the seven Towers.

War was declared afresh against the Czar, the Horse-tails displayed, and Orders given to all the Bashas to raise an Army of 200000 fighting Men. The Sultan himself quitted Constantinople, and fixed his Court at Adrianople, in order to be pearer the Seat of the War.

In the mean time a folemn Embassy from Augustus and the Republick of Poland to the Grand Seignor was upon the Road at Adrianople. At the Head of this Embassy was the Palatine of Massovia with a Retitue of above 300 Persons.

These were all seized and imprisoned in the Suburbs of the City. Never was the Swedish Party suller of Hopes than upon this Occasion: but these great Preparations came to nothing and all their Expectations were disappointed.

If a publick Minister of great Wish dom and Fore fight, then residing at Constantinople, is to be credited, young Coumourgi had other Things in his Head besides hazarding a War with the Czar to gain a desert Country. He had Thoughts of taking Peloponinesus, now called the Marsa, from the Venetians, and making himself Master of Hungary.

To put his great Designs in Execution, he wanted nothing but the Office of Prime Visir, for which he was yet thought too young. In this View it was of more Importance to him to be the Czar's Ally, than his Enemy. It was neither his Interest nor his Inclination to keep the King of Sweden any longer, much less to talke an Army of Turks for him. He was not only for sending that Prince away, but also declared openly, that no Christian Minister ought hereafter to be permitted to relide at Constantinople: that the common Embassadors were only honourable Spies, who corrupted or betrayed the Visirs, and had too long influenced the Intrigues of the Seraglio; that the Franks souled at Pera, and in the Towns upon the Levant, were Merchants, who had Oceasion for a Consulonly, and not an Embassador. The Grand Visir, who owed both his Dignity; and his Life to the Favourite, and was belides afraid of him, to complied with wishitentions, and the more readily, because he had sold himself to the Muscovites, and hoped to be revenged of the King of Sweden, who would have ruined him. The Mufri, Ali Commourgi's Creature; was also a Slave to his Humour. He had given his Vote for a War against the Czar, when the Favourite was on that Side of the Question: but as foon as this young Man schanged his Opinion, he declared sozialt it as an unjust Motion. Thus the Army was scarce raifed, when they hearkened to Propofals; for an Accommodation. The Vice-Chancellor Shafforof and young Czeremetoff, the Czar's Plenipotentiasies and Hollages at the Porte, promiled after feveral Negotiations, that their Mafter .. should draw this Eroops sour of Poland and a sound of the

The Grand Visit, who was sensible the Czar would not execute this Treaty, was resolved however to sign it; and the Sultan, content with giving Laws to the Muscarites, tho only in Appearance, continued still as Adrianople. Thus, in the Space of less than fix Months, Reace was ratified with the Czar, then War declared, and extensions Peace renewed again.

The main Article in all these Treaties related to the Removal of the King of Sweden. The Sultan would not injure his dwn Honour and that of the Ottoman Empire, so far as to expose. the King to the Danger of being taken upon the Road by his Enemies. It was stipulated; that he should be sent -away, but on Condition that the Ema baffadors of Poland and Muscowy should be responsible for the Security of his Person; and those Embassadors swore in the Name of their Masters, that neil ther the Czar, - nor King! Augustus, should molet him in his Passage, and Charles on the other hand was not to endeavour to raife any Commotions in Poland. The Divan having thus determined Charles's Fase, Imael Serals quier of Bender repaired to Karnissa, where the King was encamped, hand acquainted him with the Refolutions of the Porte, giving him to understand in a civil Manner, that there was no Time to delay, but that he must be of सेस रिवाल क्रिक्स क्षेत्रीयही इंस्टर साथ इंग्लाइ

Charles made no other Artwel than this, that the Grand Seignor had programed him an Army, and mot a Guard; and that Kings ought to keep their Word.

In the mean time General Flaming, King Augustus's Minister and Favous tite, maintained a private Correspondence with the Kam of Tartam and the Serasquier of Bender. A German Colonel, whose Name was la Mare, had more than one Journey from Bender to Dresdon, to carry Messages backlward and sorward between the Kam and Fleming; and Sing Augustus had several Times been heard to say, in speaking of Charles, I keep my Bear tied at Bender.

At this very Time the King of Sweden caused a Courier sent from Fleming to the Tartarian Prince, to be feized upon the Frontiers of Walachia. Letters were carried to him and decyphered. There appeared plain Marks of a Correspondence between the Tara tars and the Court of Dresden; but the Terms were so general and ambiguous. that it was difficult to fay, whether King Augustus's Design was to draw off the Turks: from the Swedish Party, on to perfuade the Kam to deliver up Charles ito his Saipne las he attended him for the Road to Poland. : Tim hard to conceive, that so generous a Prince as Augustus, for the Sake of scizing the King of Sweden's Person. would venture the Lives of his Embassadors, and 300 Rolish Gentlemen detained at Adrianuple, as Hostages for the Security of Charles, A. 2.3 mg/ -> On the other Hand, Fleming; abfolute over his Master, was known for a Man of but loofe Principles, and ome that scrupled nothing. The King of Souden's Treatment of Augustus had been fuch, as might be thought an Excuse for any Method of Revenge, And if the Court of Dresden could buy Charles of the Kam of Tariary, they mightobelieve sitting hard Matter to purchase the Liberty of the Palish Hostages at the Oxoman Porte! These Reasons were banded between the King, Mullern his Chancellor, and Geotbuten his Favourite. They read the Letters again and again, and the unhappy Situation they were in increafing their Suspicions, they resolved to believe the worst. -: Some Days after the King, was confirmed in his Suspicions by the precipitate Departure of Count Sapieba, who had fled to him for Refuge, and now left him abruptly in order to go for Poland, and there throw himself into the Arms of Augustus. Upon any other Occasion he would have looked upon Sapieba only as a Malecontent, but at this nice Juncture, he made no Scruple to believe him a Traytor. The repeated Instances that had been made to him to be gone, raised his Suspicions to Certainty. The Politivenels of his Temper, joined to all these Probabilities, made him continue firm in the Opinion, that there was a Defign to betray him, and deliver him up to his Enemies, notwithstanding the Plot has never yet been proved.

He might be mistaken in thinking King Augustus had made a Bargain with the Tartars for his Person; but he was much more so in depending upon the Assistance of the Ottoman Court. But be that as it will, he refolved to gain Time.

He told the Bisha of Bender, that he could not go till he was in a Condition to pay his Debts. For the his Pention had for a long Time been regularly paid, his Generosity had always forced him to borrow. fha asked him, how much he wanted? The King answered at a venture, a thousand Purses; which amounts to 1500000 Livres of French Money full The Basha wrote to the Weight. Porte about it; and the Sultan instead of 1000 Purses, granted him 1200, which he fent to the Basha with the sollowing Letter.

The Grand Signor's Letter to the Bafha of Bender.

HE Design of this Imperial Letter is to let you know, that upon. your Representation and Request, and upon that of the right noble Delvet-Gherai Han, to our sublime Porte, our Insperial Munificence bas granted the King of Sweden a thousand Purses, which shall be sent to Bender under the Care and Custody of the most illustrious Mahomet Basha, formerly Chiaoux Pachia to remain in your Hands till such Time as the King of Sweden fets out, whose Steps God direct, and then to be given him with two hundred Purses more, as an Overplus of our Imperial Liberality beyond what he desires.

As to the Rout of Poland, which he is resolved to take, you and the Han, who are to attend him, shall be eareful to take such prudent and wise Maasures, as may, during the subole Passage, prevent the Troops under your Command, and those of she King of Sweden, from committing any Havock, or doing any Thing that may be thought a Violation of the Peace subsisting between our sublime Porte, and the Kingdom and Republick of Poland, so that the King of Sweden may go as a Friend under our

By doing this, (which you are to defire of him in positive Ferms) he will neceive all the Honour and Respect that is due to his Majesty from the Poles, as we have been assured by the Embassaders of King Augustus and the Republick, who also on this Condition have offered themselves and several others of the Polish Nahility, if required, as Hostages for the Security of his Passage, Protession.

At the Time the you and the right noble Delvet Gherai shall agree upon for the March, you shall put yourself at the Head of your brave Soldiers, among whom whom shall be the Tartars, with the Han at the Head of them, and shall conduct the King of Sweden and his Men.

And may it please the only God, the Almighty, to direct your Steps and theirs. The Basha of Aulis shall continue at Bender, with a Regiment of Spabi's and another of Janisaries, to defend it in your Absence. Now by following our Imperial Orders and Intentions in all these Points and Articles, you will deserve the Continuance of our Imperial Favour, as well as the Praise and Recompense due to all such as observe ibem.

Given at our Imperial Residence at Constantinople the 2d Day of the Month Cheval, 1124 of the Hegira.

Before the Grand Seignor's Answer arrived, the King had written to the Porte, to complain of the supposed Treachery of the Kam. But the Passages were well guarded, and the Ministry was against him, so that his Letters never came to the Sultan. Nay. the Visir would not suffer M. Desaleurs to come to Adrianople, where the Porte then was, lest that Minister, who was the King of Sweden's Agent, should endeavour to disconcert their Design of sending him away.

Charles enraged to see himself in a manner hunted out of the Grand Seignor's Territories, resolved not to stir a

Step.:

- He might have defired to return thro' the German Territories, or take Ship at the Black Sea in Order to go to Marseilles through the Mediterranean. But he chose rather to ask nothing, and wait the Event.

When the 1200 Purses were arrived, his Treasurer Grotbusen, who by residing so long in Turky had learnt to speak the Language, went to wait upon the Basha without an Interpreter, in Hopes to get the 1200 Purses from him: and afterwards to form some new Intrigue at the Porte; falfly imagining, as they always did, that the Swedish Party would at length arm the Ottoman Empire against the Czar.

Grotbusen told the Basha, that the King's Equipages could not be got ready without Money. But we, says the Basha, shall defray all your Expences. Your Master will be at no Charge, while he continues under my Protection.

Grosbusen replied, that the Difference between the Turkish Equipages, and those of the Franks was so great, that they were under a Necessity of applying to the Swedish and Polish Artificers at Varnitza.

He affured him that his Master was willing to go, and that this Money would facilitate and hasten his Departure. The too credulous Basha gave him the 1200 Purses, and within a few Days came and defired the King in a very respectful Manner to give Orders for their departing.

But he was extremely surprized, when the King told him he was not ready to go, and that he wanted a thousand Purses more. The Basha, confounded with this Answer, was speechless for some Time, and then went to a Window, where he was seen to shed some Tears. Afterwards, turning to the King, I shall lose my Head, says he, for having obliged your Majesty. I have given you the 1200 Purses against the express Order of my Sovereign. With these Words he he took his Leave; and was going away full of Grief.

The King stopped him, and told him he would make an Excuse for him to the Sultan. Ah! replies the Turk. as he was going out. My Master can punish Faults, but not excuse them.

Ismael Basha went to acquaint the Kam of Tartary with the News. The Kam having received the same Order with the Basha, not to suffer the 1200 Purses to be delivered before the King's Departure, and having confented to the Delivery of them, was as apprehensive of the Grand Seignor's Resentment as the Basha himself. They wrote both of them to the Porte to clear themselves, and protested that they had not parted with the 1200 Purses, but upon a solemn Promise made to them by the King's Minister, to be gone immediately. And they intreated his Highness not to impute the King's Refusal to their Disobedience.

Charles perfifting in the Notion that the Kam and the Basha defigned to deliver him up into the Hands of his Enemies, ordered M. Funk, His Envoy at the Ottoman Court, to lay his Complaints against them before the Grand Seignor, and to alk for 1000 Purses more. His extreme Generosity, and the little Account he made of Money, hindred him from feeing that there was fomething base and mean in this Proposal. 'But he did it with a View to be refused, and that he might have a fresh Pretence for not departing. But a Man must be reduced to strange Extremities, before he can stand in need of such Artifices. vari, his Interpreter, a crafty enterprizing Man, carried his Letter to ly guarded.

Funk was forced to deliver this dangerous Message; and all the Answer he received was to be clapt up in Prifon. The Sultan, in a Passion, called an extraordinary Divan, and, which . is very rarely done, spoke himself upon the Occasion. His Speech, according to the Translation then made of it, was as follows:

I fcarce ever knew the King of Sweden but by his Defeat at Palsowa, ' and the Request he made to me to grant him a Sanctuary in my Empire. I have not, I believe, any need of him, nor any reason to love or sear him; yet, without consulting any other Motives than the Hospitality of a Mussulman, and my own Generollty, which theds the Dew of its Favours upon the great as well as the little, upon Strangers as well as my own Subjects, I have received and affifted him, his Ministers, Offificers and Soldiers in every Respect, and for three Years and a half have never held my Hand from loading f him with Presents.

I have granted him a very confiderable Guard to conduct him into his own Country. He has asked for 1000 Purses to defray some Expences, though I pay them all: Instead of 1000 I have granted him 1200. After getting these out of the Hands of the Serasquier of Bender, he de-* fires 1000 more, and refutes to go, under a Pretence that the Guard is too little, whereas it is but too large to pass through the Country of a Friend and Ally.

" I ask you then, whether it be a ' Breach Breach of the Laws of Hospitality to send this Prince away, and whether foreign Princes ought to accuse me of Cruelty or Injustice, in case I should be obliged to make him go by Force?" All the Divan answersed, that the Grand Seignor might lawfully do what he had said.

The Musti declared, that the Mustulmans are not bound to Hespitality towards Insidels, much less towards she ungrateful, and he granted his Fessa, a kind of Mandate, which for the most part accompanies the important Orders of the Grand Seignor. These Fessa's are revered as Uracles, tho' the Persons from whom they come, are as much the Sultan's Slaves as any others,

The Order and the Fetfa were carried to Bender by the Boulouk Imraoun, Grand Master of the Horse, and a Chiagus Basha, first Usher. The Basha of Bender received the Order at the Kamis, from whence he went immediately to Varnissa, to know whether the King would go away in a friendly Manner, or force him to execute the Sultan's Orders.

Charles XII. not used to this threatning Language, could not command his Temper. Obey your Master, says he to the Basha, if you dare, and be gone out of my Presence. The Basha went off in a Rage, with a full Gallop, contrary to the manner of the Turks; and meeting Fabricias by the Way, he called out to him without stopping, the King won't hearken to Reasons you'll see strange Things presently. The same Day he discontinued the Supply of the King's Provisions, and removed the Guard of Janisaries. He sent also to the Poles and Cossaks at Varnissa, to let them know, that if they had a Mind to have any Provisions, they must leave the King of Sweden's Camp, and come and put themselves under the Protestion of the Porte at Bender. They all obeyed, and left the King, with only the Officers of his Houshold, and 300 Swedes, to cope with 26000 Tartars and Turks, and now there was no more Provision in the Camp either for Man or Horse.

Immediately the King gave Orders to shoot twenty of the fine Arabian Horses the Grand Seignor had sent him, saying, I will neither have their Provisions nor their Horses. This made a noble Feast for the Tartars, who, as all the World know, think Horse stesh delicious Feeding. In the mean time the Turks and Tartars invested the little Camp on all Sides.

The King, with all the Calmness in the World, appointed his 300 Swedes to make regular Fortifications, and worked at them himself. His Chancellor, Treasurer, Secretaries, Valet de Chambre's, and all his Domesticks, put their Hands to the Work. Some barricadoed the Window, others fasten'd Beams behind the Doors in the Form of Buttress.

When the House was well barricadoed, and the King had taken a View of his supposed Fortifications, he sat calmly down to Chess with his Favourite Grotbusen, as if every thing had been perfectly safe and secure. It happened very luckily, that Fabricius, the Envoy of Holstein, did not lodge at Varnitsa, but at a Village between Varnitsa and Bender, where Mr. Jeffreys, the English Envoy to the King of Sweden, resided also. The two Mini-

Ministers seeing the Storm ready to break out, took upon them to be Mediators between the Turks and the King. The Kam, and especially the Basha of Bender, who had no Inclination to offer any Violence to the Monarch, were glad to receive the Offers the two Ministers made them. They had two Conferences together at Bender, at which the Usher of the Seraglio, and the Grand Master of the Horse, who brought the Sultan's Order and the Musti's Fetsa, assisted.

Monsieur Fabricius declared to them, that his Swedish Majesty had great Reason to believe they designed to deliver him to his Enemies in Poland.

The Kam, and Basha, and the rest, laying their Hands upon their Heads, called God to witness, that they detected such a horrible Piece of Treachery, and would lose the last Drop of their Blood, rather than fuffer the least Failure of Respect to the King in Poland. They added. that they had the Muscovite and Polish Embassadors in their Hands. whose Lives should answer for the least Affront that should be offered the King of Sweden. In a word, they complained bitterly that the King should entertain such injurious Sufpicions of Persons, who had so generoufly received, and so handsomely treated him.

And though Oaths are often the Language of Treachery, M. Fabricius suffered himself to be persuaded by these Barbarians. He thought he perceived such an Air of Truth in their Protestations, as Falshood never imitates but impersectly. He was sensible there was a Correspondence between the Kam of Tartary and King Augustus; but yet he remained convinced, that the Delign of that Negotiation was only to force Charles to retire out of the Territories of the Grand Seignor. But whether Fabricius was mistaken or not, he affured them, he would represent to the King the Injustice of these Jealousies; but do you intend to force him to be gone, adds he? Yes, fays the Basha, such is our Master's Order. Then he defired them to consider once again, whether that Order was to spill the Blood of a crowned Head? Yes, replies the Kam with some Warmth, if that crowned Head disobeys the Grand Seignor in his own Dominions.

In the mean time every thing heing ready for the Assault, Charles's Death seemed inevitable: but the Sultan's Command being not positively to kill him in case of Resistance, the Basha prevailed with the Kam to let him send an Express that Moment to Adrianople, where the Grand Seignor then was, to receive his Highness's last Orders.

M. Jefferys and M. Fabricius having procured this little Respite, ran to acquaint the King with it. They came with that Expedition which. People usually make who bring good News, but were received very coldly: He called them voluntary, and unauthorized Mediators, and still insisted that the Sultan's Order and the Musti's Fetsa were forged, because they had sent for fresh Orders to the Porte.

The English Minister withdrew, refolving to concern himself no more with the Affairs of so inflexible a Prince. M. Fabricius, beloved by the King, and more used to his Humour than the English Minister, staid with him, in Order to conjure him not to hazard a Life so precious upon so unnecessary an Occasion.

The King, instead of an Answer, shewed him his Fortifications, and defired him to be a Mediator only so far as to procure him Provisions. Leave was easily obtained from the Turks to let Provisions pass to the King's Camp, till such Time as the Courier should arrive from Adrianople.

The Kam himself had forbid his Tartars, the always impatient of Pillage, to make any Attempt upon the Swedes till a new Order came, so that Charles went sometimes out of his Camp with forty Horse, and rode throthe Midst of the Tartarian Troops, who very respectfully left him a free Passage: nay he marched directly up their Lines, and instead of resisting, they opened to him. At length the Grand Seignor's Order being come, to put to the Sword all the Swedes that should make the least Resistance, and not to spare the Life of the King; the Basha had the Civility to shew Fabricius the Order, to the Intent that he might try his utmost to prevail upon Charles. ecius went immediately to acquaint him with this bad News. Have you feen the Order you speak of? says the King. I have, replies Fabricius. Tell them then, fays the King, that this Order is a second Forgery of theirs, and that I will not go, Fabricius fell at his Feet, put himself in a Passion, and reproached him with his Obstinacy; but all was to no Purpole. Go back to your Turks, says the King to bim smiling, if they attack me, I know how to defend my felf. . 65

The King's Chaplains also fell upon their Knees before him, conjuring him not to expose the wretched Remains of Puliowa, and, above all, his own facred Person to certain Death; adding besides, that Resistance in this Case was a most unwarrantable Action, and that it was a Violation of the Laws of Hospitality, to resolve to continue with Strangers against their Will, who had fo long and generously supported The King, who had shewed no Resentment against Fabricius, grew warm upon this. Occasion, and told his Priests, that he took them to pray for him, and not to give him Advice.

General Hord and General Dardorff, whose Opinion it had always been not to venture a Battle, which in the Consequence must prove fatal, shewed the King their Breasts, covered with Wounds they received in his Service; and affuring him, that they were ready to die for him, begged that it might at least be upon a more necessar ry Occcasion. I know, says the King, by your Wounds and my own, that we have fought valiantly together. You have hitherto done your Duty; do it again now. There was nothing more to be said; they must obey. Every one was ashamed not to court Death with the King. His Majesty being prepared for the Assault; entertained himself in secret with the Pleafure and Honour of sustaining the Shock of a whole Army with 300 Swedes: He appointed every Man to his Post. His Chancellor Mullern, the Secretary Empreus, and his Clerks, were to defend the Chancery house. Baron Fief, at the Head of the Officers of the Kitchen, was at another Ttt ther Post. The Grooms of the Stables and the Cooks had another Place to guard. For with him every Man was a Soldier. He rode from his Fortiscations to his House, promising Rewards to every body, creating Officers, and declaring, that he would make the lowest of his Servants Captains, if they behaved with Courage in the Engagement.

It was not long before they faw the Turks and Tartars advancing in Order of Battle to attack the little Fortress, with ten Pieces of Ordnance and two Mortar pieces. The Horse-tails waved in the Air, the Clarions founded, the Cries of Alla, Alla, were heard on all Sides. Baron Grotbusen took Notice, that the Turks did not mix any abusive Language against the King in their Cries, but only called him Demir Bash, which signifies Head of Iron, and resolved that Moment to go alone. and unarmed out of the Fortifications. He advanced up to the Line of the Tanisaries, who had almost all of them received Money from him. 'Ah, what my Friends! says be to them in their own Language, are you come to mas-' facre 300 desenceles Swedes? You brave Janisaries, who have pardoned 100000 Muscovites upon their crying Amman, (i. e. Pardon) to you: Have you forgot the Kindness you have received from us? And would you af-' sassinate that great King of Sweden, • whom you loved fo much, and who has been fo generous to you? My ' Friends, he asks but three Days, " and the Sultan's Orders are not fo " strict as you are made to believe."

These Words produced an Effect which Grothusen himself did not expect. The Janisaties swore upon their Beards, they would not attack the King, and that they would give him the three Days he demanded. In vain was the Signal given for the Affault. The Janisaries far from obeying, threaten to fall upon their Leaders, if three Days were not granted to the King of Sweden. They came to the Basha of Bender's Tent in a Body, crying out that the Sultan's Orders were forged. To this unexpected Insurrection the Basha had nothing to oppose but Patience.

He made as if he was pleased with the generous Resolution of the Janisaries, and ordered them to retreat to Bender. The Kam of Tartary, who was a hot forward Man, would have given the Assault immediately with his Troops; but the Basha, who did not design the Tartars alone should have the Honour of taking the King, when he perhaps might be punished for the Disobedience of his Janisaries, persuaded the Kam to wait till the next Day.

The Basha returning to Bender, assembled all the Officers of the Janisaries and the oldest Soldiers, and both read to them, and shewed them the positive Order of the Soltan, and the Musti's Fetfa.

Sixty of the oldest of them, with venerable grey Beards, who had received a thousand Presents from the King's Hand, offered to go in Person to him, and intreat him to put himself into their Hands, and permit them to serve him as Guards.

The Basha consented to it; for there was no Expedient he would not try, rather than be forced to kill the King. Accordingly these sixty old Soldiers went the next Morning to Varnitsa, having nothing in their Hands but long white Staffs, the only Arms of the Janisaries, when they are not going to fight: for the Turks look upon it as a barbarous Custom among the Christians to wear Swords in Time of Peace, and enter armed into their Churches and the Houses of their Friends.

They addressed themselves to Baron Grothusen and Chancellor Mullern: They told them, they were come with a Design to serve as faithful Guards to the King; and that if he pleased, they would conduct him to Adrianople, where he might speak to the Grand Seignor in Person. While they were making this Proposal, the King read the Letters that were brought from Conftantinople, and which Fabricius, who could not fee him any more, had conveyed privately to him by a Janisary. These Letters were written by Count Poniatofky, who could neither ferve him at Bender nor Adrianople, having been detained at Constanzinople, by Order of the Porte, from the Time of the imprudent Demand of 1000 Purses. He told the King, that the Sultan's Orders to feize or massacre his Royal Person, in case of Resistance, were but too true; that the Sultan indeed was imposed upon by his Ministers; but the more he was imposed upon in this Affair, the more he would be obeyed; that he must submit to the Times, and yield to Necessity: that he took the Liberty to advise him to try if it were possible to prevail upon the Ministers by way of Negotiation; and not to be inflexible in a Case where the softest Methods were required; and to expect from Time and good Management the Cure of an Evil, which by rough and violent handling wou'd be increased beyond the Hopes of a Recovery.

But neither the Proposal of the old Janisaries, nor Poniatosky's Letters, could in the least convince the King that it was possible for him to give Way, without injuring his Honour. He chose rather to die by the Hand of the Turks, than be in any Manner their Prisoner. He dismissed the Janisaries without seeing them, and sent them Word, that if they did not go about their Business, he'd shave their Beards for them; which, in the East, is reckoned the most provoking Affront that can be offered.

These old Soldiers, fired with Refentment, returned Home crying, as they went: Ab this Head of Iron! Since he's resolved to perilly, let him perilly. They gave the Basha an Account of their Commission, and acquainted their Comrades at Bender, with the strange Reception they had met with. Upon this every one swore to obey the Basha's Orders without delay; and they were now as impatient of going to the Assault as they had been averse to it the Day before.

The Word was given that Moment. They march'd up to the Intrenchments. The Tartars were already waiting for them, and the Cannon began to play.

The Janisaries on one Side, and the Tartars on the other, forced this little Camp in an Instant. Twenty Swedes had scarce Time to draw their Swords, before the whole 300 were surrounded and taken Prisoners without Resistance. The King was then on Horseback between his House and his Camp, with the Generals Hord,

Ttt 2 Dardoff

Dardoff and Sparre; and seeing that all his Soldiers had suffered themselves to be taken before his Eyes, he said in cool Blood to those three Officers, Let us go and defend the House. We'll fight, adds he with a Smile, pro aris & focis.

Immediately he gallops up to the House with them, where he had placed about forty Domesticks as Centinels, and which they had fortified in the best Manner they could.

These Generals, however accustomed to the obstinate Intrepidity of their Master, could not help being surprized, that in cool Blood and with a jesting Air, he should resolve to stand out against ten Pieces of Cannon and a whole Army. They followed him with some Guards and Domesticks, to the Number of twenty Persons.

But when they came to the Door, they found it beset with Janisaries. Bessides, near 200 Turks or Tartars had already got in at a Window, and made themselves Masters of all the Apartments, except a great Hall, whither the King's Domesticks had retired. It happened luckily that this Hall was near the Door, at which the King purposed to enter with his little Troop of twenty Persons. He threw himself off his Horse with Pistol and Sword in Hand, and his Followers did the same.

The Janisaries fell upon him on all Sides, being encouraged by the Basha's Promise of eight Ducats of Gold to each Man that could but touch his Cloaths, in case they could take him. He wounded and killed all who came near him. A Janisary, whom he had wounded, clapp'd his Blunderbuss to his Face, and if the Arm of a Turk had not jostled him, 'occasioned by the Croud, that moved backwards and forwards like Waves, the King had been killed. The Ball grazed upon his Nose, and took off a Piece of his Ear, and then broke General Hord's Arm, whose Fate it was to be always wounded by his Master's Side.

The King stuck his Sword into the Janisary's Breast, and at the same Time his Domesticks, who were shur up in the great Hall, opened the Door to him. He enters as swift as an Arrow with his little Troop, and in an Instant they shut the Door again, and barricade it with all they can find.

Thus was Charles XII. shut up in this Hall with all his Attendants, amounting to about threescore Men, Officers, Guards, Secretaries, Valet de Chambre's, and Domesticks of all Kinds.

The Janisaries and Tartars pillaged the rest of the House, and filled the Apartments. Come, says the King, let us go and drive out these Barbarians! And putting himself at the Head of his Men, he, with his own Hands, opened the Door of the Hall which saced his Bed-chamber, goes into it and sires upon the Plunderers.

The Turks loaden with Booty, being terrified at the sudden Appearance of the King, whom they had been used to reverence, threw down their Arms, and leapt out of the Window, or sled into the Cellars. The King taking Advantage of the Confusion they were in, and his own Men being animated with this Piece of Success, they pursued the Turks from Chamber to Chamber, killed or wounded those who had not made their Escape, and in a quarter of an Hour cleared the House of the Enemy.

The King in the Heat of the Fight perceived two Janisaries who hid themselves under his Bed. He thrust his Sword through one of them and killed him; but the other afking Pardon, crying, Amman. I grant you your Life, says the King, upon-Condition that you go and give the Basha a faithful Account of what yo have feen. Grothusen explained the Words in Turkish to him. The Turk easily promised to do as he was bid. Upon which he was allowed to leap out of the Window, as the rest had done.

The Swedes at length become Masters of the House, shut the Windows again, and barricadoed them. In this Situation they had no Want of Arms, a Ground-chamber full of Muskets and Powder, having escaped the tumultuous Search of the Janisaries. These they made a very seasonable Use of, firing close upon the Turks thro' the Windows, and killing 200 of them in less than half a quarter of an Hour. 🕝

The Cannon played against the House, but the Stones being very loft, it only made Holes in the Wall, but demolished nothing.

.The Kam of Tartary and the Batha, 1 who were desirous of taking the King alive, being ashamed to lose stime and Men, and employ an entire Army against sixty Persons, thought it proper to fet Fire to the House, in order to oblige the King to surrender. For this Purpose they ordered some Arrows, twisted about; with lighted Matches, to be shot upon the Roof, and against the Doors and Windows; by which Means the House was imme-

King of SWEDEN. diately in a Flame. The Roof all on Fire was ready to tumble upon the Swedes. The King, with a very fedate Air, gave Orders to extinguish the Fire; and finding a little Barrel full of Liquor, he laid hold of it himself, and, with the Assistance of two Swedes, threw it upon the Place where the Fire was most violent: Then he discovered that it was full of Brandy. But the Hurry which is inseparable from such a State of Confusion, hindered him from thinking of it before. Upon this it burnt more furloufly than ever: The King's Apartment was confumed, and the great Hall, where the Swedes then were, was filled with a terrible Smoke, mixed with Gusts of Fire, that came in through the Doors of the neighbouring Apartments. One half of the Roof fell in, and the other tumbled down without the House, cracking among the Flames.

A Centinel named Walberg, ventured in this Extremity to cry, that there was a Necessity for surrendring. What a strange Man, says the King, is this, to imagine that it is not more glorious to be burnt than taken Pri-Joner! Another Centinel named Rosen, had the Thought to lay, that the Chancery house, which was but fifty Paces off, had a stone Roof, and was Proof against Fire; that it would do well to fally out and gain that House, and there stand upon their Defence. A true Swede, cries the King: Then he embraced him, and made him a Colonel upon the Spot. Come on, my Friends, says be, take all the Powder and Ball you can carry, and let us gain the Chancery Sword in Hand.

The

The Turks who all this while encompassed the House, were struck with Fear and Admiration, to fee that the Swedes continued in it not withflanding it was all in Flames. But they were much more furprized, when they faw them open the Doors, and the King and his Men fall upon them in a desperate Manner. ' Charles, 'and his principal Officers were armed with Sword and Piftol. Every one fired two Pistols at a Time in the Inflant that the Door opened; and in the Twinkling of an Eye throwing away their Pistols, and drawing their Swords, they drove the Turks back the Distance of fifty Paces; but the Moment after this little Troop was furrounded. The King, being booted according to Custom, threw himself down with his Spurs. Immediately one and twenty Janifaries fall upon him, difarm him, and bear him away to the Basha's Quarters, some taking hold of his Arms, and others of his Legs, as the Manner is to carry a fick Person for Fear of incommoding him.

As foon as the King saw himself in their Hands, the Violence of his Temper, and the Fury which fo long and desperate a Fight would naturally infpire, gave place to a gentle and calm Behaviour. Not one impatient Word fell from him; not a Frown was to be On the contrary he looked upon the Janifaries with a fmiling Countenance, and they carried him, crying Alla, with a Mixture of Anger and Respect in their Faces. His Officers were taken at the same Time, and stripped by the Turks and Tartars. It was on the 12th of February, 1713. that this strange Adventure happen'd, and it drew after it some very extraordinary Consequences.

The Ballia of Bender gravely waited in his Tenr, expecting the King; and had by him one Marco for an Interpreter. He received the King with great Respect, and prayed him to repose upon a Sopha, but the King took no Novice of his Civilities, and continued standing.

Blessed be the Almighty, says the Batha, that your Majesty is safe. grieves me that you have forced me to execute the Sultan's Orders. The King, for his part, was only vexed that his 300 Men should suffer themselves to be taken in their Intrenchments, and faid, Ab if they bad fought like Men, we could have beld it out these ten Days. Alas, says the Busha, what Pity it is, that so much Valour should be misemployed! Then the King was conducted on a fine Horse with righ Furniture to Bender. All the Swedes were either killed or taken. The King's Equipage, Goods and Papers, and the best of his Baggage, was plundered or burnt. In the Roads, the Swedish Officers naked, and chained two and two, followed the Horses of the Tartars and Ianisaries. The Chancellor and the General Officers were in the same Condition of being Slaves to some of the Soldiers, to whose share they fell.

The Basha Ismael having brought the King to his Seraglio at Bender, gave him his own Apartment, where he was served like a King, but not without a Guard of Janisaries at the Chamber door. A Bed was prepared for him; but he threw himself down upon a Sopha in his Boots, and sell fast asseep. An Officer, that stood near in in waiting, put him on a Cap, which the King threw off at his first waking; and the Turk was surprised to see a sovereign Prince seeping on the Ground in his Boots, and bare headed. In the Morning Ismael brought Fabricius to the King; who when he faw his Prince's Cloaths all torn, his Boots, his Hands, and his whole Person covered with Dust and Blood; his Eye-brows burnt. but yet even in that Condition smiling; he threw himself on his Knees, unable to speak: but soon recovering by the King's free Behaviour, he renewed his usual Way of Conversation with him. and they began to be a little merry upon the Subject of, the Battle. Lam told, says Fabricius, your Majesty has killed no less than twenty Janisaries No, no, fays the King, you know a Story never loses in the telling. While they were talking, the Basha brought to the King his Favourite Grothulen and Colonel Ribbins, whom he was fo generous to redeem at his own Expence. Fabricius undertook to ransome all the other Prisoners.

Jeffreys, the English Envoy, assisted him with Money: and La Motraie, a French Gentleman who came out of Curiofity to Bender, and who has writ fome Account of these Affairs, gave all he had. These Strangers, assisted by the Basha's Advice and Money, redeemed all the Officers, and their Cloaths, out of the Hands of the Turks. and Tartars,

The next Morning, they conveyed. the King, in a Chariot covered, with. Scarlet towards Adrianople. His Trea--furer Grotbusen was with him. The Chancellor Mullern, and some Officers followed in another Carriage. Many, others were on Horse-back, who could not refrain Tears at the Sight of the King's Chariot. The Basha himself commanded the Convoy. Fabricius faid it was a Shame the King should be without a Sword, and begged of the Basha that he might be allowed to wear one. God forbid! fays the Basha, be would soon cut our Beards for us, if he bad a Sword. However, he did give , him one some Hours after.

While they were carrying this King. disarmed and a Prisoner, who not .. long before had given Law to so many Countries, had been Arbiter of the North, and the Terror of all Europe; there happened to appear in the very same Place another Instance of the Frailty of human Greatness.

King Stanislaus was seized in the Turks Dominions, and carried Prifoner to Bender at the same Time that they were conveying away Charles.

Stanislaus, unsupported by the Hand that made him King, having no Money, and consequently no Friends in Poland, retired to Pomerania, and as he was not able to preserve his own Kingdom, had done his best to defend his Benefactor's.

He went himself to Sweden to hasten the Recruits that were wanted in Livonia and Pomerania. At last, when he had done all that could be expected from him as the King of Sweden's Friend, and struggled with his ill Fortune, he thought it best to give up a Crown which he was no longer able to keep. He advised about it with Fleming first Minister to King Augustus, who was under great Obligations to him, and made him large Promises, if not out of Gratitude, at least for his Honour's Sake, or which is the more probable, with Intention only to deceive him.

But Stanislaus could not well abdicate his Crown without the Confent of Charles, to whom he owed it. So he wrote to him, to defire he would allow of an Abdication, which many Circumstances made necessary, and his good Meaning in it honourable. He begged he would no longer facrifice his Interest for the Sake of an unhappy Friend, who would rather chuse to be himself a Sacrifice for the publick Peace.

Charles received the Letter at Varnitfa; and in a Passion said to the Courier before a good many People: Well, if he will not be a King, I shall think of somebody else. Stanislaus thought if he should go himself it might do So he took with him Baron Sparre, who was afterwards the Swede's Embassador in France. He changed his Clothes, for Fear of being known, and passed the Borders of Hungary and Transylvania, still in fear of being stopped; nor could be think himself fafe, till he came to Yaffi in Moldavia, near the Place where the Czar had fuch a narrow Escape from the Turks. At Yass he was stopped, and questioned. He said he was a Swede, and going to the King at Bender; for he supposed that Name was enough to gain his Pass, little thinking what had happened.

Saying he was a Swede, they immediately seized him, and carried him Prisoner to Bender. He was quickly known; and Word was brought of it to the Basha as he was going along with the King of Sweden. The Basha told Fabricius, who coming up to the Chariot, acquainted Charles, that he was not the only King a Prisoner to the Turks; and that Stanislaus was in hold a few Miles from him. The King not at all discomposed, said to him, Dear Fabricius, run and tell him, never to make Peace with King Augustus, for we shall quickly have a Change of Affairs. Such was his Firmness of Mind, that though deserted in Poland, attacked in his own Donlinions, and led Prisoner here in Turky, he boldly reckoned upon Fortune, not doubting but the Ottoman Porte would affish him with 100000 Men.

Fabricius had Leave to go with the Message, attended by a Janisary. After some Miles riding, he met a Body of Soldiers that guarded Stanislaus, and spoke to one that rode in the middle of them, in a Frank's Dress, and indifferently mounted. He asked him in the Germon Tongue, where the King of Poland was? It proved to be Stanislaus, whom he did not know in that Disguise. What, says the King, bave you forgot me? Fabricius then told him of the King of Sweden's sad Condition, and of his unshaken but unsuccessful Resolution.

When Stanislaus came near Bender, the Basha who was returning back from Charles, sent the King of Poland an Arabian Horse with sine Furniture.

Stanislaus was received at Bender with a Discharge of the Artillery; and, bating that he was a Prisoner, had no great Cause to complain of his Usage there. As for Charles, he was going to Adrianople, and the Town was full of Discourse beforehand about the Battle. The Turks both admired and blamed him; but the Divan was so exasperated, that they threatned to confine him in one of the Islands of the Archipelago.

M. Desilleurs, that could have taken his Part and prevented such an Affront to all the Kings of Christendom, was at Constantinople; and so was M. de Ponicos fly, who was never known to want Contrivance upon any pressing Occasion. Most of the Swedes at Adrianople were in Prison, and the Sultan's Throne seemed inaccessible to any Complaints from the King of Sweden.

The Marquis de Fierville, a private Agent from France to King Charles at Bender, was then at Adrianople, and undertook to do that Prince a Piece of Service when he was either deferted or ill used by all the World; he was luckily assisted in this Design by a French Gentleman, of a good Family, one Villelongue, a Man of great Courage and but little Fortune, who charmed with the Fame of the King of Sweden, was come thither on purpose to engage in his Service.

With this young Man's Help M. de Fierville wrote a Memorial as from the King of Sweden, demanding Juffice of the Sultan for the wrong offered in his Person to all crowned Heads, and against the real, or suspected Treachery of the Kam and the Basha of Bender.

It contained an Accuration of the Visir and other Ministers, that they were corrupted by the Muscovites, had deceived the Grand Seignor, had intercepted his Letters, and had cunningly drawn from the Sultan an Order so contrary to the Hospitality of the Musulmans, in Violation of the Law of Nations, and in a manner so unworthy of a great Emperor, to attack with twenty thousand Men a King who had none but his Retinue to defend him, and who had depended upon the facred Word of the Sultan.

When they had drawn up this Memorial, it was to be translated, and written upon a Sort of Paper that they never use but for what is presented to the Sultan.

They went to several French Interpreters to get it done. But the King's Affairs were so desperate, and the Vifir so openly declared his Enemy. that none of them all would undertake it. They found out a Stranger at last whose Hand was not known: who, for a good Gratuity, and upon full Assurance of Secrecy, translated the Memorial, and wrote it over upon the right Sort of Paper. The Baron d' Arvidsen, a Swedish Officer, counterfeited the King's Hand, and Fierville sealed it with the Arms of Sweden. Villelongue undertook to deliver it to the Grand Seignor as he passed to the Mosque. This was no more than had been done before, by People who had Complaints to make against the Minister of State: but that made it now the more difficult and dangerous.

The Visir, who could not but think the Swedes would sue for Justice to the Sultan, and knew withal what was like to follow, by the Fate of his Predecesfors, forbad any Person to come near the Grand Seignor, and ordered, that whoever was seen about the Mosque with Petitions, should be seized.

Villelongue knew the Order, and that it was as much as his Life was worth to do it. However, he put on a Grecian Habit, and hiding the Letter in his Bosom, went pretty early to the Place. He pretended Madness, and danced between two Files of Janisaries where the Sultan was to pass and dropped some Money now and then to amuse the Guards.

When the Sultan was coming they would have had Villelongue get out of the Way; but he fell on his Knees, and struggled with his Janifaries. At last his Cap-fell off, and he was discovered by his Hair to be a Frank. He had several Blows, and was very ill used. The Grand Seignor heard the Scuffle, and asked what the Matter was? Villelongue cried as loud as he could, Amman! Amman! Mercy! and pulled out the Letter. The Sultan ordered him to be brought before him. Villelongue ran immediately, and embracing his Stirrup, presented the Paper, faying, Sued Krall Dan, The King of Sweden gives it thee. The Sultan putting up the Letter in his Bosom, went on to the Mosque, and Villelongue was secured in one of the Outhouses of the Seraglio.

The Sultan coming from Mosque, when he had read the Letter, resolved to examine the Prisoner. himself. He put off his Imperial Habit and Turban, and went in the Difguife of an Officer of the Janifaries, which he often does, taking with him an old Maltese for an Interpreter. By the Favour of this Disguise, Villelongue had a private Conference of a quarter of an Hour with the Turkish Emperor, an Hönour that was never done to any Christian Embassador, He took Care to relate all the King of Sweden's Hardships, accusing the Ministers, and demanding Satisfaction: This he did with the greater Freedom, because all the while he talked to the Sultan, he was thought to believe himfelf speaking to his Equal. Not but he knew him well, though the Prison was pretty dark; and this made him only the more bold in his Discourse. The pretended Officer of the Janifaries faid to Villelongue; Christian, be fatisfied, the Sultan my Master has the Soul of an Emperor, and if it be as you fay, he will do your King Justice. Villelongue was foon released, and some Weeks after there was a fudden Change in the Seraglio, which the Swedes affirm was owing to this Conference. The Mufti was deposed. The Kam of the Tartars banished to Rhodes, and the Serasquier Basha of Bender sent to an Island in the Archipelago.

The Ottoman Porte is so very subject to such Storms, that it is hard to say, whether this was intended for Satisfaction to the King of Sweden or not; his Treatment shewed but little Inclination in the Porte to pleasure him.

Ali Coumourgi, the Favourite, was thought to be at the Bottom of all for some private Ends of his own. The Pretence for banishing the Kam and the Serasquier of Bender, was their giving the King twelve hundred Purses against the express Order of the Grand Seignor. He raised the Son of the deposed Kam to the Tartarian Throne, a young Man, who cared little for his Father; and upon whose Assistance Ali Coumourgi greatly depended in the Wars he had already premeditated. It was some Weeks after this, that the Grand Visir Jussus deposed, and that Soliman Basha was declared Prime. Vifir.

I must say, that M. de Villelongue and many Swedes, have declared, that the Letter he presented was the Occanion.

sion of these Changes; but M. de Fierville says quite otherwise: and this is not the only Case in which I have met with differing Accounts. Now I take it, an Historian is to tell plain Matter of Fact, without entring into the Motives: he is to relate exactly what he knows, and not to guess at what it is impossible he should know.

In the mean time Charles was carried to a little Castle called Demirtash, near Adrianople, where Multitudes of Turks were waiting to see him alight. He was conveyed out of the Charlot to the Castle upon a Sopha; but that he might not be seen, he put a Cushion over his Head.

It was several Days before the Porte would consent to his residing at Demotica, a little Town six Leagues from Adrianople, near the samous River Hebrus, now called Marizza. At last Coumourgi said to Soliman the Grand Visir, Go, tell the King of Sweden being stay at Demotica as long as belives. I warrant he will be for removing before the Year comes about; but be sure you do not let him have any Money.

So the King was removed to Demotica, where the Porte allowed a sufficient Quantity of Provisions for him and his Retinue, and only five andtwenty Crowns a Day in Money, to buy Pork and Wine, a Sort of Provision which the Turks never furnish to others. But as to the Allowance of five hundred Crowns a Day, which he had at Bender, it was quite withdrawn.

Before the King and his little Courtivere well fettled at Demotica, Solimanthe Grand Vilir was deposed, and succeeded by Ibrabim Mola, a Man exceed.

ing rough, and bold, and blunt. It may not be amis to give some Account of him, that all the Viceroys of that Empire may be known, on whom King Charles's Fortune was so long depending.

He had been a common Sailor till the Accession of Sultan Achmet the third; which Emperor would aften go disguised like a common Man, or as a Priest, or Dervise; and would slip in an Evening into the Coffee houses and other publick Places of Constantinople, to hear what was faid of him, and how People stood affected. over-heard this Sailor once finding Fault with the Turkish Ships, that they never brought Home any Prizes, and Iwore, if he were a Captain, he would never come Home without some Ship or other of the Infidels. The very next Morning the Grand Signor gave him a Ship, and fent him a cruifing. a few Days after, the Captain brought in a Bark of Males and a Genoese Gally, "and in two Years Time he came to be Captain-General of the Sea, and at last Grand Visir. He was no sooner in his Post, but he began to think he might do without the Favourite and to make himself necessary. he promoted a War with the Muscovites. In order to this, he let up a Tent near the Caltle where the King of Sweden lived.

There sie invited the King to meet him with the new Kam of The large and the French: Embassador. The King's Missortunes made him the more sensible of the Indignity, so be sens for by a Subject, so he ordered his Chancellor Mutterwio go in his Room; and because he did not now but the Turks might offer some A Font to him, and force him to something below his Dignity, this Prince, who carried every Part of his Couduct into Extremes, refolved to keep his Bed during his Stay at Demotica. This he did for ten Months as if he had been sick. None but the Chancellor, Grothasen, and Colonel Dubens ever eat with him. They had no Conveniences about them since the Business of Bender, so that their Meals were served with little Elegance. They were forced to wait upon themselves, and the Chancellor, Mullern was Cook in ordinary the whole Time.

While Charles kept his Bed in this Manner, he received News, of the Desolation of all his foreign Dominions.

General Steinbock, famous for drive ing the Danes from Scania, and with a Parcel of Peasants, beating all their best Troops, did still maintain the Glory of the Swedish Arms. He defended Romerouia, Bremen, and the King's Possessian Germany, as long as he was able, but could not hinder the Saxons and Danes united from palfing the Elbe and belieging Stade, a firong Town near that River in the Duchy of Bremen. It was bombarded and burnt to Ashes, and the Garrison obliged to furrender at Discretion, before Steinbock could come in to their ∆ffistance.

He had about twelve thousand Men, and half of them were Gavalry, with which he pursued the Enemy, though they were twice his Number, and forced them to repass the Elbe; and came up with them at a Place called Gadebush, acar a River of that Name, in the Duchy of Macklembeurg, on the 20th of December, 1712. The Sames and Danes were posted with a Marsh before them, and a Wood behind; and had all Advantages both of Number and Situation; for there was no coming at them but over the Marsh, through the Fire of their Artillery.

Steinback led on his Troops, and advancing in Order of Battle, began one of the most bloody Engagements that had ever happened between those rival Nations. After a sharp Encounter of three Hours, the Danes and Saxons were deseated and less the Field.

It was here that a Son of King Augustus by the Countess de Konismarcke. known by the Name of the Count of Saxony, received his first Rudiments of the Art of War; I mean him that had the Honour to be chosen Duke. of Courland, though without Success. who wanted nothing but Force to make good the most indisputable Right that any Man can have to Dominion. which is the unanimous Consent of a People. He commanded a Regiment at Gadebish, and had a Horse killed under him. I have heard him fay, that all the Swedes maintained their Ranks, and even when the Day was decided, and their Enemies dead at their Feet, not one of those brave Soldiers durst stoop to strip them, till. Prayers were over in the Field of Battle: they were so very exact in observing that strict Discipline their King had always used them to.

After this Victory, Steinbock could not but remember how the Danes had reduced Stade to Ashes; and resolved to be revenged upon Altena, a Townbelonging to the King of Denmark.—Altena is below Hamburgh upon the River Elbe; which brings up large. Vessels thither. The King of Denmark had granted to it great Privileges, with an Intention to make it a Place of confiderable Trade. With this Encouragement, the People had so much improved their Trade, and encreased their Riches, as to make the Hamburghers jealous of their growing Wealth and begin to wish their Destruction. When Steinhock came in Sight of the Place, he sent a Trumpet to bid them evacuate it with their Effects, for he was resolved to destroy their Town immediately.

The Magistrates came and threw themselves at his Fretz and offered him a Ransom of a hundred thousand Crowns. Steinbook demanded twice the Sum. They begged they might have Time to send to their Correspondents at Hamburgh, and promised he should have it by the next Day. The General told them if they did not pay it presently, he would burn the Town about their Ears.

The Soldiers were in the Suburbs ready with their Torches; and the Town had no Defence put a poor wooden Gate and a dry Ditch; so that they were forced to fly at Midnight! It was on the 9th of Fanuary, 1713. The Season was exceeding Cold, and a violent north Wind helped to spread the Flames, and to encrease the Sufferings of the People exposed in the open Fields. Men and Women loaded with their Goods, went weeping and lamenting thro' the Snow. Bedrid old People, were carried by the young upon their Shoulders. Women newly brought to Bed, escaped with their Infants to die of Cold upon the Road, in Sight of their Country that was all in Flames. The Swedes set Fire to the Town, before the People were well got out of it. It burnt from Midnight till about ten in the Morning. The Houses being most of Timber were easily consumed, so that by Morning there was scarce any Sign remaining of a Town.

The Aged, the Sick, and Women of tender Constitutions, who had lodged upon the Ice while their Houses were burning, came to Hamburgh, and begged they might be let in to fave their Lives: but were refused, because Altena had been visited with fome infectious Distempers, and the Inhabitants of Altena were not in such. Esteem with the Hamburgbers, as toinduce them to expose themselves to the Infection of that unfortunate People, by admitting them into the City. Thus most of these poor Wretches. died under the Walls, ealling Heaven. to witness the Barbarity of the Swedes, and more inhuman Hamburgbers.

All Germany was frandalized at this Proceeding. The Ministers and Generals of Poland and Denmark wrote: to Steinbock, complaining of his Cruelty, which being done without Necessity, could have no Excuse, but must fet God and Man against him.

His Answer was, 'That he had never carried Things to these Extremities, if it were not to deter his.

of Nations: adding that they had fil-and when they had ruined that beau-his Torches at Altena were no more then just Reprisals for the red hot

Bullets they had used at Stade; that War was not the Theatre of moderation and Lenity: that neither Louis the XIVth, who allowed the burning of the Palatinate, nor Turenne who had laid it in Ashes, nor those who had followed and exceeded his Example since, were ever thought to be more barbarous than other Men; and if there was any Blame in such Things, it must lie upon the Muscovites, the Danes and Saxons, who had set him the Example.

On these Terms of Violence the Swedes and their Enemies acted against each other; and if Charles could but have appeared then in Pomerania, he might possibly have retrieved his former Fortune. His Armies though they wanted his Presence among them, were yet acted by his Spirit; but the Absence of the Chief has a fatal Influence on military Affairs, and prevents the right Improvement of Conquest. So that Steinbock lost by Peace-meal all he had gained in those great Actions, which at a better Season might have been decisive.

With all his Successes, it was not in his Power to prevent the Muscovites, the Saxons and Danes from joining: they seized his Quarters; and he lost several of his Men in little Skirmishes: two thousand of them were drowned in the Eider, as they were going to their Winter quarters in Holstein: and these were Losses not to be recovered in a Country where he was surrounded on all Sides by potent Enemies.

Frederick Duke of Holstein, was then but twelve Years old; he was Nephew to the King of Sweden, and Son of that Duke who was killed at the Battle of Clifau. His Uncle the Bishop of Lu?

beck, under the Name of Administrator governed this unhappy Country which its Sovereigns have very seldom possessed in Peace. The Bishop who was anxious to avert War from the Dominions of his Pupil, was willing to preserve the Appearance of a Neutrality, but it was impossible to remain Neuter between an Army of the King of Sweden, whom the Duke of Holstein might hope to succeed, and that of the Allies, which was just upon the Point to invade them.

Count Steinbock being hardly preffed, and in no Condition to keep the Field, demanded of the Bishop to admit him into the Castle of Tonningen, who was now reduced either to venture the Loss of all the Swedish Forces, or the Consequences of the Danes Resentment, in case he should assist them.

So he had Recourse to Art, the mean and dangerous Resuge of weak Minds, and ordered Wolf the Governor to receive the Swedish Troops, but never to say any thing of such an Order from him. Steinbock was also sworn to keep it secret.

Wolf was to take the Blame of all upon himself, as having disobeyed his Master's Orders. But Steinbock, the Duke, and all his Country, paid dear for this Contrivance. The Czar, with the Kings of Denmark and Prussia, blocked up Tonningen: and this little Army was disappointed of Provisions by a Fatality which attended the Affairs of Sweden through the Course of this whole War.

Steinbock was forced at last to surrender himself a Prisoner to the King of Denmark on the 17th of March 1713, and thus was the Army scattered that had won the famous Battles of Helfimbourg and Gadebush, under a General of mighty Hopes; and the King of Denmark had this Satisfaction, that he had now in his Hands the very Man who had stopped the Progress of his Arms, and reduced his Town of Altena to Ashes. Steinbock, when he evacuated Tonningen, told the King that he got in thither by Stratagem, and that he had deceived the Governor. This Officer swore to the same Effect; chusing rather the Shame of having been surprized, than to betray his Master's Secret.

The Duke of Holstein, and the Bishop who was the Administrator, protested they had faithfully preserved a Neutrality; and begged the Mediation of the King of Prussia and Elector of Hanover. But all their Artifices were in vain without a better Force; for the King of Denmark with his own Army and the Czar's, sometime after besieged Wolf in Tonningen, who surrendered, and at last confessed the Secret, which the Danes had more than suspected all along.

This furnished a Pretence for the Dane to seize the Duke of Holstein's Country, and he has taken Care to keep the greatest Part of it ever since. But though he was fo fevere to the Duke, his Treatment of Steinbock was much otherwise, and shewed, that Kings sometimes consider their Interests rather than Revenge. The Incendiary. of Altena was suffered to go free in Copenhagen on Parole; and the King. affected a more than ordinary Civility to him, till endeavouring to escape, he was feized, and proved guilty of the Breach of his Parole. Then he was confined close, and forced to ask.

the King's Pardon, which he foon obtained.

Pomerania, all but Straelfund, the Isle of Rugen, and some neighbouring Places, being defenceles, became a Prey to the Allies, and was sequester'd in the Hands of the King of Prussia. Bremen was silled with Danish Garrisons. At the same Time the Muscovites over-ran all Finland, and beat the Swedes, who were quite out of Heart; and being much inferior to their Foes in Number, had no longer the Superiority over them in Valour.

To compleat the Misfortunes of Sweden, the King was still resolved to stay at Demotica, and fed himself with the vain Expectation of Assistance from the Turks.

The Visir, Ibrabim Molla, who had been so obstinately bent upon a War with the Muscovites, in Opposition to the Favourite, was strangled between two Doors.

And now the Place of Visir was become so dangerous, that none dared to take it: However, when it had been vacant for about six Months, Ali Coumourgi the Favourite was preferred to it. Then the King of Sweden lost all Hopes, for he knew Coumourgi would never befriend him farther than for his own Ends.

He had been buried here in Oblivion and Inactivity for about eleven. Months; which following close upon the most violent Exercise, made that: Illness real, which before was but feigned. In Europe they verily thought him dead; and the Regency which he settled when he lest Stockbolm hearing nothing from him, the Senate waited on the Princess Ulric Eleonoras to desire she would take the Regency in in her Brother's Absence. She accordingly accepted of it; but finding the Senate had a Mind to force her to a Peace with the Czar and Denmark, that on every Side were falling upon Sweden, which she knew the King would never ratify, she resigned the Regency, and wrote him a full Account of the Matter to Turky.

The King received her Letters at Demotica; and those despotick Notions which he had early imbibed, made him quite forget that ever Sweden had been a free State, or that the Senate used to share in the Government of it with their former Kings.

He looked upon them all as Servants that took upon them to govern the Family in their Master's Absence; and wrote them Word, if that were what they wanted, he would send them one of his Boots, to which they might apply for Orders.

Wherefore to prevent any Attempts in Sweden against his Authority, and that he might defend his Country; hoping nothing more now from the Ottomans, but depending only on him-felf: He signified to the Grand Visir his Desire to be gone, by the Way of Germany.

Defalleurs, the French Embassador, who transacted all the Assairs of Sweden, made the Proposal. Well, says the Visit, did not I tell you, that the King of Sweden would be glad to go before the Year was at an End? Tell him, be may use his Pleasure; but let him resolve, and fix his Day, that we may have no more Trouble with him, as we had at Bender.

Count Desalleurs took Care to soften these Expressions when he told the King. So the Day was set; and Charles before he went was willing to make a Figure as a King, notwith-standing the wretched Condition he was in. He made Grotbusen his Embassador extraordinary, and sent him in Form to take his Leave at Constantinople, with a Train of sourscore Persons richly dressed.

But the Embassy was not half so splendid, as the Shifts were mortifying, to which he was put to surnish the Expence of it.

Monsieur Desalleurs lent the King 40,000 Crowns. Grotbusen, by his Agents at Constantinople, borrowed at the Rate of 50 per Cent. 1000 Crowns of a Jew; of an English Merchant 200 Pistoles; and 1000 Livres of a Turk.

Thus they got fufficient to enable them to act the splendid Farce of the Swedish Embassy. At the Porte, Grotbusen had all the Honours that were ever paid to Embassadors extraordinary upon their Day of Audience. All this was done with a View to get Money out of the Grand Visir; but that Minister was inexorable.

Grotbusen made a Proposal to borrow a Million of the Porte. But the Visir replied coldly, That his Master knew how to give when he had a Mind, but it was below him ever to lend; that the King should have all Things proper for his fourney, and in a Manner becoming him who gave it; and that perhaps the Porte might make him some Present in Gold, but he would not have him expets it.

On the 1st of Ottober, 1714, the King began his Journey. A Capigi Balba, with fix Chiaoun, went to attend him from the Castle of Demirtash, whither he had removed a few Days before.

before. The Profests they brought from the Grand Signor were a large Tent of, Scarlet embroidered: with Gold, a Sabre, the Handle of which was fet with Jewels, eight beautiful Arabian Horses, with fine Saddles and Stirrups of mallive Silver. It is not below an Historian to tell, that the Arabian Groom, who took Care of the . Horses, gave the King an Account of their Genealogy; it being the Custom there to take more Notice of the Pedigree of Horses then of Men: which is not so un reasonable, because if we are careful of the B eed, those Animals are never known to degenerate.

The Convoy consisted of threescore Carriages, loaden with all Sonts of Provision, and three hundred Horse. The Capigi Basha, knowing that so wera! Turks had advanced Money to the King's Artendants at excessive interest, said, That as Usury was forbidden by the Law of Mahomet, he desired his Majesty to serve the Debts in such a Manner, that his Resident at Constantial-ple should only pay the Principal. Na, says the King, if any of my People bave given Notes for an hundred Crowns, I will pay them though they had but ten from the Lender.

He made a Proposal to the Creditors to follow him? promising Payment of all their Debts and Charges. Angreat smany of them went to Sweden: and Grotbusen was intrusted to see them paid.

The Turks, to show the more Respect to their Guest; made, but short Days Journeys. But this he could, not bear. He got up as usual, about three in the Morning; and as soon as he was drest, he went and called up the Capigi and Chiasux, and ordered them its march in the Dark. This Way of Travelling suited but ill with the Turkish Gravity, and the King was pleased to find it so, and said he should be a little even with them for their Treatment of him at Bender.

· When he came to the Turkish Frontiers. Staniflaus went thence another .Way into Germany, intending to retire , into the Duchy of Deux-Pouts, a Country that borders on the Palatinate of the Rhine, and Alface; which from the Time it was united southat Crown by Christian's Successor Charles X, had belonged to the Kings of Sweden. Charles assigned to Staniflaus the Re--venue of this Duchy, which was then reckoned to be about seventy thousand Crowns. And this was the Endrof for many Projects, and Wars, and Expectations. Stanislaus could and would have made a good Agreement with -Augustus; if Charles had not been so untractable and politive a to make him lose a vast Estate in Polands only that he might preserve the Name of King. Then melting Dress at his is

This Prince refided at Deux-Ponts till Charles his Death; which Duchy falling then to the Palatine Family, he retired to Wissenhourg, a place belonging to the French in Assace. Upon which M. Sum, Envoy from King Augustus, making complaint to the Duke of Orleans; Regent of Irrance, received this remarkable Answer.

y Sir, let the King your Master know that France bar even been a Resuge for Kings in Missertune.

When the King of Sweden came to the German Frontiers, he found the Emperor had given Orders for his Reception every where with proper State, Whenever Haibingers had fixed his route, great Preparations were making to entertain him; and a World of People came to behold the Man, whose Conquests and Missfortunes, whose least Actions, and even his Repose had made so much Noise both in Europe and in Asia. But Charles had no Inclination to so much Pomp, or to make a Shew of the Prisoner at Bender, and had even form'd a Resolution never to enter his City of Stockbalm, till he had retrieved his Missfortunes by a more auspicious Turn of Affairs.

So dismissing his Turkish Attendants at Targowitz, on the Borders of Transylvania; he called his People together in a Yard and bid them take no thought for him, but make the best of their Way to Straelfund in Pomerania, about three hundred Leagues from thence, up the Baltick Sea.

He took no Body with him, but one During a young Man, whom he made a Colonel afterwards. He parted chearfully with his Officers, leaving them in great Confusion and Concern for him. For a Disguise he wore a black Peruke, under which he tucked his own Hair, a gold laced Hat, gray Clothes, and a blue Cloke, passing for a German Officer, and rid Post with only Colonel During.

In all the Way, he kept clear as much as he possibly could, of any Place that belonged to his open or concealed Enemies; and so by the Way of Hungary, Moravia, Austria, Bavaria, Westemberry, the Palatinate, Westphalia and Mecklenburg, he made almost the Tour of Germany, which was further by half then he need have gone.

Ropping, During not being used to fuch Fatigues, fainted away when he came to alight. The King would not stay a Moment, but asked During, What Money be bad? he said, About a thousand Crowns. Give me half, says the King, I fee you cannot go on: I'll go without you. During begged he would but stay three Hours, and he was fure by that Time he should be able to go on, and defired him to confider the Danger of going alone. The King would not be perfuaded, but made him give him the five hundred Crowns, and called for Horses, During, afraid of what might happen, bethought himself of this Contrivance. He takes the Postmaster aside: Friend, lays ho, this is my Coufin, we are going upon Business together, and you see be won't flay for me but three Hours; prithee give him the work Horse you have; and let me bave a Post Caise, or some such thing.

He put a Couple of Ducats in the Man's Hand, and was obeyed punctually: so the King had a Horse that was both lame and resty. Away he went about ten at Night, through the Snow, and Wind, and Rain. His Fellow traveller, after a few Hours Rest, serout again in a Chaise with very good Horses, About Break of day the overtook the King, with his Horse timed, and walking towards the next Stage.

Then he was forced to get in with Daring, and steps upon the Straw; and afterwards they never stopped, but went on, on Horseback all Day, and sleeping in a Chaise all Night.

Thus, in fixteen Days riding, and often in Danger of being taken, he came at last upon the 21st of November

1714. to the Gates of Straelfund, about one in the Morning.

The King said, he was a Courier from the King in Turky, and must speak immediately with General Duker the Governor. The Centinel told him, it was too late, the Governor was a-bed, and he must stay still Day Light.

The King said it was an Affair of Consequence; and declared if he did not go directly and awake the Governor, they should all be hanged in the Morning. At last a Serjeant went and called the Governor; and Duker thinking it might be some General Officer, ordered the Gates to be opened, and the Courier was brought up to his Chamber.

Duker, rubbing his Eyes, asked, "What News of his Majesty?" The King took him by the Shoulder, What, fays he, Duker, have my best Subjects forgot me? The General could scarce believe his Eyes, and jumping out of Bed, embraced his Master's Knees; with Tears of Joy. The News was all over the Town in an Instant. Body got up; the Soldiers came about the Governor's Houle. The Streets were full of People, asking if the News were true? The Windows were illuminated, the Conduits ran with Wine, and the Artillery fired.

However, the King was put to rope.

Bed, which was more than he had been for fixteen Days; they were forced to cut off his Boots, his Legs were were at Was fo fwollen with the Fatigue. He had of Sweden. Incither Linen nor Clothes; and they provided in Haste whatever they could find to fit him. When he had slept of the Czar fome Hours, the first Thing he did to review his Troops and examine the Fortifications. And that very Treaty of a second control of the Czar for the first Thing he did to review his Troops and examine the Fortifications.

Day he fent out Orders into all Parts for renewing the War with more Vigour than ever against all his Enemies.

Europe was now in a Condition very different from what it was when King Charles left it in 1709. The War was over in the South, between Germany, England, Holland, France, Spain, Portugal and Italy. This general Peace was owing to some private Quarrels that happened in the Court of England. The Earl of Oxford, an able Minister, and the Lord Bolinbroke, a Man of the finest Wit and Parts of the Age, had got the better of the famous Duke of Marlborough, and persuaded Queen Anne to make a Peace with Louis XIV. France, being well with England, brought the other Powers quickly to an Accommodation.

Philip the Vth, Grandson to Louis XIV. began to reign in Peace over the Ruins of the Spanish Monarchy. Louis XIV, wanted nothing more than that he might finish his long Course in Peace.

Queen Anne of England died in Aug. 1714. and was succeeded by George the First, Elector of Hanover.

These were the chief Princes; and this the Situation of the South of Europe.

The Alterations in the North were of another Nature; the Kings there were at War, united all against the King of Sweden.

Augustus had been long restored to the Crown of Poland by the Assistance of the Czar, and with Consent of the Emperor: Queen Anne, and the States General, who the Guarantees for she Treaty of Alransads in Charles's better X x x and the States Care Days, Days, thought no more of their Oblightions that Way, when they found there was nothing more to fear.

But Augustus was not quite so easy in Lis Throne. His People's Fears-of arbitrary Power, returned with their King, and they were all in Arms to make him submit to the Passa conventa, which is a folemn Contract between the King and them; feeming to havecalled him Home for nothing-elfe butto make War upon him. In the Beginning of these Troubles not a Syllathe was faid of Stanistatis, his Party in all Appearance being come to nothing, and they remembred no more of the King of Sweden than as of a Torrent, which for a while had born down all? before it.

Pultowa, and the Absence of Charles, by which Stanislaus fell, did also occation the Duke of Holstein's Fall; who being Charles's Nephew, was dispositessed of his Dominions by the King of Domark. The King of Sweden had alway for the Father, and was greatly concerned at the Son's Losses: besides, as he never did any thing but for Glory, the Fall of Princes which himself had fet up; was full-as grievous to him as all his own Losses.

Or that he lost, every one was catching what he could. Frederick William, the new King of Prussia, who seemed as much inclined to War as ever his Father was to Peace, took Strin and a Part of Pomerania for four hundred thousand Crowns, which he advanced to the King of Denmark and the Car.

George, the Elector of Handver; who was just come to be King of England, had likewise sequestred into his Hands lhe Dutchy of Bremen and Ferder, which the King of Denmark had affigured to him as a Deposit for threescore thousand Pisseles which he lent that Prince. Thus they disposed of Charles's Spoils; and whoever was possessed of them as Pledges; begin the by the Course of their ownished terests, as dangerous Enemies to them as any of those who took them from him.

The Czar indeed was most of all to be feared. His former Defeats, this Victories, nay, his very Faults, with his Diligence to learn, and Care to teach his Subjects what he learnt, and his incessant Labours, contributed to make him a very great Man. Riga, Livonia, Ingria, Carelia, Part of Finland and all the Countries that had been won by Charles's Ancestors, were now

Years before had not so much as a single Vessel on the Baltick, had made himself Master of those Seas, work as Fleet of so less than thirty Ships of their Line.

He built one of these Ships with his own Hands, and was the best Carpenter, the best Admiral, and the best Pilot in all the North. He himself had sounded every dissionly Passage from the Gulph of Bostonia, quite to the Ocean. And having joined the Labours of a common Sailor to the Experiments of a Philosopher, and the noble Designs of a great Emperor; by his many Victories, he had passed through the Degrees that could make him at Sea a skilful Admiral, as he had done before to make himself a good. General at Land.

While Prince Galliofin, a General bred up under him, and the best at affisting his Designs, compleated the Conquest of Finland, took Vasa, and Lead to make a Descent on Aland, an Mand in the Baltick, about twelve Leagues from Stockholm.

He went upon this Expedition in the Beginning of July, 1714, while had Rival Charles was in Bed at Demotica. He embarked at Cronflot, a Harbour which he had built a few Years before about four Miles from Petersbourg. The Harbour, the Fleet, the Officers and Sailors, were all the Work of his own Hands; and he could ook on nothing but what he had in a manner himself created.

The Russian Fleet came to the Heights of Alan on the 15th of July, confisting of thirty Ships of the Line, 80 Galleys, and 100 half Galleys, with 20000 Soldiers. Admiral Apraxin was the Commander, and the Emperor was Rear - Admiral. The Swedith Fleet came up with them on the 16th, commanded by Vice-Admiral Erinchild, not so Atrong by two thirds. They fought however for three Hours. The Czar attacked the Admiral, and took her after a sharp Engagement.

The same Day he landed sixteen thousand Men at Aland, and took a great many Swedish Soldiers, who could not get aboard the Fleet, and carried them off Prisoners in his own Ships. Then he returned to Cronsor, with Erinchild's Ship, and three lesser ones, a Frigate and six Galleys that he had taken.

From Cronflat he went on to Peterflourg, followed by his victorious Fleet, and the Ships he had taken. He was received with a tripple Discharge of 150 Cannon. Then he made his triumphant Entry, which pleased him more than that at Musicow, as being in his favourite City; where but ren Years before, there was not so, much as a Shed, and that had in it now no less than four and thirty thousand Houses: Being himself at the Head of a victorious Navy, of the first Russian Fleet that ever was seen in the Baltick, and among a People who before his Time had never known what a Fleet was.

At Peter bourg the Ceremonies were much the same as those which before had graced the Triumph at Moscow; the Swedish Vice-Admiral was the best of the Shew. Peter Alexiowitz appeared as Rear-Admiral, and a Ruffian Nobleman, one Romanodowsky, that represented the Czir upon such folemn Occasions, was feated upon a Throne with twelve Senators about The Rear-Admiral prefented him a Relation of his Victories, and was thereupon made Vice-Admiral in Consideration of his Services. An odd-Ceremony, but which is not amis, in a Country where military Subordinations were Part of the Novelties which the Czar had introduced among them.

The Emperor of Musicovy being thus victorious over the Swedes by Sea and Land, and having helped to chase them out of Poland, was Master there in his Turn. He made himself Mediator between the King and the Republick, an Honour perhaps equal to that of setting up a King. The Fortune and Figure which Charles used to make were now the Czar's, who really made a better Use of those Advantages, for his Successes were always for the Beresit of his Country. If he took a Town, the Industry of the Artisans was all transferred to Peterstoarg. The Manufactures, Arts and Sciences of any Place he took, were carried Home to enrich and polish his own Country: so that he had certainly the best Excuse that can be made for any Conquetor.

But Sweden had lost all her foreign Provinces, and had neither Trade nor Money, nor Credit; her veteran Troops who were once so formidable, were either killed or died for Want. Above one hundred thousand Swedes were Slaves in the vast Dominions of Muscovy; and almost as many more were sold to the Turks and Tartars. The very Species of Men was visibly decayed in the Country; but notwithstanding all this, their Hopes revived as soon as ever they heard their King was come to Straelfund.

Such strong Impressions of Admiration and Respect reigned in the Hearts of all his Subjects, that Multitudes of young People came out of all Parts of the Country, and offered themselves to be listed, tho there were not Handa enough at Home to cultivate the Land.

The King during these Preparations, gave his only surviving Sister Ulrica Eleonora in Marriage to Frederick Prince of Hesse Cassel.

The Queen Dowager, Grandmother of Charles the XIIth and the Princess, and fourscore Years of Age, assisted at the Ceremony, on the 4th of April, 1715. in the Palace of Stockholm, and died soon after.

This Marriage was not honoured with the King's Presence, who was now busy in finishing the Fortifications of Straelsund, a Place of great Importance, which was in Danger from the Kings of Denmark and Prussia. However he made his Brother in law Generalissimo of all his Forces in Smeden. This Prince had served the States-General in the French War: and was esteemed a good General, which contributed not a little to facilitate his Marriage with Charles's Sister.

Misfortunes now came on as fast as once his Victories had done. In Tane 1715. the King of England's German Forces with those of Denmark, invested the strong Town of Wismar. The Danes, the Pruffians and the Saxous. to the Number of fix and thirty thoufand, marched in a Body to Straelfund, in order to form the Siege. Not far from Straelfund five Swediff Ships were funk by the Danes and Prushaus. The Czar kept the Baltick with twenty large Men of War and one hundred and fifty Transports, that had thirty thousand Men aboard. He threatened a Descent on Sweden, appearing on the Coast of Halfinbourg and Stockbolm by turns. All Sweden was in Arms upon the Coasts expecting an Invasion. His Land Forces were chaling the Swedes from all the Places they possessed in Rinland towards the Gulph of Bethvia. But he attempted nothing farther.

At the Month of the Oder, a River that divides Pomerania, and passing by Stetin falls into the Baltick, there is a little Island called Usedom.

Its Situation makes it a Place of vast. Importance; for it commands the Oder both on the right and left, and whosoever has it, is Master of the Navigation of that River. The King of Prussia had distodged the Swedes from thence, keeping that as well as Stetin in his Hands, and said, he did it purely for the Sake of Peace.

The Swedes had taken Usedom, in May 1715, and held two Forts there, one called Suine, upon a Branch of the Oder of that Name, the other Penamondre, of greater Consequence, upon another Part of the River. The Forts, and indeed all the Island were manned with but 250 Pomeranians, commanded by an old Swedish Officer named Dusley or Duslery, a Man who well deserves to be remembered.

On the 4th of August, the King of Prussia sent 1500 Foot and 800 Dragoons into the Island. They landed without Opposition on the Side of Suine, which Fort the Swedish Officer had left, being a Place of least Importance, and unwilling to divide his little Company, he retired with them into the Castle of Penamondre, resolving to hold out to the last Extremity.

So they were forced to make a Siege in all the Forms. They shipped Artillery at Stetin, and sent in a Reinforcement of 1000 Prussian Foot and 400 Horse. On the 18th they opened the Trenches in two Places, and played a brisk Battery of Cannon and Mortars. In the Time of the Siege, a Swedish Soldier sent privately with a Letter from Charles, found Means to land on the Island, and slip into Penamendre. He gave the Letter to the Commander, which was in these Words.

on not fire till the Enemy comes to the Brink of the Fosse: stand on your Defence till the last Drop of Blood. I commend you to your good Fortune.

CHARLES.

At the Time when Charles sustained the Loss of Usedom, and the neighbouring Islands, which were quickly taken, while Wismar was ready to surrender, and Sweden had no longer any Fleet but was reduced to the utmost Danger, he himself was in Straelsund, besieged by six and thirty thousand Men.

Straelfund, a Town famous over Europe for the Siege the King of Sweden fustained there, is one of the strongest Places in Pomerania. It is built between the Baltick and the Lake of Franken, near the Streights of Gella. There is no Way to it at Land but by a narrow Causeway, defended by a Citadel, and Fortifications that were once thought inaccessible. There was in it a Garrison of 9000 Men, and more than all, the King of Sweden himself. The Kings of Denmark and Prussibesieged it with an Army of 36000 Men, consisting of Prussians, Danes and Saxons.

The Honour of besieging Charles was so engaging a Motive to them, that they surmounted all Obstacles, and the Trenches were opened in the Night between the 19th and 20th of Ostob. 1715.

The King of Sweden said at first, he wondered how any Place well manned and fortified could possibly be taken. Not but that he had taken many Towns himself in the Course of his Victories, but never any one by regular Attack. It was the Terror of his Arms that gained them. Besides, he never judged of others by himself, nor made a proper Accompt of his Enemies. The Besiegers carried on their Works with great Vigour, in which they were strangely assisted by an uncommon Accident.

It is well known that the Baltick has no Flux and Reflux. And the Retrenchment that covered the Town was thought impracticable, having an unpassable Marsh upon the West, and the Sea to the East. Never any one had observed before, that in a strong westerly Wind the Waves of the Baltick do roll back in such a Manner as to leave but three Feet Water under the Retrenchment, and they always took it to be here considerable deep.

A Soldier happening to fall from the Top of the Retrenchment, was furprized to find a Bottom, and imagined that Discovery, would make his Fortune. He deserted, and went to Count Wakerbaib's Quarters, who was General of the Stwon Forces, telling him that the Sea was fordable, and that it would be easy to earry the Swedes Retrenchments. The King of Prussia was not wanting to improve the Hint.

The next Night the Wind being still at West, Lieutenant Colonel Koppen went into the Water with 1800 Men, 2000 advanced at the same Time upon the Causeway that led to the Intrenchments: all the Prussian Artillery fired, and the Prussians and Danes gave an Alarm on the other Side.

The Swedes were confident they could deal with those who according to all Appearance came on so rashly by the Causeway; but Koppen with his 1800 Men entered the Fortification from the Sea, and so that they could make no Head; and the Post was carried after a prodigious Slaughter. Some of the Swedes retired into the Town, but the Besiegers followed them, and some got in with those that fled. Two Officers, and four of the Saxon Soldiers, were got upon the Drawbridge; but the Swedes had just Time enough to raile it, and took the Men, and so for that Time the Town was saved.

They found four and twenty pieces of Cannon upon the Retrenchments, which they turned against the Town. The Siege after this fuccess was carried on with all possible Eagerness, and the Town was cannonaded and bombarded without Remission.

Over-against Straelfund, upon the Balsick, is the Island of Rugen, which serves ferves for a Defence to this Place, whither the Garrison and People could retire upon Occasion, if they had but Boats. This Island was of great Consequence to Charles; for he knew if once the Enemy were Masters of it, he should foon be invested both by Sea and Land, and probably buried in the Ruins of Straelsund, or else be a Prisoner to those whom he had before so much despised, and treated with such Severity. However, the ill State of his Affairs had not allowed him to fend a sufficient Garrison to Rugen, there being no more than two thousand regular Troops in all upon the Island.

The Enemy had been for three Months making all proper Dispositions for a Descent thither, which was very difficult: but having built Boats for the Purpose, the Prince of Anhalt, by the Favour of good Weather, landed at last 12000 Men upon that Place on the 15th of Nov. That very Day the King had been defending an Outwork for three Hours, and coming back very much fatigued, he was told that the Danes and Prusfians were in Rugen. It was eight o'Clock at Night, and he went directly in a Fisher boat with Poniatosky, Grothusen, During and Dardorf, and by nine they got to the Island. He joined his two thousand Men, who were entrenched near a little Haven about three Leagues from where the Enemy had landed. He marched with them, ar Midnight in great Silence. The Prince of Anhalt had already entrenched his Troops, with a Caution that seemed unnecessary. His Officers expected nothing in the Night, and thought Charles was at Straelfund. But the Prince, who knew what Charles was capable of attrempting, ordered a deep Fosse to be funk with Chevaux de frise upon the Edge of it, and took as much Precaution as if he had to do with an Army of fuperior Force.

At two in the Morning Charles came to the Enemies Camp, without making the least Noise. His Soldiers faid to one another, let us pull up the Chevaux de frise; which Words were overheard by the Centinels; and the Alarm being quickly given, the Enemies stood to their Arms. The King taking up the Chevaux de frise, sees a great Fosse. Ay, says he, is it possible! this is more than I expetted! Not at all discouraged, and knowing nothing of their Numbers, nor they of his, for the Night favoured him in that, he refolved in an Instant, jumped into the Ditch, and some of the boldest with him, and all the rest were quickly af-The Chevaux de frise that ter him. were removed; the levell'd Earth Trunks and Branches of Trees as they could be found, and the Bodies of the Dead who fell by Random shot served for Fascines. The King, the Generals, and the boldest of the Officers and Soldiers mounted upon the Shoulders of others as in Affaults. The Fight began in the Enemies Camp; and the Vigour of the Swedes put the Danes and Pruffians into great Diforder; but their Numbers being too unequal, the Swedes, were repulsed in about a quarter of an Hour, and repaifed the Fosse. The Prince of Anbalt bursued them to the Plain, little thinking it was Charles who fled before him. The unfortunate King had rallied his Troops in the Field, and the Fight was renewed with equal Warmth on both Sides. He faw his Favourite Yуу Grotbusen and General Dardorf sall, and passed over the last in fighting before he was quite dead. During, his Companion from Turky to Straelund, was killed before his Face.

In the Heat of the Battle a Danish Lieutenant whose Name I never could be informed of, knew the King of Sweden, and clapping one Hand on his Sword, and with the other feizing him by the Hair; yield your felf a Prisoner, 'Sir, said he, or I will kill you upon the Spot. Charles drew a Pistol from his Belt, and, with his Left Hand, fired it at the Officer, who died of the Shot the next Morning. The Name of King Charles, which the Dane had pronounced, drew a Croud of Enemies together in a Moment, the King was immediately furrounded, and received a Musket Shot below his Breast. The Wound, which he only called a Contusion, was two Fingers deep: The King was then on Foot, and in the utmost Danger of being either made a Prisoner, or slain, Count Poniatosky, at this critical Instant, fought near his Majesties Person. He had already faved the King's Life at Pultowa, and had the good Fortune to preserve him once more in the Battle of Rugen, and to remount him very feafonably.

The Swedes retired to a Part of the Island named Alteferra, where there was a Fort they were yet Masters of. From thence the King returned to Straelfund, obliged to leave those brave Troops who had served him so well in that Expedition: and they were all made Prisoners of War two Days after.

Among the Prisoners was that unfortunate French Regiment, the Remains of the Battle of Hochster, which had been in the Service of King Augustus, and afterwards with the King of Sweden. Most of the Soldiers were incorporated into a new Regiment belonging to the Prince of Anhalt's Son, who was their fourth Master. In Rugen the Commander of this wandering Regiment was then the famous Count de Villelongue, who had so generously ventured his Life at Adrianople to serve King Charles. He was taken with his Men, and but ill rewarded afterwards for all his Services, Fatigues and Sufferings.

The King after all these Prodigies of Valour having only weakned himfelf, and continuing to be shut up in Straelfund, and ready to be taken, was yet the same as he had been before at Bender; he was surprized at nothing. All the Day he was making Ditches and Intrenchments behind the Walls; and at Night he fallied out upon the Enemy. The Town however was shattered milerably, the Bombs fell thick upon the Houses, and half the Town reduced to Ashes. The Inhabitants far from repining, were charmed to Admiration at their Master, whose Temperance, Fatigues and Courage aftonished them beyond Expression; they acted as Soldiers under him; following him to the Sallies, and were now become as good as another Garrison.

One Day as the King was dictating to a Secretary some Dispatches for Sweden, a Bomb falling on the House, came through the Roof, and burst very near his Room. Part of the Floor fell down; but the Closet where the King was being worked into a thick Wall, was not shatter'd; and by a wonderful wonderful good Fortune none of the Splinters came in at the door, tho it was open. In this Noise and Confusion the Secretary dropped his Pen, and thought the House was coming down. What ails you, says the King very calmly, why don't you write? The Man could only bring out, The Bomb, Sir! Well, says the King, and what has that to do with our Business? go on.

An Embassador of France was then thut up in Straelfund with the King of Sweden, M. Colbert Count de Crossy, one of the King's Lieutenant Generals, and Brother to the Marquis de Torcy, a famous Statesman, related to the great Colbert, whose Name in France will be immortal. To send a Man on an Embassy to Charles, or into Trenches was much the same. The King would talk with Croiffy for Hours together, in Places of the greatest Danger; while People fell on all Sides killed by the Bombs and Cannon, the King having no Sense of it; and the Embassador not caring to fay any Thing, to make him chuse a fitter Place to talk of Bufiness. Before the Siege, this Minister took a deal of Pains to make an Accommodation between the King of Sweden and Prusha: But the latter was too high in his Demands; and the other would not make any Concessions. So that the Count de Croissy had only this Satisfaction in his Embaffy. to be acquainted intimately with a Man of his fingular Character. He has often flept by him upon the same Cloke; fo that by sharing with him in all his Dangers and Fatigues, he became very free with him, and Charles was not difpleased with that in any one he liked. He would fometimes say to Croiss, Veni, maledicamus de Rege. Come, now for a little Scandal on the King of Sweden.

Croissy stayed in the Town till the thirteenth of November. And then with the Enemy's Permission for him and his Baggage, he took his Leave of Charles, whom he left among the Ruins of Straelsund, with but one third remaining of his Garrison, and in full Resolution to stand an Assault.

In four Days the Enemy made an Affault upon the Hornwork, which they took twice, and were as often beaten off. The King was always fighting among the Granadiers: but at last their Number prevailing, they became Masters of it. Charles continued in the Place two Days after that. The one and twentieth, he staid till Midnight upon a little Ravelin that was quite destroyed by the Bombs and Cannon. The next Day the chief Officers entreated him to stay no longer in a Place which could not be defend-But to retreat was now as dangerous as to stay. The Baltick was covered with Muscovite and Danish Ships. In the Port of Straelfund there was a small Bark with Sails and Oars. The extreme Danger which made such a Retreat glorious, induced Charles to confent to it, and he embarked the 20th of December 1715, at Night, with only ten Persons. They were obliged to break the Ice to get out, which took them up several Hours before the Vessel could make her way. The Enemy's Admiral had strict Orders not to let Charles escape from Straelfund, but to be fure to take him dead or alive. It happened well for him, that they were under the Wind, and so could not come near him. But Y y y 2 his his greatest Danger was in passing by a Place called la Barbette in Rugen, where the Danes had fixed a Battery of twelve Cannon. They fired upon the King, but the Sailors made all the Sail they could to get clear of them. Two Men were killed close by him, and by another Shot the Mast was shatteted, Thro' all these Dangers the King came up with two of his Ships that were cruifing in the Baltick, and the next Day Straelfund was furrendered, the Garrison were made Prisoners of War. and the King landed at Ished in Scania, and came to Carelferoan in a very different Condition from what he had gone in from thence Fifteen years before in a Ship of 120 Guns to give Law to all the North.

Being so near his Capital, it was expected he would have gone thither after so long Absence. But he could not bear to think of that till he had got some signal Victories. Besides, he could not prevail upon himself to rewisit a People who loved him, and whom he was compelled to oppress, in order to defend them against their Enemies. He was only defirous to fee his Sister, and sent for her to meet him near the Lake Weter in Offrogothia. He went Post with but one to attend him, stayed a Day with her, and came back.

At Carelfcroon, where he staid the Winter, he ordered new Levies every where. He thought his Subjects were only born to follow him to War, and he had used them all to think so too.

He listed many who were but sifteen Years old. In several Villages there were none less but old Men, Children and Women; and in some Places, the Women plowed the Ground alone.

It was yet harder for him to have a Fleet. But to bring that about, Com. missions were given to Privateers, who having great Privileges, to the Ruin of the Country, provided him some Ships. This was the last Shift could be made in Sweden: to support the Expence of which, it was necessary to break in upon the People's Property. and there was no Sort of Extortion, but it was practifed under the Name of Taxes, All the Houses were searched, and the half of their Provisions carried into the King's Warehouses. The Iron of the Country was all bought up for his Use, and paid for in Paper, which he fold out for ready, Money. Whoever had any Silk in their Clothes, or wore Perukes, or gilded Swords. were taxed; and there was a great Rate for Hearth-money. A People loaded thus with Taxes would have rebelled against any other King; but here the most miserable Peasant knew his Master fared much harder than himself: So they submitted quietly to what their King was always the first to suf-

In the publick Dangers, private Misfortunes were not thought of. They expected every Moment to have the Muscovites, the Danes, the Prussions, the Saxons, and the English making a Descent into Sweden. And the Fear of this was so strong upon them, and not without Reason, that those who had Money or valuable Goods took care to bury them.

Already there was an English Fleet in the Baltick, and their Orders were entirely unknown to the Sweday; and the King of Denmark had the Czarsa Word Word for it, that the next Spring he would affift in making a Descent into Sweden.

It was an extreme Surprize to all Europe, who were attentive to the Fortune of Charles, when instead of his Country which was threatened with Invasions by so many Princes, he marched into Norway in the Month of March with 20000 Men.

Since Hannibal, the World has not feen any General, who, when he could not make Head against his Enemies at Home, had ever gone to attack them in their own Dominious. His Brother-in-law the Prince of Hesse attended him in this Expedition.

There is no going from Sweden to Norway, but thro' By ways that are very dangerous; and after that one meets at every Turn with Flashes of Water from the Sea among the Rocks, that Bridges must be made once a Day at least. A very few Danes might have stopped the Swedish Army; but such a quick Invasion they could not foresee. Europe was yet more at a Loss to find the Czar so quiet, and not making a Descent into Sweden as he had before agreed with his Allies.

This Inaction was the Consequence of one of the greatest Designs, and at the same time the most difficult to be executed of any that were ever formed by the Imagination of Man.

Henry Baron de Goerts, born in Holstein, and Minister of a Prince who had nothing lest but the Title of a Duke, had done great Services to the King of Sweden during his Stay at Bender, and was now become his Favourite and first Minister.

No Man ever was at once so bold and so insinuating: so full of Shifts at an ill Turn: or had fuch vast Designs, or was so active in what he went about: no Project was too much for him; and for Means he was never at a Los: he would pursue his Designs at any Rate, with a Profusion of Presents, Promises, Oaths, Truth or Falshood.

From Sweden he went to France, England and Holland, to lay the Foundation of those Designs, which he intended afterwards to put in Execution, He was capable of inflaming all Europe, and had it in his Head. He was in the Cabinet, what his Master was at the Head of an Army, and this gave him over Charles a greater Ascendant than any Minister ever had before him,

This King, who at twenty Years of Age had given Orders to Count Piper, was willing to receive them now from Baron Goerts, and was the more submissive, because his Missortunes had put him under a Necessity of taking Advice: Besides that, Goerts gave him only fuch as was fuitable to his high Courage. He found that of all the Princes who were in League against him, Charles's Resentment was chiefly against George Elector of Hanover, and King of England: because he was the only one to whom Charles had never given any Cause of Complaint, and who engaged in the Quatrel under the Pretext of Mediation, and with the fole View of holding Bremen and Verden, which he bought for a Trifle of the King of Denmark, to whom they did not belong.

It was early that he discovered the Czar's secret Discontent against the Allies, who had all prevented his having any Footing in Germany. Wisman, the only Town remaining to the Smedes on this Side of Germany, was just surrendered to the Danes and Prussians on the 14th of February 1716, who would not so much as suffer the Muscovites who were in Mecklenbourg to appear at the Siege. Such repeated Signs of Diffidence for two Years together had provoked the Czar, and did perhaps prevent the utter Ruin of Sweden. There are many Instances of a Number of States in Alliance conquered by a fingle Power, but feldom any of a great Empire that has been conquered by feveral Allies. For what their Strength subdues, their Divisions seldom fail to restore.

So long as from the Year 1714, the Czar had had it in his Power to make a Descent on Sweden; but whether he could not agree with the Kings of Poland, England, Denmark and Prussa, Allies who had but too much Cause to be jealous of his Proceedings, or whether it was that he thought his Troops not enough seasoned to attack that People at Home, whose very Peasants had beat the best of the Banish Forces: he still took care to put it off.

The Want of Money was what had likewise hitherto delayed him. the Czar was one of the greatest Monarchs in the World, but none of the richest, his Revenue at that Time not amounting to above 18 Millions of French Livres. He had discovered Mines of Gold, Silver, Iron and Copper, but the Gain to be made of them was very uncertain, and the working them expensive. He had established a large Commerce; but the Beginnings of it only furnished him with Hopes. His new Conquest, encreased his Power and his Fame, but brought him very little Treasure. It was a Work of Time to bind up the Wounds of Livonia, a fertile Country, which had suffered very much by a sisteen Years War by Fire, Sword and Plague, almost unpeopled, and become chargeable to the Conqueror. The Fleets he now maintained, and every Day some new Enterprize, was what exhausted all his Treasures. He had been reduced to the wretched Expedient of raising the Coin, a Remedy that never cures the Mischief, and is particularly prejudicial to any Country whose imported Commodities are larger then their Exports.

It was upon these Grounds that Goerts had laid the Design of a Revolution; he was bold enough to propose to the King of Sweden to make his Peace at any Rate with the Emperor of Muscovy, infinuating that the Czar was very angry with the Kings of Poland and England, and giving him withal to understand, that Peter Alexiowitz and Charles together, might. make the rest of Europe tremble.

There was no making Peace with the Czar, without yielding up to him a good many Provinces that lie to the East and North of the Baltick: but Gaerts made his Master sensible, that in yielding such Places as the Czar was Master of already, and himself in no Condition to retrieve, he might have the Honour of replacing Stanislaus on the Throne of Poland, and setting the Person who was called James the second's Son upon that of England, besides restoring the Duke of Holstein, to his Dominions.

Charles was pleased with these grand Ideas, the without building much upon them, and gave his Minister Leave to act at large. Goers left Sweden with with full Powers, which made him a Plenipotentiary to any Princes he had a Mind to treat with. His first Business was to try how the Court of Moscow stood affected, which he did by the Means of one Areskine, a Scotsman, the Czar's chief Physician, a Man devoted to the Pretender's Interest, as most of the Scats were, who did not subsist on Favours from the Court at London.

This Physician set forth to Prince Menzikoff the Grandeur and Importance of such a Project, with all the Vivacity of a Man who was so much interested in the Event. Prince Menzikoff was pleased with the Proposal, and the Czar came into it. Instead of a Descent in Sweden, as had been agreed between him and his Allies, he sent his Troops to winter in Meklembourg, and came there himself on Pretence to settle some Disputes between the Duke and his Nobles: but in Reality to purfue his Favourite Purpose to gain a Principality in Germany, for which he hoped to make a Bargain with the Duke.

The Allies were greatly irritated at this Proceeding, not caring to have fo terrible a Neighbour near them. who, if once he should have any Footing in Germany, might get to be Emperor, to the Oppression of all the Sovereigns there. The greater their Resentment was Goert's Project went on the better. However, he negotiated with all the Confederates, in order to conceal his private Intrigues. The Czar amused them all with Hopes, and Charles was all this while with his Brother-in-law the Prince of Hesse in Norway, at the Head of 20000 Men; The Country was defended by 11000 Danes divided into several Parties; which were all put to the Sword by the King and Prince of Heffe.

Charles advanced towards Christiania the Capital of the Kingdom: and Fortune began again to smile on him in this Part of the World: but he never took a proper Care to subsist his Troops, while an Army and Fleet of Danes were coming to defend Norway. Charles for Want of Provisions, was forced to retire to Sweden, there to wait the Issue of his Minister's De-

The Affair required the utmost Secrecy and vast Preparations, two Things almost incompatible. But Goerts contrived to fetch them from the Asiatick Seas. And however odious in Appearance the Means might be, they were proper enough for the Purpose of a Descent in Scotland, and at least would proque Men and Money, and Ships for Sweden.

There had been Pirates of all Nations, especially English, who were in Association insesting the Seas of Europe and America. No Quarter was given them, and they had retired to Madagascar, a large Island on the East of Africk: being quite desperate and famous for Actions, which wanted nothing but Justice to make them heroic. They looked for a Prince who would receive them under his Protection; but the Law of Nations had shut them out from every Harbour in the World.

When they knew that Charles was come back to Sweden, they had great Hopes, that he being a Prince who was fond of War, and forced to be so engaged, and wanting a Fleet and Soldiers, would be glad of a Composition with them upon easy Terms; so they sent a Person in a Dutch Ship to propose propose to Baron Geeres that they might be received at Gottenburg, where they promised to be ready with three-score Ships loaded with Freasures.

The Baron brought the King into the Business, and Kromstrom and Mendal, two Swedish Gentlemen, were sent soon after to transact it with them.

But a more honourable and likely Help was afterwards found in Cardinal Alberoni an extraordinary Genius, who managed the Affairs of Spain long enough for his own Reputation, though not for the Good and Glory of that Kingdom.

He came with great Willingness into the Proposal of setting James the Second's pretended Son upon the Throne of England. However, as he was but just come into the Ministry. and Spain was to be fettled before he could pretend to overturn other Kingdoms, there was no great Likelihood of his being able to put a Hand to the Work for a long Time, yet in lefs than two Years, he had done so much for Spain, that the made quite another Figure in Europe; and they say, the Turks were engaged to fall upon the Emperor; and Measures taken to depose the Duke of Orleans from the Regency of France, and King George from the Throne of Great-Britain: fuch Danger there is in a fingle Man, who has an absolute Power in any Country, and has likewise the Sense and Spirit to make Use of it.

Georis having thus scatter'd in the Courts of Muscovy and Spain, the first Sparks of the Flame he intended to kindle, went privately to France, and from thence to Holland, where he saw the Adherents to the Presender's Party.

He was well informed of the Strength, the Number, and Disposition of the disaffected in England, what Money they could raise, and what Men they could bring into the Field. They asked no more than ten thousand Men, and were pretty sure of Success, if they had but that Assistance.

Count Gillenbourg, the Swedish Embassador in England, instructed by Goerts, had several Meetings at London; he gave them great Encouragement, and promised all they could wish. They Pretender's Friends with the chief of the disassected Party went so far as to advance considerable Sums, which Goerts received in Holland. He negotiated the Purchase of several Ships, and bought six in Great-Britain with all Sorts of Ammunition.

Then he fent privately some Officers to France, particularly the Chevalier de Folard, who having made thirty Campaigns in the French Service. without improving his Fortune, had been to offer his Service to the King of Sweden, not with any confiderable Views of Interest, but rather to serve under a King of that surprizing Reputation. This Gentleman performed in France all the fecret Orders of Goerts. A great many French, but more Irish Officers, came into this new Design. which was working at the same Time in England, France, Spain, and Muscovy; and the Branches of it privately foread through all Europe.

But all these Preparations were nothing to Baron de Goerts, though pretty well for a Beginning. The main Point without which there could be no Success was, to settle a Peace between the Czar and Charles; and many Difficulties there were in the Way. The Baron Osterman, Minister of State in Muscowy, was not so ready to agree with Goerts. He was as cautious as the other was warm. One was for letting Things ripen by Degrees; the other would reap as well as sow at once. Osterman was afraid his Master, being pleased with the Design, would grant Terms too advantageous to Sweden; and so delayed the Conclusion of the Affair.

Very luckily for Goerts the Czar himself came to Holland in the Beginning of the Year 1717, his design was to visit France, and he had a desire to see that samous Nation which for above a Century past has been censured, envied, and imitated by all its Neighbours: he there intended to satisfy his Curiosity of seeing and learning; and to exercise his Politicks.

Goerts had two Conferences with the Emperor at the Hague, and by that made a better Progress than he could have done in fix Months with Plenipotentiaries. Every Thing went well. ·His great Designs appeared impenetrable; and he hoped they would only 'be discovered in the Execution. his Discourse at the Hague turned upon Peace, and he openly declared that he regarded the King of Great-Britain as the Difpenser of Pacification in the North; and he pressed exceedingly to have a Congress at Brunswick, where the Interests of Sweden and its Enemies might be settled amicably.

The first who discovered these Intrigues was the Duke of Orleans, Regent of France: for he had Spies in all the Courts of Europe. These Sort of Men, whose Trade it is to sell the Secrets of their Blends at and Wife get their Living by being Informers, and frequently by publishing Calumnies, were mightily encreased in his Time in France; so that one half of the Kingdom were Spies upon the other. The Duke having personal Obligations to the King of England, made a Discovery of the whole Design against him.

At the same Time the Hollanders taking umbrage at Goert's Behaviour, communicated their Suspicions to the English Ministry. Goerts and Gillenbourg were going on briskly, when one was seized at the Hague, and the other in London.

Gillenbourg as Embassador from Sweden, having offended against the Law of Nations by this Conspiracy against a Prince to whom he was sent in a publick Character, they did not scruple in England the Violation of his Person. But it was thought exceeding strange in the States General 10 imprison the Baron de Goerts out of meer Complaifance to the King of Nay they went so far as to England. appoint Count Velderen to question This was carrying it very far; but as they could make nothing of it. it only turned to their own Confusion. Goerts asked the Count de Velderen, if be knew bim? Yes Sir, fays the Dutch-Well then, says the Baron de Goerts, if you do, you must needs know that I shall say but just what I please. Such a Thing was scarce ever heard of before; all the foreign Ministers, particularly the Marquis de Monteleone, the Spanish Embassidor in England, protested against the Wrong done to the Persons of Goerts and Gillenbourg. Nothing could excuse the Hollanders 280r breaking a Law to facred, in feiz- $\mathbf{Z}\mathbf{z}\mathbf{z}$. ing ing the King of Sweden's Prime Minither, who had never done any Thing against them; and to act so directly contrary to that valuable Freedom, which has been the only Cause of all their Greatness.

The King of England had done no more than right in feizing an Enemy: what they found among Gil. lenbourg's Papers of Letters between him and Goerts, were printed to justify the King's Proceedings. The King of Sweden was in Scania, when the printed Letters came with the News of his Minister's being seized. He only smiled, and asked, if bis Letters were printed too? and order'd the English Resident, and all his Family at Stockbolm, to be feized. But he could not take the same Revenge upon the Dutch, because they had no Minister then at the Court of Sweden. However, he took no Notice one way or other of the Thing, for he was too haughty todeny what he had once ap. proved; and wifer than to own a Project that had proved abortive; so he kept a disdainful Silence towards England and Holland.

The Czar's Behaviour was quite of therwise. As he was not named, but only hinted at by distant Intimations in the Letters of Goerts and Gillenbourg, he wrote a long Letter sull of Civilities to the King of Great-Britain upon the Discovery, with great Assurances of his sincere Friendship. King George received his Protestations without crediting them, tho' he seemed to suffer himself to be persuaded of their Reality, and pretended to believe them. A Plot laid by and privateMen, if once it's blown, is at an End.; but where Kings are concerned, a Discovery does but make it go on the faster. The Czar came to Paris in May 1717, and had something to do besides seeing the Wonders of Art and Nature there; the Academies, the publick Libraries, the Cabinets of the Curious, and the Royal Palaces. He made a Propofal to the Regent, which had it been complied with, might have compleated the Greatness of the Musco-His Delign was to make vites. with the King of Sweden, Peace who would yield to him many great Countries: to take from the Danes their Power in the Baltick; to weaken the English by a civil War; and bring to Muscowy all the Commerce of the North. He had Thoughts too of fetting up Stanislaus against King Augustus; so that the Fire being kindled every where, he might be able to blow it up or damp it, as he should see Occasion. With this View he proposed to the Regent to be a Mediator between Sweden and Muscovy, and to come an Alliance offenfive and defensive with them and Spain. This Treaty, though so very natural, and for the good of those Nations, and tho? it would put the Balance of Europe into their Hands. was yet rejected by the Duke of Onleans: for he did exactly the reverse of all this, making a League with the Emperor and the King of England, Reasons of State had then such Influence over all Princes, that the Czar was going to declare War against his old Ally Augustus, and to take Part with Charles, his mortal Enemy; while France in Favour of the English and German buyas going to War with a Grandson

Grandson of Louis the XIVth, after having fo long supported him against those very Enemies at such Expence of Blood and Treasure. All that the Czar could get by this Application, was, that the Regent should interpose for the Enlargement of Baron Goerts and Gillenbourg. He returned to Muscowy about the End of June, having shewn France a rare Example of an Emperour travelling for Instruction. But most of the People in France faw nothing of him but a rough unpolished Outside, the Effects of his Education, while the Legislator, and the great Man who had founded a new Nation, quite escaped their Observation.

What he looked for from the Duke of Orleans, he quickly found in Cardinal Alberoni, who now governed all in Spain. Alberoni wished for nothing more than to establish the Pretender; first, as he was a Minister of Spain which had been so ill used by the English; then as having a personal Pique against the Duke of Orleans for his close Alliance with England against Spain; besides, that he was a Priest of that Church, for which the Pretender's Father has so injud, jously lost his Crown.

The Duke of Ormond, as much loved in England, as the Duke of Marlborough was admired, had left his Country at the Time of King George's Accession, and was now in Spain. He went with full Commission from the King of Spain and the Pretender, to meet the Czar upon his Way to Mittau in Courland, and had with him one Jernegan, an Englishman of Sense and Spirit. The Bulinels was to alk the Princess Anna Petrona, the Czar Daughter, in Marriage for James's pretended Son, in Hop es tha fuch an Alliance would bring the Czar into the Interest of that Prince. This Proposal had like to have marred, instead of mending Matters; for Biron Goerts, among the rest of his Schemes, had long intended this Lady for the Duke of Holstein, who married her afterwards. As foon as he heard of the Duke of Ormond's Negotiation, he grew jealous, and did all he could to defeat it. He was fet at Liberty in August, and so was Count Gillenbourg. without the King of Sweden so much as offering any Excuse to the King of England, or expressing the least Diflike of what his Minister had been do-

At the same Time the English Resident, and all his Family at Stockbolm, were released, where their Treatment had been a great deal worse than Gillenbourg's at London.

When Goerts had obtained his Liberty, he became an implacable Enemy; for besides his other Views, he wanted now to be revenged. He went Post to the Czar, who was better pleased than ever with him; for he undertook in less than three Months, with but one Plenipotentiary from Mujervy, to remove all Obstructions to a Peace with Sweden. He takes up a Map of the Czar's own drawing, and making a Line from Wibourg by the Lake Ladoga, quite to the frozen Ocean, promised to bring his Master to part with all that lay to the East of that Line, besides Carelia, Ingria, and Livonia. Then he began upon the Marriage of the Czar's Daughter to Zzzz the Duke of Holstein, giving great Hopes that the Duke would readily surrencer to him his Country for an equivalent: and if once he got to be a Member of the Empire, the Imperial Crown would come of Course to him or some of his Descendants. Thus he pleased the Czar's Ambition, took the Pretender's Mistress from him, but opened a Way for him in England, and brought about the whole of all his own Designs at once.

The Czar named the Isle of Aland for the Conference between Osterman and Goerts; and desired the Duke of Ormond to return to Spain, lest the English Court should take the Alarm; for he had no Mind to break with them till the Time of the Invasion. But Jernegan the Duke's Consident, who was to manage Matters, stay'd at Petersburg, lodging very privately, and going only out o'nights, and whenever he saw any of the Czar's Ministers, it was always in the Disguise of a Peasant or a Tartar.

As foon as the Duke of Ormond went, the Czar took Care to make a Merit of it to the King of England, that he fent away the greatest Man of the Pretender's Party. And the Baron de Goerts returned to Sweden with great Hopes of Success.

He found his Master at the Head of 30000 regular Troops, and all the Coast guarded by the Militia. The King wanted nothing but Money; but publick Credit was lost at Home and Abroad. France had afforded him some Subsidies in the latter Days of Loilis XIV, but the Duke of Orleans having other Views, would give him none. He was promised some from Spain; but that Country was not yet. in a Condition to supply him. Baron Goerts upon this set on Foot a Project he had tried before he went to France and Holland. It was, to make a Peace of Copper, of the same Value as Silver: so that a half penny, with the Prince's Mark, might pass for thirty or forty Pence: as sometimes the Governors of belieged Towns have paid their Soldiers and the People in leather Money, till they could get better. This Sort of Money, made at an Emergency, which can never have any Credit if it be not punctually made good, is no better than Bills, whose imaginary Value may easily exceed the Fund of Money that any State is worth.

Such Expedients are of excellent Use in a free Country, and have been the faving often of a Republick; but in a Monarchy nothing can be more deflructive; for the People quickly growing Suspicious, the Minister is reduced to the Necessity of being unpunctual to his Word, the imaginary Money encreases fast upon them; and those who have any Species by them, secure it under Ground; which makes the whole Machine sall to Consusion, not without great Mischief. This was then the Case of Sweden.

Baron Goerts had paid out his new Coin with a good deal of Discretion: but was quickly carried beyond his first Design by the Rapidity of a Motion which he knew not how to govern. All Sorts of Goods and Provisions were grown excessive dear, so that he was obliged to multiply his Copper Coin. The more there was of it, the less the Value was; and the Country found found it such a Grievance, that the general Cry rose against Baron Goerts. Such was the Veneration the People had for Charles, that they could not hate him; but the Weight of their Displeasure fell upon his Minister, who being a Foreigner, and at the Head of the Treasury, was sure to suffer under the publick Hatred.

A Tax that he intended on the Clergy, compleated all. The Priests are but too apt to make it God's Cause whenever they are touched; and cried him down for an arrant Atheist; because he attempted to meddle with their Money; and the new Money being stamped with the Figures of heathen Gods, they took Occasion from thence to call those Pieces, the Gods of Baron Goerts.

The Ministry, growing jealous of him, fell in with this universal IIatred: and the less their Power was. they were the more implacable. King's Sifter and the Prince her Husband had reason to fear, that his Birth obliging him to befriend the Duke of Holftein, he might bring it about at last to make him King of Sweden. Never any in the Nation liked him but the King, who was the more confirmed in his good Liking by the publick Hatred. He confided in him with entire Relignation, giving him absolute Power at Home; and trusting to him without Reserve in all Transactions with the Czar, especially as to the Conference at Aland, which of all Things he wished him to press with the utmost Expedition.

The Affairs of the Treasury demanding his Attendance and immediate Care, as soon as ever he had pur them on a tolerable Foot, he went away directly to finish with Osterman the great Work he had in Hand.

And these were the Preliminaries of that Alliance, which was to have wholly changed the Face of Affairs in Europe, as they were found after Geerts's Death among his Papers.

The Czar was to keep all Livonia, Part of Ingria and Carelia, leaving all the rest to Sweden. He was to join with Charles in restoring Staniflaus in Poland, sending thither 80000 Men, to dethrone that very King on. whose Side he had been fighting for ten Years before; he was to furnish Ships to carry 10000 Swedes to Germany, and thirty thousand into Ger-The Forces of both were to fall upon the King of England's German Dominions, especially those of Bremen and Verden, the same Troops were to restore the Duke of Holstein, and force the King of Prussia to an Accommodation, by parting with a good deal of his new Acquisitions. Charles began to take upon him as if his own victorious Troops, joined by the Czar's, had done all this: and infifted with the Emperor to execute the Treaty of Alranstadt. Court of Vienna would scarce vouchfafe an Answer to a Proposal from one of whom they had so little to fear.

The King of Poland was not altogether so secure, but saw the Storm a coming. The Polish Nobility had formed a Consederacy against him, and he had been obliged ever since his Re-establishment on the Throne, to be engaged in Wars or Treaties with his own Subjects. The Czar who was now become a dangerous Mediator, Mediator, was much to be feared, for he had an hundred Gallies near Dantzick, and 40000 Men hovering upon the Frontiers of Poland. All the North was full of Jealousy and Apprehensions. Fleming the most distrustful Man living, and of all Men living the most to be distrusted, was the first who suspected the Designs of the Czar and King of Sweden in Favour of King Stanislaus; so he endeavoured to have this Prince seized in the Duchy of Deux-Ponts, as James Sobieski had been surprized before in Silesia.

Saissan, one of those turbulent and enterprising French Men who wander into foreign Countries to try their Fortune, had lately brought several of his Country men like himself into the Service of the King of Poland. He imparted to Fleming, a Project, which he undertook to go with thirty. French Officers, whom he had wrought into such a disposition, that they were determined to seize Stanislaus in his Palace, and convey him a Prisoner to Dresden. This Project was received with Approbation, Enterprizes of that Nature were very frequent in those Days. Some of those Wretches, who, in Italy are called Bravos, had acted fuch a Scene in the Milanese, during the last War between Germany and France: And even fince that Transaction several French Men, who had fled to Holland for Refuge, had the Prefumption to penetrate as far as Versailles, with an Intention to carry off the Dauphin, and they seized the Person of the first Equerry, almost under the Windows of the Castle where Lewis. the Fourteenth resided.

had disposed his Men and Post Horses. in Order to surprise Stanistaus; but the Enterprise was discovered the Night before its intended Execution. Several of the Affociates knew what had happened, and some were seized. They could not expect to be treated like Prisoners of War. but rather as Banditti; but Stanislaus, instead of punishing them suitably to their Demerit, contented himself with reproaching them with an amiable Intermixture of Goodness and Humanity. He even distributed Money among them to defray their Expences in their Return to Poland, and made it apparent, by this generous Proceeding. that his Rival Augustus had reason to fear him.

In the mean Time Charles was going to make a fecond Attempt upon Norway, in Ostober 1718, and he had laid Matters so, that he did not doubt to be Master of that Kingdom in six Months. He rather chose to go and conquer Rocks, amidst Snow and Ice, in the Severity of the Winter which kills the very Animals even in Sweden, where the Air is less rigorous, than regain his beautiful Provinces in Germany; but he hoped his new Alliance with the Czar would foon put him in a Condition to retake them. Belides his Ambition was pleased with the Thought of forcing a Kingdom from his conquering Enemy.

the Month of December, The Cold was fo extreme, that the Soldiers could hardly break the Ground. They might as well have opened Trenches in a Rock; but the Swedes never thought much of any Fatigues in which they faw their King take his Share so readily; and Charles himself never suffer'd more than now. His Constitution by eighteen Years Labour was hardened to that Degree, that he would fleep in the open Field in Norway, in the midst of Winter, upon Boards or Straw, covered only with his Cloke, without prejudicing his Health. Several of the Soldiers in their Posts fell down dead with Cold, and others who were ready to die durst not complain when they faw their King bear what they suffered. A little before this Expedition, hearing of a Woman in Scania, named Foan Dotter, who had lived feveral Months upon nothing but Water; he, who had studied all his Life to bear the worst Extremes that human Nature can support, was resolved to try how long he was able to fast. He neither eat nor drank for five Days, and on the fixth, in the Morning, he rid two Leagues, and then alighted at the Tent of his Brother-in-law the Prince of Hesse, where he gat very heartily, without feeling the least Diforder, elther from his long Fasting, or his full Eating atterward.

With such a Body of Iron, and a Soul of to much Strength and Courage, in every Condition, there was not one of all his Neighbours who did not fear him.

On the 11th of December, being St. Andrew's Day, he went about nine at Night to fee the Trenches; and finding the Parallel not advanced to his Mind, he was a little displeased; but Mons. Megret, a French Engineer, who conducted the Siege, assured him, the Place would be taken in eight Days Time. We shall see, says the King, and going on with the Engineer to examine the Works, he stopped at a Place where the Boyau made an Angle with the Parallel, and kneeling upon the inner Talus, he leaned with his Elbows on the Parapet, to look upon the Men who were carrying on the Trenches by Starlight.

The least Circumstances that relate to the Death of so great a Man as Charles the XIIth are very important. I must therefore take upon me to say, that all the Conversation which has been reported by several Writers, and M. de la Motraye among the rest, to have passed between the King and Megret the Engineer, is absolutely salse. And the following Account is what I know to be the Truth of this Event.

The King stood with half his Body exposed to a Battery of Cannon exactiy levelled at the Angle where he was, Two Frenchmen were all who were then near his Person, one was Monsieur, Siker his Aid-de-camp, a Man of great Courage and Conduct, who came into his Service in Turky; and was particularly attached to the Prince of Hesse; the other was this Engineer.

The Cannon fired upon them with Chain shot, to which the King stood most exposed. Not far behind was Count Swerin, who commanded the Trenches. Count Posse, Captain of the Guards, and one Kulbert an Aidde camp, de-camp, received his Orders. Siker and Megret saw the King sall upon the Parapet, setching a deep Sigh. They ran to him, but he was already dead. A Ball of half a pound had struck him on the right Temple, and made a Hole big enough to turn their Fingers in. His Head lying over the Parapet, the left Eye was beat in, and the right was forced quite out of its Socket. He was dead the Moment he received this; but he had the Force in that Instant to put his Hand by a natural Motion to the Guard of his Sword, and lay in that Posture,

At this, Megret, a Man of great Indifference, only said, Let us be going, the Play is done. Siker ran immediately, and told Count Swerin, and they all agreed to keep it private till the Prince of Hesse could be informed of it. They covered the Corps with a grey Cloke; Siker put him on his Hat and Wig, and he was carried by the Name of Captain Carlsbern tho' the Troops, who saw their dead King pass, little thinking who it was.

The Prince gave Orders presently that none should stir out of the Camp, and that all the Passes to Sweden should be guarded, till he could take Measures for his Wife to claim the Crown, and to exclude the Duke of Holstein, who might possibly pretend to it.

Thus fell Charles XII. King of Sweden, at the Age of fix and thirty Years and a half, having known the Extreams of Prosperity, and of Adversity, without being softened by the one, or in the least disturbed for a Moment at the other. All his Actions, even those of his private Life, are almost beyond any measure of Probability. Perhaps he was the only Man. to be fure he was the only King, who ever had lived without Weakness. He carried all the Virtues of a Hero to that Excess, that they became as dangerous as any of the opposite Vices. His Resolution grown to Obstinaoccasioned his Missortunes in Ukrania, and kept him five Years in Turky. His Liberality degenerating into Profusion. ruined Sweden. great Qualities, any one of which had been enough to make another Prince immortal, were a Misfortune to his Country. He never began a Quarrel with any, but he was rather implacable than wife in his Resentment. He was the first who ever had the Ambition to be a Conqueror, without wishing to encrease his Dominions. His Defire to gain Kingdoms, was only that he might give them away. The Passion he had for Glory, for War, and for Revenge, made him too little of a Politician, without which the World never before faw any Prince a Conqueror. Before a Battle, he was full of Confidence; exceeding modest after a Victory, and in a Defeat undaunted. Sparing others no more than himself, he made a small Account of his own or his Subjects Lives or Labours; a Man extraordinary rather than a great Man, and fitter to be admired than imitated. His Life however may be a Lesson to Kings, and teach them, that a peaceful and happy Government is more to be defired than fo much Glory.

Charles XII. was tall and nobly shaped, he had a fine Forehead, large blue blue Eves full of Sweetness, and a handsome Nose: but the lower Part of his Face was disagreeable, and often disfigured by a frequent Laugh which hardly opened his Lips; he had little Beard or Hair; he spoke little, and! it was habitual to him to enswer only with that Laugh. At his Table there was always great Silence. With all that inflexible Temper of his, he was timorous and bashful, and would have been at a Loss in Conversation, for having given himself so wholly up to War, he knew but little of Society. Before his long Leisure in Turky, he had never read any thing but Cafar's Commentaries and the History of Alexander. But he had writ some Obfervations upon War and his own Campaigns, from 1700 to 1709, which he owned to the Chevalier de Folard, and faid the Manuscript was lost at the unfortunate Battle of Pultowa.

As to Religion, though the Sentiments of a Prince ought not to influence those of other Men; and the Opinion of a King fo little informed as Charles, can be of no great Weight in fuch Matters; yet it is proper that Men's Curiofity should be satisfied in this as well as other Particulars concerning him. I have it from the Gentleman who gave me most of the Materrals of this History, that Charles was a serious Lutheran till the Year 1707; he then faw the famous Philosopher Mons. Leibnitz at Leipsick, who was a Free thinker, and talked very freely, having instilled his Notions into more Princes than one. Charles learned from the Conversation of this Philosopher a good deal of Indifference for Lutheranism; which he carried afterwards much farther, when he had more Time in Turks, and had feen so many Sorts of Professions.

Of all his old Opinions he recained but one, which was absolute Predestination, a Doctrine that favoured his Courage, amb justified his Temerity. The Czar had much the same Opinions as to Religion and Fare: but he was more free to talk of them, as he did indeed of every thing elle with his Favourites very familiarly; for he had this Advantage over Charles, that he had studied Philosophy, and was a good Speaker.

I cannot help taking Notice here of a stander that is too often spread by credulous or ill meaning People, who will have it, that when Princes die, they were either poisoned or assissinated. And the Story went in Germany, that Monsieur Siker was the Man who killed the King of Sweden. That brave Officer was very uneasy at the Calumny a good while: and one day talking of it to me, he said these very Words, I might have killed the King of Sweden, but I had such a Veneration for the Hero, that the I had intended it, I could not offer to do it.

As foon as he was dead, the Siege of Fredericshall was raised. The Swedes, who thought his Glory rather a Burthen than a Happiness, made Peace with all their Neighbours as fast as they could; and soon put an End to that absolute Power, which Baron Goerts had made them weary of. The States went to a free Election of King Charles's Sister for their Queen; and obliged her solemnly to renounce all hereditary Right to the Crown, that she might hold it only by the People's Choice. She promised with repeated Oaths never to set up arbitrary Power. And afterwards, her Love of Power giving Way to conjugal Affection, the yielded the Crown to her Husband, and brought the States to chuse him, who ascended the Throne upon the same Conditions.

Baron Goerts was feized immediated by upon Charles's Death, and condemned by the Senate of Stockholm to be beheaded under the Gallows, an Inflance rather of Revenge than Juflice; and a cruel Infult on the Medmory of a King whom Sweden yet admires.

GIVING

A Description of the Persons, Behaviour, &c. of the King of Sweden, King Augustus, and King Stanislaus.

🎹 Will tell you as a particular Friend (and that even without Leave, which ought to have been) I did venture the other Day to ramble into Saxony to fatisfy my Curiolity, in seeing those different "Kings there, and penetrating as far as I could how Matters stood there, and how our Fate is like to be deter-· mined by that Gotbick Hero, who with a Handful of Men makes him-· lelf dreaded and courted by all the * Powers of Europe. As for his Per-"fon, 'he did not dementiri the Defictiption I had of him; he is a tall handlome Gentleman, but immoderately dirty and flovenly; his Behaviour and Carriage more ruffick than you can imagine in fo young a ' Man should be. And that the Outfide of his Quarters should not bely the Infide, he has chosen the dirtiest Place and one of the saddest Houses in all Saxony; the cleanest * Place is the Court before the House, where every Body is to alight off their Horses, and is up to the Knees in Dirt, where his Horses stand with hardly any Halters, and Sackings instead of Clothes, without eif ther Racks or Mangers. The Horses have rough Coats, thick Bellies, switch Tails; the Grooms that Idok after them feem not to be better * cloathed not better kept than their Horses; one of which stands always faddled for the mighty Monarch. who runs out commonly alone, and belivides his Steed, and away he s gallops before any one elle is able to follow him: sometimes he will go ten or twelve of those Country

Miles in a Day, which is about forty or fifty of our English Miles, now in the Winter Time, bespattered all over with Dirt like a Postilion. should make my Letter too long, if I should tell you his Dress, his Eating and Sleeping. But not to let it entirely alone, I will tell you his Coat is plain Blue, with ordinary. Brass Buttons, the Skirts pinned up behind and before, which shews his Majesty's old Leather Waistcoat and Breeches, which they tell me are fometimes so greafy, that they may be fried: but when I saw him they were almost new, for he had been a Gallant a little before, and had been to see King Augustus's Queen, upon her Return to Leipsick; and to be fine, he put on those new Leather Breeches, spoke not above three Words to her, but talked to a foolish Dwarf she had about a quarter of an ' Hour, and then left her. He wears a black Crape Cravat, but the Cape of his Coat is buttoned to close about it, that you cannot see whether he has any or no: his Shirt and Wrift bands are commonly very dirty, for he wears no Ruffles nor Gloves, but on Horseback: His Hands are commonly of the same Colour of his Wristbands, so that you can hardly distinguish them; his Hair is light brown, very greafy and very short, never combed but with his Fingers. He fits upon any Stool or Chair he finds in the House, without Ceremony at Dinner, and begins with a great Piece of Bread and Butter, having stuck his Napkin under his ' Chin; then drinks with his Mouth full out of a great Silver old fashioned Beaker small Beer, which is his only Liquor; at every Meal he drinks about two English Bottles full, for he empties his Beaker twice; between every-Bit of Meat-he eats a Piece of Bread and Butter, which he spreads with his Thuntbs. He is never above a quarter of an Hour at Dinner; eats like a Horse, speaks not one Word all the while. foon as he rifes his Life-guards fit down at the same Table to the same 'Victuals. His Bed-chamber is a very little dirty Room, with bare Walls, no Sheets nor Canopy to his Bed; but the same Quilt that lies under him turns up over him, and fo covers him. His Writing-table is a flit Deal, and only a Stick to support it; and instead of a Standish, a wooden Thing with a fand-box-of the same. He has a fine gift Bible by his Bed-side, the only thing that looks fine in his Equipage. He is a very handsome Man, well shaped, and a very good Face, no stern Countenance, but he is very whimfical and politive, which makes all the Allies afraid of him : for he risks himself and his Army, as easily as another would fight a Duel. He has not shewn much Generosity to King Augustus, who sent Chart Blanch to make Peace, and to recommend himself to his Friendship ; but does still every Day very hard Things to that poor Prince, whom he treats always like one whom he has entirely in his Power.

'King Augustus is as well bred as one shall see, obliging in his Person and Behaviour, and liked by every one.

one. But now he pays for all his false, unfaithful Politicks, and finds, too late, that one Prince should not entirely submit to another. But that my Letter is too long already. I would give you some Account of the Polish Court of King Stanislaus; for being incognito, (only with a Friend and one Servant) impossible to be known, I took a Tour to Leipfick, where I not only faw that King, but he very civilly came and fpake to me and my Friend, feeing we were Strangers. His Court has s a much better Air than that of his Maker; and his Mother and Wife s were there, a couple of well bred Women, well dreffed, and both · spoke very good French. He is a ត្រី៖ ... ការី បើក្រុកម៉ា die ការ៉ា សារ័ tall handsome young Man, with a great Pair of Whiskers, in the Polish Dress, inclinable to be fat, and a little upon the dirty, as all the Poles are. He was lodged in a very pretty Castle belonging to King Augustus, but against that King's Will, who will never see him, and cannot abide to hear him spoke of; and yet the Swedes would oblige him, which they say he ought to do by the Treaty.

Lord, you loved to hear of my Rambles, and I believe this may please you better than my former, being a very true Description of this mighty and dirty Monarch.
